MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; not that I am aware of.

WALFISCH BAY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the case that Her Majesty's Government have made proposals to the Cape Government for a modification of the frontier of Walfisch Bay, now a British port in Damaraland; whether the Cape Government strongly object to such modification; whether the modification is still contemplated, with or without the acquiescence of the Cape Government; whether the proposals made by Her Majesty's Government involve the cession of water stations inland, of the utmost importance to the district and port; and whether he will place in the Tea Room a map of the present British territory of Walfisch Bay as it was originally delimited by Colonel Phillips, R.E., and the German Commissioner, together with the proposed alterations?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question of the hon. Member is based on a misapprehension of the facts. The southern boundary of the Walfisch Bay territory has, unfortunately, not been accurately defined. Discussions have consequently arisen between the Authorities of the Cape and the German Authorities in Damaraland, as to whether it includes certain land which, as a water station, is of importance to the road from the coast to the interior. Her Majesty's Government have invariably supported the view of the Cape Government, and have never proposed a settlement in favour of Germany. An attempt to settle the difference by a Joint Commission failed, as Colonel Phillips, the British Commissioner, and his German colleague could not agree. Provisions for referring the matter to arbitration are inserted in the Anglo-German Agreement. No such map as is indicated can be furnished, as no joint delimitation has ever been made. The views of the Commissioners were hopelessly divergent.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland how many of the 36 County Inspectors, of the 90 first-class District Inspectors, and of the 90 second-class District Inspectors of the Royal Irish Constabulary have received those appointments since 1st July, 1887; and how many of the third-class District Inspectors have received those appointments since 1st July, 1887, from the Classes (a), (b), and (c), respectively, mentioned in answer to a Question on 25th July, 1889 (Hansard, vol. 338, column 1247-8)?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND, (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Constabulary Authorities report that since July 1, 1887, the following appointments referred to have been made: namely, to the position of County Inspector, 6; first-class District Inspector, 28; second-class District Inspector, 31; third-class District Inspector, 41. The 41 third-class District Inspectors were appointed from the Classes referred to as follows:—From (a), sons of Constabulary officers, 10; from (b), gentlemen other than sons of Constabulary officers, 22; from (c), Head Constables, 9.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman what is the maximum number of members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who have been permanently stationed in Great Britain during the years 1887, 1888, 1889, and 1890; and where are those now in Great Britain stationed?

MR. MADDEN: The maximum numbers of members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who have been permanently stationed in Great Britain during the years mentioned, are as follows:—1887, 29; 1888, 27; 1889, 25; 1890, 23. It would be inexpedient to give the information asked in the second paragraph, as the doing so would be calculated to defeat the object with which the men are stationed in Great Britain, namely, the apprehending of absconding criminals from Ireland.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can state the number of men of the Irish Constabulary, who, with their relays, are employed in watching at the various railway stations of Ireland; also the number who are employed in watching farms from which tenants have been evicted, and which are derelict?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that it would not be practicable to state the number of men who attend at railway stations in Ireland, as it daily varies according to the other duties to be performed. The practice is for one or more members of the Force to attend the arrival and departure of trains when the station is near their barrack, and when their doing so would not interfere with other duties. They further report that no members of the Royal Irish Constabulary are employed in watching derelict farms; but when caretakers in charge of such farms are in danger they are watched, and protection is afforded either constantly or by patrols.

ENNIS ABBEY.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the state of the ruins of Ennis Abbey; and whether they could be placed under the protection either of the Irish Church Act or of the National Monuments Act?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Ennis Abbey is not one of the structures vested in the Board of Works, Ireland, by the Irish Church Temporalities Commission for preservation as a national monument, nor has it been scheduled as a monument for maintenance under the provisions of the Ancient Monuments Protection Act, 1882; and I am informed that the Board are advised that abbeys and structures of that character do not come within the scope of that Act.

CHARGE OF FORGERY AGAINST A POLICE SERGEANT.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can now state the result as to the inquiries of Police Authorities into the cases of charges of forgery and fraud against Sergeant Lord, of Lorrha, County Tipperary; and whether the Government mean to take any action in the matter?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question. I have not yet been able to obtain information.

OUTRAGE IN CLARE.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. William Blood, of Cranabber, County Clare, was twice fired at within the past 12 months while under protection of the police, first on the public highway in the middle of the day, and secondly into Mr. Blood's house while he was sitting at the fire; what was the pattern of the bullets found in the house and alleged to have been fired; whether any investigation as regards the police on protection duty was made; and, if so, with what result; and whether any arrests were made in connection with either of the alleged outrages? In putting this question, I wish to know why the language of it has been altered from that which appeared in the Votes, and was distributed to Members on Friday morning, and who is responsible for the sub-editing of it?

*MR. SPEAKER: I am not aware; but, if necessary, I will make inquiry.

MR. COX: Then I will put the question as it stands on the Paper.

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the facts are as stated in the first paragraph. The bullets found were of ordinary make, and not of any special pattern. No investigation was made into the conduct of the police in connection with the outrages, nor was there any necessity for such. Three arrests were made in connection with the first outrage, and one in connection with the second.

MR. COX: How does the right hon. Gentleman account for the answer which he gave to a question of mine on Thursday last, that there were no persons under police protection in the County of Clare?

MR. MADDEN: I gave the information which was supplied to me.

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. COX: Was there not a man arrested and charged with the outrage on the ground that he was an evicted tenant of Mr. Blood's?

MR. MADDEN: I believe that there was a man charged.

LAND COMMISSION—MR. SUB-COMMISSIONER FRAZER.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is true that Mr. Robert Frazer has recently been appointed a Sub-Commissioner to fix fair rents; whether this is the same Mr. Frazer who formerly applied to have a fair rent fixed on a farm near Donaghmore which he held from the Dowager Lady Castletown, with regard to whom the Chairman of the Sub-Commission said—

"We have had frequently Mr. Frazer, the tenant of this farm, before us as a valuer, generally for landlords, and certainly, if we took his valuations as a standard to base the value of this land on, we should be obliged to increase instead of decrease the rent. However, we give him the benefit of our own estimation of its value and reduce the rent. We must say we consider this the worst managed farm we have come across for a long time;"

and whether he can state what Mr. Frazer's qualifications are for the office to which he has been appointed?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners request that this question may be deferred until Thursday next, in order that they may make the necessary inquiries.

LAND COMMISSION—MOUNTMELICK UNION.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can state how many cases of tenants from the Mountmellick Union, who had served originating notices to have fair rents fixed, were heard by the Sub-Commissioners sitting at Maryborough last month; how many cases were postponed; and why the case of Mr. Carrol, of Gossbrook, in the Mountmellick Union, who served an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed as long ago as October, 1887, has not yet been heard?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners request that this question may be deferred until Thursday next, in order that they may communicate with the Sub-Commission concerned.

IRISH UNIONS.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a series of resolutions recently passed by the Roscommon Board of Guardians, and unanimously approved by the Guardians of the Mountmellick Union, of which the following is a summary:—That the number of workhouses being now greatly in excess of the requirements of the poor, most (if not all) of the additional Unions established by the Boundary Commissioners in 1848 should be amalgamated with the adjoining Unions, and their workhouses closed or applied to other purposes; that some of the workhouses might be usefully employed for the reception of pauper idiots and lunatics; that others might be converted into male and female district schools where the pauper children, whose education is at present most defective, might receive a suitable literary and industrial training; and whether he will consider the practicability of carrying out these recommendations?

MR. MADDEN: The resolutions referred to were duly received by the Local Government Board. The general question of the amalgamation of Unions in Ireland has already engaged the attention of the Irish Government, but it is a subject not without difficulty. They hope, however, to take the first opportunity of again considering the matter.

VOLUNTEERS IN IRELAND.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the fact that while there is a Volunteer Force in England and Scotland there is none in Ireland; whether he can state the reason for this difference; and whether the Government will take steps to have Ireland placed in this respect on an equality with the other parts of the United Kingdom?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not think I can do better than quote verbatim the reply made to a similar question when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for

Mr. Madden

Mid Lothian was Prime Minister. The answer was that—"It would be remembered that in 1863 the Government of Lord Palmerston declined to extend the Volunteer system to Ireland, not because there was any reason to doubt the loyalty of the great majority of the Irish people, but because, on account of the unfortunate existence of strong religious dissensions in that country, there was great danger of the Volunteer Corps assuming a sectarian character, and of collisions and breaches of the peace resulting therefrom. It was hoped this circumstance might not constitute a permanent obstacle to the raising of Volunteer Corps in Ireland; but the state of things at the present time could not be said to be so completely altered as to enable the Government to sanction the formation of Volunteer Corps in Ireland."

It seems to me that the grounds for this decision are at least as strong now as in 1871, and I cannot advise my Colleagues to reverse it.

*MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Does that reason apply in the South and West of Ireland, where the people are nearly all of the same religion?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It would not be possible to have a decision varying with different parts of Ireland.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Would not the same reasons apply to the Militia?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Militia are organised in a totally different way from the Volunteers.

RAILWAY IN DONEGAL.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury are asked to provide money for the rolling stock as well as for the construction of the Killybegs line; and, if so, what is the advantage of its being promoted by the West Donegal Railway Company instead of by a separate Company; whether the Board of Works in their Report recommended alterations in the plans of the promoters, which were outside their limits of deviation, and consequently impossible to be carried out; whether the Treasury will make it a condition of their agreement that the Board of Works' Report on those deviations shall be complied with; whether he is aware that this line has the worst engineering features of any of the Light Railway projects, more than one-half its length being on gradients varying from 1 in 60 to 1 in 40; whether the line serves any congested district or any existing fisheries, and what is the character of the property through which it passes; and whether the engineering of the Killybegs line will be put up to competition?

MR. JACKSON: The answer to the hon. Member's first question is in the affirmative. There is an obvious advantage in the line being promoted by the Company of whose line it is an extension, and which will be able to ensure harmonious working. On the suggestion of Major General Hutchinson alterations were recommended by the Board of Works which are outside the limits of deviation, but the consent of all parties was obtained, and the alteration was sanctioned by the Grand Jury and will be carried out. Gradients of from 1 in 60 to 1 in 44 occur over rather less than half the length, but there is a 1 in 40 gradient for about a mile. Other light railways and tramways are working with worse gradients. The line will serve a large congested district in the South West of Donegal. As regards fisheries, if the hon. Member will refer to page 37 of the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for 1889, which was issued a few days ago, he will find that in the Killybegs Division there are 142 fishing boats and 817 men registered, and that there are considerable fisheries in Donegal Bay, Inver Bay, at St. John's Point, at Killybegs, Teelin, Tawny, and Malinmore. The Inspectors state that the fishermen at St. John's Point suffer from not having a market for their fish, being now about 20 miles from a railway station. I have answered on a previous occasion the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question.

MR. CLANCY: Does the property through which this line is to pass consist of estates belonging to some half dozen of the supporters of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. JACKSON: I have no information on that point. The fact has not been brought to my notice.

MR. CLANCY: Did the right hon. Gentleman inquire as to the character of the property through which it is to pass?

MR. JACKSON: The property is described as an improving and improvable property.

MR. CLANCY: Why has not the engineering of the line been put up to competition?

MR. JACKSON: I answered that question on a previous occasion.

MR. CLANCY: Is Mr. Barton the only engineer in Great Britain or Ireland with whom no competition is to be allowed?

MR. JACKSON: I take it that an engineer who has promoted the line, and who has been designated by the Grand Jury and by an Order in Council, is a proper engineer to appoint.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to give notice that upon the Estimates I will call attention as fully as I can to this scandalous job.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): How much money are the Treasury going to give Mr. Barton in connection with this line?

[No reply was given.]

ALLEGED INSUBORDINATION IN THE GRENADIER GUARDS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the newspapers, which is given on the authority of the Press Association, with regard to alleged dissatisfaction among a company of the Grenadier Guards, who, on being ordered to parade with their kit this morning, refused to do so, and returned to barracks; whether some of the men have been punished; and whether, in consequence of the alleged insubordination, it is contemplated to order the regiment on foreign service?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have heard nothing about this. If anything of such a serious character had occurred, I have no doubt that I should have heard of it.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiries to be made? This is no light matter, especially when we bear in mind the troubles in connection with the postmen and the Metropolitan Police.

[No reply was given.]

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I must press for an answer. [Cries of "Order!"] Here we have a postmen's strike and a police strike impending, and now there is dissatisfaction in the Army; and yet Ministers will not condescend to say whether they will inquire. I demand an answer. [Cries of "Order!"] Her Majesty's Ministers have got into a way of refusing to answer serious questions.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Then am I to understand that I am not at liberty to press for an answer?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entitled to ask a question; but it is perfectly competent for the Minister to decline to reply.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Then I beg to give notice that I will repeat the question to-morrow.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has any statement to make to the House with regard to the state of public business?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; I have no statement to make.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Not till next Christmas Eve.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be in the recollection of hon. Members that I stated a few days ago that as soon as the Committee upstairs have reported I should be in a position to make a statement to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Before the Irish Estimates are brought on, will the Government be in a position to state, for the information of the House, what are the proposals they intend to submit as to the amount of money to be appropriated to the purposes of the intended Light Railways? The Government have now been pressed for something like four months for an explanation, and it is most desirable that information should be given.

MR. JACKSON: The Government are not in a position to make any detailed statement now as to the manner in which it is proposed to utilise the money; but, without prejudicing the negotiations which have been going on, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary does intend to give the House information as to the schemes which it is proposed to carry out. Several of the schemes which have been scheduled are found to be technically not in order, and it will be necessary, I believe, to re-schedule them. I hope that that will be done in the course of a few days.

Mr. Cuninghame Graham

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman make that statement before the Vote for the Salaries of the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary is taken?

MR. JACKSON: The statement the Government will have to make on that subject will come more appropriately on the Public Buildings Vote, which contains a sum of £50,000 for the Light Railways.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): May I ask when the leader of the House will be able to state what arrangements are to be made with regard to the money the House generally is so anxious about, namely, the money provided by the Local Taxation Bill, which has already seen and suffered so much?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not at the present moment in a position to make any statement on the subject.

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(4.25.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I think, Mr. Courtney, that there is nothing which can bring home more vividly to the mind of hon. Members, and to persons outside this House, the policy which is being pursued in Ireland by Her Majesty's Government than the character of the Constabulary Force which at present exists in that country, and which, in my opinion, is altogether misnamed. It consists of an armed and drilled body of men, numbering more than 12,000, costing about £500,000 per annum, and employed as instruments in the hands of Her Majesty's Government for carrying out a system of coercive legislation. This Vote raises not only economic but constitutional questions, and I would ask the attention of the House while I dwell briefly upon each of those points. I am sure that no hon. Member can realise, unless he has devoted a considerable amount of time and attention to the subject, the enormous amount of money which is wasted in this Vote. I am satisfied in my own mind that if the Royal Irish Constabulary were confined to the proper duties of a Police Force and paid reasonable sums for their services, there might be, at any moment, saved to the Exchequer a sum of £500,000 per annum. Last year I put down a Motion declaring that the number of the Royal Irish Constabulary was excessive, and might with advantage be reduced. I proposed to ask for the appointment of a

Select Committee to inquire into the cost and administration of the Force. We have had a good many Select Committees during the present Parliament, and I think there is no subject upon which a Committee of 13 or 15 Members could more properly or more usefully be engaged upstairs than in investigating the matters I have mentioned. There are many precedents for such a course, and I can only express a hope that if not in this, at any rate in the next Parliament, a Committee will be appointed to inquire into this subject from top to bottom. The Royal Irish Constabulary consists of 12,810 persons, and the cost to the Imperial Exchequer for the year ending March 31st, 1891, is estimated at no less than £1,466,690. To use historical language, this Vote has increased, is increasing, and in my opinion ought to be diminished. Looking back to the year 1845 the cost was under 2s. per head of the population; in 1860 it was 2s. 5s.; in 1870, 3s. 4d.; in 1880, 4s. 4d.; in 1885, 5s. 8d.; and at the present time it stands above 6s. Nor are there any signs of a diminution. On the contrary, relatively to the population the cost is, as I have shown, rapidly rising. The matter is serious, if we look not only at the cost per head to the population of Ireland, but compare it with the cost of other Forces in this country, which are called by the same name. If hon. Members will look to Return No. 350 of Session 1889, they will find some interesting figures with respect to the cost of the Police Force in various districts. In Liverpool it was 3s. 4s. per head of the population; in Glasgow, 3s. 7d.; in Sheffield, 1s. 8d.; in Leicester, 1s. 7d.; and even in the Metropolis only 4s. 8d.; while in Ireland, as I have said, it is at this moment 6s. per head. I put it to any hon. Member whether this is not in itself a matter which demands our serious consideration. The reasons for this extraordinary disparity are on the surface. In the first place, the constitution of the Force is somewhat anomalous, and still more striking are the uses to which it is put. The Royal Irish Constabulary consists, like all other police forces, of officers and men. I think everyone who has been in Ireland—as a great many Gentlemen sitting above the Gangway and representing English constituencies have latterly been—will agree that nothing is more striking in that country than to see, when there are a number of the constabulary present on any public occasion, the class of persons by whom they are commanded. I have myself observed on more than one occasion the sergeants and District Inspectors, instead of being middle-aged men promoted from the ranks, are beardless youths taken from a different social status. Such persons, when an emergency arises, are utterly lacking in that self-control and discretion which are necessary for men having to act under difficult circumstances. In answer to a question I put to him on the 25th July last year, the Attorney General for Ireland told me that in the case of third-class District Inspectors there are three methods of promotion. He said that the appointments are made by nomination, in the following classes:—(a) gentlemen—sons of constabulary officers under certain conditions; (b) gentlemen, not sons of constabulary officers; (c) by nomination at headquarters on literary and professional qualifications. Now, I am not quite sure whether it would be possible to find this word “gentleman” imported into the regulations in this country with regard to any such appointments. I would like to ask the Attorney General what is meant by the word “gentleman.” I do not wish to cast any aspersions on the word rightly understood, but, if it means that the appointments are to be made from one particular stratum of society, that is not a very healthy state of things, when, as Lord Salisbury has said, there is a land war going on in Ireland. Her Majesty’s Government has, I hold, taken a side in that land war which is being waged between the owners and occupiers of land, and, therefore, to draw the officers of the constabulary exclusively from that one side must be to produce a state of things such as we must all deplore. Then I infer from the answer the Attorney General for Ireland was good enough to give me this afternoon with respect to the changes which have taken place in these classes of District Inspectors, that they have been very great recently. I gather from his reply that, since the 1st July, 1887, something like one-third of these officers are new to their posts. I venture to think that if one-third have changed in three years, it points to a very serious state of things. I think this word “gentleman,” and the drawing of these men in the way I have described from one social stratum, throws a great light on the figures I am about to read. I notice that some of the County Inspectors receive in the shape of pay and allowances and expenses—the items of which are given under various sub-heads—about £600 per annum, while some of the District Inspectors receive at least £500 per annum, and, looking at the duties these men have to perform, and the expense of living in Ireland as compared with England, I should say that in comparison with the pay of officers of a similar rank in the Metropolitan Police the salaries of the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary are extraordinarily extravagant. So much for the officers. Now, a word as to the men—and here the comparison to be made with the Metropolitan Police is even more striking. According to the information contained in Return No. 154 of the present Session, the Chief Commissioner of Police in the Metropolis enjoys a salary of £2,100 a year, and the Inspector General in Dublin £1,900, and I venture to say that, looking at the difference of the cost of living in London and Dublin, £1,900, as against £2,100, is, again, altogether extravagant. The average salary of Inspectors in the Metropolitan Force, of whom there are 846, is £143, whereas Inspectors of the first, second, and third rank in Ireland, of whom there are 224, get £200 on an average. That, I submit, is perfectly monstrous. As to the rank and file, the salaries of sergeants in London and head constables in Ireland average £96 and £97 respectively, the numbers being 1,398 sergeants in the Metropolis, and 260 head constables in Ireland. The number of constables in London is 12,098, and their pay averages £70 8s., while the 12,250 sergeants and constables in Ireland receive on an average £64 6s. per annum. I submit that, looking at the cost of living in the two countries, a policeman will be rich in Ireland on £64 6s. per annum, and poor in London on £70 8s. These 12,250 Irish constables are drawn from comparatively humble homes, where they are not accustomed to the same style of living as obtains even amongst the class from whom the Metropolitan Police are drawn. These figures must bring home to every Member of the House that we are monstrously extravagant in the matter of these Irish constables. I am not going to dwell on the amounts for allowances, which are very large, and for "travelling expenses," "clothing," and "arms and ammunition," because I have no doubt some other hon. Members will take up those points. I may say, however, that if we look into those points, they will only add force to what I have said. Before leaving this element of cost there is a matter I should like to mention, as I drew attention to it this afternoon. There are a certain number of men, members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who are permanently employed out of Ireland. The Auditor General has called attention to this matter in the Appropriation Account. On the 13th April, 1889, he wrote a letter to the Inspector-General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, in Dublin, requesting that he should be furnished with some information as to the circumstances under which members of the Force are employed outside Ireland, while their cost was charged on the Irish Vote. No answer was sent to the letter until 28th December, 1889, when the Inspector-General gave as his authority the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Chap. 13. He demands carte blanche in the matter, and claims that he may place as many men as he pleases outside Ireland, and for as long as he pleases. The Auditor-General, in reply, on 2nd January, said he is not assured that a quasi permanent employment inside the country falls within the meaning of the Act. This employment of men outside Ireland is distinctly illegal. The Inspector-General claims practically to over-ride the Act of Parliament without question from anyone. I have now dealt with the cost. I remember the late Mr. Bright used to say, in his more robust days, that the Services are a sort of outdoor relief for the aristocracy. That was his assertion, but I should say, so far as Ireland is concerned, that the Police Service is a system of out-door relief for the younger sons of landlords. The pay of this Force is extravagantly high, and fixed at a standard which is intended to act as a bribe to the men to do the work that is expected of them. But, after all, the £. s. d. aspect of the matter is not the most important and cogent aspect at the present moment. The main reason for this monstrous and unnecessary burden on the taxpayers is the policy which guides the operations of the Force. The Inspector-General quotes in his letter the Act 6 and 7 William IV. That Act was the work of Thomas Drummond, passed during his tenure of office in 1836, and I venture to tell the Irish Attorney General and the Chief Secretary, or anybody who defends the Irish Administration of the present day, that all through the Debates in this House in 1836, and afterwards, there is no warrant to be found for the purposes to which the Irish Constabulary are put. Over and over again, during the discussions, not only Lord Morpeth and Lord John Russell, but Sir Robert Peel, who was then in power, laid it down that the Constabulary should preserve "an even keel." Speaking as he was then in Opposition, Sir Robert Peel said—

"He believed it to be of the highest importance that the Police Force in Ireland should be kept perfectly free from the influence of Party animosity or Party excitement."

In the House of Lords it was also held that the police should preserve an even keel, and the view thus taken was illustrated by the Government action in the matter of the Tithe War. Over and over again Drummond refused the aid of the Constabulary in collecting the tithe. He said—"We will lend the police whenever necessary for the preservation of the peace, but never for the collecting of tithe." What a contrast between that policy and that of the present Government. The Prime Minister tells us that there is a land war in Ireland, and yet the Government have placed the Constabulary at the service of one party to that land war, to assist landlords, such as the arch-rack-renter Lord Clanricarde, to collect unjust rents. They have granted their police to evict thousands of these tenants from their holdings. In this connection I must allude to a picture which hangs on the walls of the Royal Academy at this moment, and in which the Royal Constabulary are depicted going away from what ought to be to everyone the sad duty of making houseless and homeless some of these poor tenants. The Prime Minister of this country, speaking at the opening banquet of the Academy, on the 3rd of May, said—

"There is such an air of breezy cheerfulness and beauty about the landscape which is painted that it makes me long to take part in an eviction, whether in an active or a passive sense."

I venture to think no Prime Minister of this country ever spoke on such an occasion before in such a spirit. If the Marquess of Salisbury has not since been ashamed of himself for uttering those words I can only say he ought to have been. I pass to some illustrations of the manner in which this Force has been used. We have seen it used for the arrest of persons and the entry of houses without warrant. I have brought a number of these cases under the notice of the Chief Secretary. On the 9th of May a man was arrested at Portumna by two constables, who afterwards proved to be drunk. No charge was made against him, and he was discharged. On the 12th of June two constables arrested a man at Cork. They were proceeded against, and convicted before a County Court Judge of having made an entry without authority or warrant. Constables are constantly in the habit of tearing down placards and interfering with perfectly legal meetings. Then the Irish Constabulary have been undoubtedly guilty of manufacturing the crime, as it is called, of boycotting, and of conniving at the even graver crime of moonlighting. You have only to read a Circular which appears in Hansard Vol. IV., of this Session, col. 1588, in order to see an emphatic proof of this conspiracy on the part of the police to manufacture the so-called crime of boycotting. That Circular gives an official sanction to the practice of entrapping the people into action which it is afterwards intended to prosecute them for. I need only to refer to that most unfortunate case in which Head Constable Whelehan lost his life in connection with my charge against the police of conniving at moonlighting. I quite admit that of late there has been some change in the use of the Force. They have resorted to a system of petty annoyance and interference with personal liberty culminating in the watching and shadowing of which we have heard so much. On the 11th of February, the Mayor of Cork went to Cork Station to meet a prisoner who was coming out on bail, and he was on that occasion ill-treated, more or less, in his own city, by a number of constables. On the 21st of February, Father Kennedy was administering religious consolation to a sick woman, and it is admitted that constables went to the place and interfered with him in the discharge of his clerical functions. On the 17th of February, Mr. John Fitzgibbon, of Castlereagh, a most respectable man, who is known to myself, was followed and interrupted in his business for no conceivable reason whatever. On the 4th of March, Sergeant Hegarty knocked at the door of a room where the Town Commissioners of Cashel were sitting, and demanded what they were doing, on the pretence that they were holding a meeting of the National League. I put it to the House whether it is not intolerable that a meeting of the Town Council should be interfered with by a constable knocking at the door, and asking whether they are holding a National League meeting. On the 15th of April the Rev. Mr. Brown, Catholic curate, was told that he would be followed if he did certain things, and this after a police-prosecution against him had completely broken down. It is because the authorities know that if matters of this sort get into Court the prosecution will break down, that they rely on the more odious system of petty personal persecution. I now come to the system that has been stigmatised so forcibly by an hon. Gentleman opposite (Commander Bethell). On the 19th of May the Rev. Father Humphreys and others were ordered to move on by some of these men. This mode of procedure is becoming notorious, and has been happily made well-known in this country by the photographs which have been successfully taken by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien.) According to questions put on the 16th June and the 23rd May, Messrs. Cullenane, Frewin, and Gill were followed in the streets of Tipperary by the police, and even into the shop of Mr. Carew of that place, and they were there asked questions of a very impertinent character. The hon. Member for Tipperary has asked in this House with respect to an insult offered to his wife and another lady in the streets of Cashel. These are only a few of the illustrations of this practice of petty annoyance and interference with personal liberty in Ireland. No doubt we shall hear more details of the practice from hon. Members for Irish constituencies. I believe that even the Chief Secretary is beginning to see that this system of personal annoyance is one that had better be abandoned. Now I come to my last count against the Irish Constabulary, namely, that of physical wounding and shooting. On the 17th February Miles O'Brien was struck on the neck, felled to the ground, and kicked while down by a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and when he asked a Magistrate for his remedy against this maltreatment he was referred to Colonel Caddell. The Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland tell us, time after time, that persons injured by the police have their remedy at law, but we who have been in Ireland know what a mockery that statement is. The word law and the word magistrate do not mean the same thing in Ireland that they mean in this country. It is perfectly idle to tell an injured person that he has his remedy at law. In this case the only consolation he got was in being referred to Colonel Caddell, who was the very man who committed all these iniquities in the district. He was the man, too, who a year ago was charged with speaking in a most insulting, offensive, and immoral way to a girl who was in his custody. That charge against him has never been disproved, because it cannot be. Now, we have had full details of what took place at Cashel at the end of May. I will not enter into them here now, but I may say that I was astonished, after all the experience we have had of the Government, that it should refuse any sort of departmental inquiry—or impartial investigation into the circumstances of this case. It has always been held in this House that when hon. Members state facts on their personal authority—facts affecting the character of any public Department—the Government should have some sort of inquiry into the statement. Yet the inquiry was refused in this case. I will give one illustration of the necessity for inquiry. District Inspector Concannon was in charge of a number of men on the 13th June, 1889, when they were conveying my hon.

Friend the member for North East Cork along the railway, and at Charleville, certain incidents occurred and shots were fired. It was stated at that time that the police fired without orders; a quasi denial was given to that from the Government Bench opposite, but in a recent trial the District Inspector has given evidence, and in the course of so doing, in reply to the question, "Did you give any directions to the sergeant to fire?" he replied "No, they fired without orders." That was not admitted at this time last year. These cases might be abundantly multiplied; they might be infinitely strengthened, as I hope they will be, by those who were eye witnesses of these occurrences. I have not dwelt on the want of morale and discipline which is showing itself in the Force. You have convictions for drunkenness which do not seem to be treated in a grave manner by those responsible for the administration of the Force. You have receipts forged; you have, in at least one instance, the name of a Member of this House forged by a police constable. All these things point to a state of demoralisation, and a state of indiscipline, it is lamentable to see in a Force which has its traditions, and which, under proper arrangements, might be made a Force of which any country would be proud. I think the Government is responsible for this state of things. I no longer hold the Chief Secretary personally responsible. The Government is responsible; the Members on the Benches behind it are responsible, and those Members who do us the honour to disperse themselves among us here, but whom the electors will soon do themselves the honour of dispersing, are equally responsible. At the same time, I cannot overlook the most regrettable want of accuracy which is noticeable on the part of the Chief Secretary when he gets up to reply to questions. On the 12th June he was obliged to say, "I was, therefore, in error in the statement I made about these two men." I have here one more illustration of the almost habitual inaccuracy of the right hon. Gentleman. The occasion was in connection with the funeral of the late Mr. Matthew Harris. On the 17th April the hon. Member for West Belfast asked a question in relation to what occurred at that funeral, and on the 18th he renewed his question, but received no answer. He then spoke on the Adjournment of the House, and the Chief Secretary, in the middle of the remarks I was making upon that Motion—when I happened to use the expression “armed men” in reference to the constables who attended the funeral—shouted across the Table, “They were not armed.” He repeated the same assertion on the 9th May, when it was perfectly in his power to have obtained correct information. On the 9th May he actually stated that the police on that occasion had their batons only, and not their side-arms. But the hon. Member for Roscommon, who was present on the occasion, saw the side-arms, and I will ask: Does the Chief Secretary mean to say that the word of an hon. Member, who was present and saw the side-arms, is not to be taken in preference to a statement made through the post or by telegraph, either by the constables concerned, or by their superiors—statements which, as we know in matters of this kind, are absolutely unreliable? I do not know anything which can bring home more positively these facts to the mind of the public than this shocking imprudence of armed constables pushing in among the relatives to the side of the grave. I have now gone rapidly through my case as to the cost of this Force and the uses to which it is put. We find that Parliament is asked to vote an enormous and wholly unnecessary sum for this Police Force—a Force put to uses which, I venture to say with some confidence, were never contemplated by the authors of the Act of 1836. The Government have departed from the key-note of those authors—an even keel, showing no favour to one side or to the other. They have placed this Force in a position in regard to the inhabitants of Ireland which is most lamentable. The Royal Irish Constabulary stinks in the nostrils of the people. It was said by William Penn that a man should make it part of his religion to see that his country is well governed, and agreeing as I do with that opinion, I unhesitatingly and with all my heart oppose this Vote.

(5.12.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I rejoice at this opportunity of breaking a silence most painful to many Members of this House, and painful to hundreds and thousands—aye, even millions of voters in the country, some of whom, however, have had an opportunity of breaking that silence at Barrow. We have heard their voice there, and we know what it meant. If there is any subject that stirs my constituents to the very depths of their nature it is this wretched, miserable, humiliating tyranny that is exercised in Ireland, through what is called the Royal Irish Constabulary. Look at this Force; there never was such a Constabulary Force in the world anywhere before. In numbers, in arms, in discipline, in the favours of emoluments with which it is bribed, there never was such a Force anywhere. We have an armed Constabulary, indeed, in some remote regions of our Imperial Dependencies, but they are feeble in numbers, compared with the extent of the territory in which they work, and compared with the barbarians with whom they have to deal. Here, in a comparatively small island, with a population of under 5,000,000, you have, as we have just now heard, upwards of 12,000 men, armed with weapons of precision, and drilled like soldiers. What is this extraordinary Force wanted for? Is it wanted to put down crime? If you mean by crime advocating Radical or Republican opinions, or Home Rule, no doubt it may be wanted; but that is not what we usually mean by crime. So far as crime is understood in this country, we have the very highest evidence that there is far less crime in Ireland than in any part of Great Britain. I will refer the House to the weighty words once uttered by Judge Waters, in opening the Quarter Sessions at Waterford. The learned Judge, after congratulating the Grand Jury on the insignificant amount of crime that had occurred in the district—I believe the date of this speech was the 15th of August, 1887—went on to say that even that record was heavier than in the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, and if they added the Assize cases as well for the three counties, he could show, by quoting official statistics, that the proportion of crime was less by one-third than in England (being 114 cases as against 174), and less by one-half than in Scotland, where the proportion was 114 to 225. Then the learned Judge went on to observe that these three counties fairly represented the condition of Ireland as regarded crime. It is notorious that this statement of the learned Judge has never been, and cannot be, contradicted. Therefore, it is not to put down burglary, or pocket picking, or petty larceny, or ordinary assaults that this terrific Constabulary Force is maintained in Ireland. Then what, in the name of justice, is it wanted for? It is wanted to force upon the majority in Ireland the rule of the minority. That is the long and short of it. Because public opinion runs strongly and persistently in the direction which is condemned by the small minority in Ireland, and because that small minority is held up by the ruling powers in this country, therefore we are obliged to have this large display of armed force in Ireland. That is the sole reason. I maintain that that is a condition of things wholly contrary to all traditions of Constitutional Government—that the majority shall permanently submit to the rule of the minority. In a speech delivered at Bradford, in 1888, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham undertook to defend what we call coercion, and it is for this coercion that the Royal Irish Constabulary is maintained. In the course of his defence he said all law was coercive, and the only thing which distinguished the civilised state from barbarism was the fact that, in a civilised State, the law of the land was observed, and those who disobeyed it were punished. I always thought there was another characteristic distinction of civilised States, namely, that the vast majority of the population consented to the law, and that it was by the consent of the majority that the law was maintained. I could point, of course only by way of illustration, to other instances in which the law has to be maintained by violence, as, for instance, St. Petersburg, and, surely, that city is not commonly taken as evidence of a state of a high civilisation. It is regarded as evidence that the population are but half emerging from barbarism, and that the higher element in the population is subordinated to the lower. So it is in Ireland. If we want the law obeyed there, let us secure for it the consent of the population. Let us govern the country in accordance with the opinion of the majority of the population. There is no reason why this should not be the case in Ireland. There is no reason why the armed Constabulary should not be abolished at once, if only we could rule in Ireland as we do in this country, and allow the opinions of the majority to prevail. The real effect of the present state of things is sometimes almost more ludicrous than is reported. I have had an opportunity several times recently of visiting Ireland, and of conversing with various representatives of political Parties there, and I have had the satisfaction of being followed by members of the Royal Irish Constabulary. I do not know whether I should be a very dangerous person. I do not know whether I should be a very formidable rebel. I do not know whether I am capable of murdering many people, by committing acts of violence. I have never tried, and, therefore, I cannot answer the question. But why, when inhabitants of this country who have never been suspected of crime and have never come into contact with the law, visit Ireland, should they be followed by police officers? They are not so treated in England, but immediately they enter Ireland, without any change in their character, without any lowering of their principles, they find themselves the objects of the suspicion of the authorities, and they are made the subjects of watching and shadowing on the part of the police. There surely is something wrong in this state of things. Why should well-behaved citizens in this country be made the objects of police suspicion when in Ireland? There is only one way of accounting for all this, and that is, that we are trying to balance the pyramid on its apex in Ireland. We are protecting a perverse, arrogant, bigoted, narrow-minded, selfish minority against the patriotic majority of the population. When one comes into contact with that population—when one studies the difference between those who are in favour of Home Rule and those to be found on the side of the police—it is possible to come to but one conclusion, and that is a very sad one, for it is that the whole object of the system supported by the Royal Irish Constabulary is to suppress the very best elements in Irish character and to encourage and foster the very worst. On the one side you have mutual loyalty, you have patriotism, and you have self-sacrifice most abundantly proved. On the other side—that of the associates of the police and in the ranks of the Royal Irish Constabulary themselves—you have weakness engendered by long continued poverty, you have a disposition to accept bribes, you have greed, you have the aspect of Anti-Nationalism, and you have a few selfish people set against the better aspirations of the majority. You have, further, a system of suspicion and of a sneaking, wretched, watching and shadowing, which it is odious to behold; you have moral corruption, and you have continual outbreaks of utterly indefensible violence. The Royal Irish Constabulary are a danger to order in Ireland. We are not disposed to forget their conduct at Mitchelstown, although right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite think by sneering and satire to suppress the memory of it. Then you have a system of falsehood pervading the ranks of officialism in Ireland, and right hon. Gentlemen opposite make themselves the involuntary channels for the conveyance of those falsehoods to this House. For instance, the Chief Secretary, in reference to recent proceedings at Tipperary, said that there was no open-air meeting there, or if there were it was a very subordinate part of the day's proceedings. Well, I was present, and the open-air meeting was the most important item on the day's programme. When the Carnarvon election took place some of us were on our way to Ireland, and before we boarded the steamer we anxiously inquired as to the result of the contest, because we knew that if the Liberal were returned the Tipperary meeting would be allowed, while if the Tory were elected it would be proclaimed. Well, the announcement of the Liberal victory made us assured that the police would not interfere with the meeting. Though you laugh at this reasoning it is justified by what has been the practice; it is founded on experience. Whatever else the Irish race may be, they are not fools, and they can argue from experience. On previous occasions the action of the Royal Irish Constabulary towards innocent meetings had notoriously been determined by the course of political events in this country. Well, the prophecy was fulfilled. As a matter of fact, the meeting was not interfered with. The police stood aside gloomily and unsympathetically, but they stood aside and did not interfere. Then, says the right hon. Gentleman, "Yes; it is true English Members were allowed to speak, for his experience was that while the effect of the speeches of Irish Members might be felt, the effect of the speeches of English Members was absolutely nil." Well, of course, we quite know that we cannot rival, and we do not pretend to rival, the oratory and influence of Irish Members in Ireland, but the point is this; not that the right hon. Gentleman allowed English Members to speak, but that he allowed Irish Members to speak, and some of them, the most prominent, the most dangerous, as they are called, of these so-called criminal conspirators, who, as hon. Members on the other side are fond of reminding us, have been condemned by the renowned Special Commission. Some of the most prominent, or most dangerous of these criminal conspirators held forth from the platform at New Tipperary. It is not the point that the right hon. Gentleman allowed English Members to address an Irish crowd; the point is that when the Carnarvon election was carried by an Home Ruler, Irish Members, the most prominent representatives of the Home Rule movement, were allowed to address their constituents at New Tipperary. We had a very humiliating exhibition of the dependence of the Government on the current of political opinion in this country. Humiliated they were, and driven from bad to worse, from cruelty and repression to the most shameful exhibition of disgraceful acts of moral torture such as the system of "shadowing" of which we have heard so much. Think what it must be to have a man following by your side, and another at your heels, throughout the live-long day. You may be a solicitor going about your business, you may be a parish priest visiting your parishioners, but whatever your business, whatever your duties, whatever your intercourse with your fellows, whatever the distraction of your own thoughts, you have the tormenting presence of a detective by your side, and another at your heels, never giving you a moment's peace. I say that that is moral torture, and it is intended as torture for those who dare to think and act for themselves in considering their country's welfare. The other day when a question was asked about an Irishman who had turned the tables upon a detective, who had shadowed him, and the shadower became the shadowed, the man was arrested on the charge of having interfered with a constable in the discharge of his ordinary duty. Well, but what about the two constables who interfered with the parish priest in the discharge of his ordinary duty? What more right have they to interfere with a man's duty than any citizen of Tipperary has to interfere with a constable in the discharge of a duty, not, so far as I am aware, prescribed to him by the law? It appears to me it is outside the law altogether. But the law means one thing in this country and another thing in Ireland. We find a Minister, by refinement of speech, by quibbles of analogy, trying to show that, in the abstract, the law is ultimately the same in Ireland as in England, but it is not administered in the same manner. It interferes with rights in Ireland which are allowed full scope in this country, it represses the ordinary modes of political action in Ireland which are freely allowed in this country, it makes even English citizens to be suspected criminals in Ireland when never a shadow of suspicion attaches to them in their own country. The fact is the whole system represented by the Irish Constabulary is a sheer piece of barbarism, of which Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen are ashamed. We are powerless now to break it down, but, thank God, better days are coming. Barrow has uttered a word of prophecy, and in due time the whole country will rise and sweep away this miserable exhibition of how an English Government can become degraded, and will give freedom and justice to Ireland at last.

* (6.38.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I had expected from the Treasury Bench some reply to these damaging speeches; but I suppose we must wait, and that a late opportunity will be chosen for trotting out statements which will be delivered too late for full contradiction on this side. With this Vote we are face to face with some extraordinary facts and figures. Strange to say, in a country where unhappily the population is steadily declining, we find the cost of police mounting decade by decade until the estimate, which in 1871 was £1,000,000, has now reached £1,589,000. The mere recital of that fact ought to be sufficient to arouse the vigilant attention of the Committee, and to focus the attention of the country on a system which requires such expenditure to maintain it, and stands condemned in the minds of all men. The exact figures are, in 1871, for the maintenance of the Royal Irish Constabulary, including the police of Dublin, £1,016,000; this year £1,589,000, or an increase of over 56 per cent., an increase of £573,000. These are alarming figures, and ought to startle every economist in the House. The cost of the Irish Constabulary has risen from 3s. 9d. per head of the population 20 years ago to 6s. 9d. to-day. It is a severe commentary on the entire system which requires such a Force to be maintained. The hon. Gentleman who opened this discussion has given the cost of police in certain British towns, and I need not dwell upon the comparison beyond noting that, while the cost in Ireland is 6s. 9d. per head of population, in Dundee it is 1s. 11d., in Leeds 2s. 3d., in Bradford 2s. 1d., and 1s. 5d. only in the important town of Sunderland. Significant enough are such figures as these; but the facts of recent mal-administration of the police are of such a grave character that they cannot be met by legal quibbles, and no amount of polished sneering can explain to the Committee the facts in the indictment against police administration in Ireland during the past 12 months. Notwithstanding what has often been said from both sides of the House, we have always held that the Royal Irish Constabulary have never been at any time in history a popular force; but whatever may have been the feeling towards the Force in past years, there cannot be a doubt that within the last three or four years it has reached a pitch of intense exasperation, little short of hatred absolutely. There was a time when the Irish Constabulary moved about among the people in some sort of amity with them and with some sort of self-respect; but now in towns and rural districts it is held to be a stigma and mark of disgrace to hold intercourse with a member of the Force. It is a grave condition of things that a body of men, administered at such enormous expense, should be regarded in this manner by the people whose lives and liberties they are nominally supposed to protect. I do not propose to bring forward many instances at this stage of the discussion; they will multiply as the Debate goes on. We charge it against the administration that the Force is going from bad to worse; that acts of folly and violence are being daily committed; and there appears to have entered into the administration of the police, whether it comes from the Treasury Bench or from Dublin Castle I will not undertake to determine, but a spirit has entered into the administration of this undoubtedly fine body of men which has pitted them against the aspirations, the political and the social rights of the vast body of the people of Ireland. Instead of being maintained in the interest of peace and order, for the prevention and detection of crime, the police are part and parcel of the landlord machinery, directed and governed as such. That has been illustrated at Tipperary. But Tipperary Members will refer more particularly to this. I will only say this: that we have often heard the right hon. Gentleman say, in reference to organised combinations against evictions, that it was this resistance to the police that created bad blood between them and the people; that the Plan of Campaign was responsible for violence, which was distasteful to the police. But here in Tipperary, rightly or wrongly, wisely or foolishly, we find the people guilty of no violence; they gave up their homes voluntarily to the officers of the law, no resistance being attempted, and removed to another part of the town. Yet, though the people were not acting in defiance of the law, or in any way attempting a breach of the peace, the police entered upon a long course of brutality and studied insolence. The right hon. Gentleman has never attempted to explain how it was that no inquiry was held into the affray at Mitchelstown, nor has an inquiry been granted in more recent cases of police violence. Honestly, no doubt relying on statements furnished him, the right hon. Gentleman contradicts our facts; and support these by what testimony we will, we never get inquiry. Though there may be loss of life from the reckless use of murderous weapons, yet inquiry is refused, even though Coroners' Juries empannelled by the police themselves return verdicts of wilful murder. What has the right hon. Gentleman to say of the Charleville business? It is admitted that the police fired at the railway station into the crowd with intent to kill. We asked for inquiry into the circumstances. When we attempted civil proceedings we were met by every obstacle that legal ingenuity could suggest to the minds of Dublin Castle lawyers. Only after great difficulty and considerable expense, met by contribution, from the countrymen of the wounded man, were we able to bring the case to trial. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork will, I understand, refer particularly to the remarkable declarations of the two Judges who presided at the two trials, and who, in the most unhesitating manner, condemned the culpable conduct of the District Inspector and the men under his charge. There are times when a civil force may be called upon to use rough methods towards a crowd; but I have seen the Irish Constabulary over and over again, when people were actually dispersing and had been but listeners to a speech, pursue the people—men, women, or boys—into doorways, and far from the scene of the meeting, and batoning the unoffending flying people about the head. I have seen these things, and I have wondered that from the younger men there have not been reprisals. We have brought such cases forward, but we get no satisfaction—we are simply met with blank and stupid denial. It is but a short time ago that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, passing through Cork, spoke a few words from his hotel—a short speech such as he might have uttered anywhere in England, and it would have been received with applause by an English audience. But without notice, without giving the people time to disperse, a body of police rushed upon the people, inflicting such serious wounds with their heavy batons that many persons had to be taken to the infirmary. Imagine the bitterness of feeling scenes of this kind give rise to. Were it not for the restraining influence upon the younger Irish people, which comes from the knowledge that this state of things cannot last for long, there would be reprisals upon the police for these brutalities. The right hon. Gentleman and the Attorney General for Ireland have recently exercised their ingenuity in connection with a system which an hon. Member on the other side of the House has characterised as damnable. "Shadowing," we have been told by the Chief Secretary, is only put in force against those suspected of complicity in criminal conspiracy. I do not know how the right hon. Gentleman can "square" this statement with the every day facts before us in Ireland. Does it tend to the preservation of the peace that a Catholic priest should be followed about all day while engaged in the ordinary duties of his sacred office, visiting the sick and dying, fulfilling what we regard in our Church as the most solemn function—preparing the soul for departure to another world? "Shadowing" has been carried to such an extent that police have watched the house and peered through the windows of the sick chamber where a dying woman lay. Father Kennedy, I fully admit, was convicted of taking part in the holding of National League meetings in a suppressed district; but those meetings have been discontinued for some time past, and surely it were better to allow 20 League meetings to go unsuppressed than to exasperate the people with the spectacle of their priest being followed day and night in his sacred duties. The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny the facts, of which there is photographic evidence, showing how Father Humphries has been subjected to this treatment. Recently I called attention to the arrest of Mr. O'Brien, of Killeagh. Mr. O'Brien was arrested on the spot on a charge of interfering with a constable. He had been followed by the constable in plain clothes all day, and attending a fair and approaching a spot where cattle were being sold, was asked did he want to buy. He replied "No, but this policeman does." It was proved at the hearing of the case that this was the extent of his interference with the constable. He had previously chatted amicably with him and exchanged the civility of pipe-lighting; but because he thus exposed the policeman's little game, Mr. O'Brien was given in charge to a constable in uniform, locked up, and a Resident Magistrate was telegraphed for from Cork, and was, in an hour and a-half, duly delivered like a bale of goods as per invoice at Youghal. If Mr. O'Brien's conduct was calculated to lead to a breach of the peace which is likely to be the consequence of two constables continually following a man about his ordinary business, is it not more than human nature can bear? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not attempt in the Debate on this subject to shelter himself behind the denials that have been given by the police. We can give the right hon. Gentleman chapter and verse for our allegations, and ask for and require explicit statements. We ask for an explanation with regard to Father Humphreys, Father Kennedy, and Canon Keller, and also in reference to the cases of numerous other clergymen throughout the country. And now, Sir, I wish to bring under the attention of the Committee the great hardship arising from the system of shadowing. The administrators of the Police Force of Ireland seem to have got it into their heads that it is a part of their business to be in every market and fair in Ireland, in order that the stock of those who have been locally boycotted must be purchased willy-nilly. In order to carry out their duty they not only hamper and interfere with the business of the fair, but they also inflict great loss and hardship on those who are engaged in fair or market matters. Let me take the case of a cattle dealer going to a fair. If he is known to be a Nationalist, he is followed from his own place to the fair he attends, and, when there, is shadowed everywhere and to such an extent that it is almost impossible he can do any business. Take the case of Mr. Slattery, who was so shadowed by the police that he was utterly unable to transact his business for many months. When he was endeavouring, in the ordinary way of his business, to buy cattle, one policeman stood on one side of him and another on the other and listened to every word that passed, so that in every attempt to make a bargain the unfortunate man was utterly frustrated. As it was in the case of Mr. Slattery, so it has been the case with hundreds of others; and we want something more than the denial of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to these cases.

I do not intend to go into detail with regard to these cases; but I charge that the general administration of the Force has tended to make the police commit acts of illegality and violence utterly unchecked by the authorities. Latterly it seems to have become a legal axiom in the constabulary that any body of men acting together in Ireland must per force give the head constable or the District Inspector an explanation of the business they desire to carry out. Only a short time ago a number of the Fermoy Town Commissioners came together in the discharge of their duties, and the head constable asked them to explain whether they were going to hold a meeting of the National League, because some of them were members of the League. If that doctrine is carried to its legitimate conclusion, wherever there has been a branch of the League, it will be utterly impossible for the people to meet at all, because all the adults have belonged to the National League, and cannot meet for any purpose without being liable to interruption from the police. I will give an illustration of what occurred quite recently. A Town Commissioners' meeting was to have been held at Cashel two weeks ago, and that meeting was interrupted by the police on the pretence that it might be a meeting of the League. Several members of the Board protested against the interruption caused by the police, the Chairman saying, "I ask Mr. O'Brien to order the retirement of the police." Another member of the Board said, "This is a meeting of the Corporation." Police Sergeant Cagley said, "It is not my fault I am here. I am informed it is a meeting of the National League, which is suppressed." The Chairman said, "You must leave this, sergeant;" and the sergeant said, "No; I see several members of the National League here." Suppose this principle were applied to hon. Members on these Benches, we should, in that case, have no right to attend here and assist in conducting the business of the nation, because many of us have been members of the National League. It was only after the strong protest of the Chairman and the threat of legal proceedings that the police withdrew. This is only a sample of what is going on all over the country. In the case of Father Kennedy, the police insisted on forcing their way into his private house, because he would not give them a guarantee that an illegal meeting was not about to be held. This is a state of things which has been denounced by Chief Baron Palles, and which excited the indignation of Mr. Justice Gibson. We are told we have a right of civil action; but when we assert that right, we are met by a full Bar, and every possible legal obstacle is thrown in our way. There are, however, hundreds of cases in which it is impossible to take proceedings, because there are no means of identifying the constables, whose names are refused by the Inspectors. I remember the case in which the Mayor of Cork and myself each collared a policeman, and said we would have his number. We added, moreover, that if there was a single act of brutality committed by the police we should hold him responsible. The result was that a police charge, which was about being made against hundreds of people, was prevented. There was also the case of my Friend the Member for Monaghan, some months ago, at the Bandon Station. He was waiting peaceably to welcome an hon. Friend, when he was set upon, knocked down, and brutally kicked while on the ground. Priest after priest went to the Inspector to try and stop what was going on, and when they looked for the numbers of the constables they were unable to get them. We also find that when the City Police are sent on outside duty, such as eviction duty or dispersing the people, their numbers are always carefully removed. I know that this is done in the City of Cork. What can be the meaning of this, except that they are to perpetrate any amount of illegal violence without affording the people the opportunity of redress. When we are told that we may take legal proceedings, I would remind the House of what happened a few months ago on the occasion when the hon. Member for North East Cork had been tried at Clonakilty, and was being removed to gaol. On that occasion a large number of priests, professional men, and the most respectable of the inhabitants, were on the railway platform to see Mr. W. O'Brien taken away, intending nothing more than a demonstration of respect. In reference to what then occurred Dr.

Magner gave evidence at an inquest which subsequently took place as to what occurred. He stated that there was no disturbance, no crowd, and no excitement, but he was suddenly seized by a policeman, dragged across the platform, and assaulted in a violent manner. He immediately demanded the policeman's name from District Inspectors Crane and Purcell, two officers then present. The Inspector referred him from Mr. Crane to County Inspector Heard, who would not give him the policeman's name. And thus the man was sent from one office to another without obtaining the evidence which he sought. One hundred cases of that kind could be brought forward. I have given the right hon. Gentleman a specific statement. If he does not deny it, I hope he will never again get up in this House, or never again during the short time that remains to the Administration, and refer us to legal proceedings when we complain of the wrongs committed upon the Irish people. I hope the Committee will take these facts and figures into consideration. I hope that they will, at any rate, make an impression upon many Members and upon the country at large. We know that the right hon. Gentleman pays no slavish or superstitious adherence to accuracy in this House; but, however that may be, I hope that these figures, showing how the expenditure on the Irish Constabulary is mounting year after year, will be heard from every platform in the country, as evidence that this Administration is doing nothing for the pacification, let alone the prosperity, of Ireland.

(6.20.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Courtney, we have now listened to three speeches on the subject of this Vote, which we were specially asked by the right hon. Gentleman opposite to bring on at an early date, in order that what they allege to be new grievances in connection with the management of the Royal Irish Constabulary might be brought before the notice of the House. In those three speeches we have had a good many old topics dealt with, to which I and my predecessors in Office have often replied. The hon. Member for Leicester has given us a very interesting, though, perhaps, not very relevant, account of his journey in connection with a meeting held in April at the new town of Tipperary. I do not think it necessary, at this stage, at all events, of the Debate, to reiterate the arguments used by my predecessors and myself on this point, and I will confine myself now to the topic which has been alluded to in violent language by the hon. Member who has just spoken—namely, the practice known in this Debate as “shadowing,” which the hon. Member has described as a damnable practice.

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

*MR. FLYNN: It was one of your own followers who so described it. [Cries of “Bethell.”]

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member quoted the description of the practice, and I will say that it has been spoken of by two Members of this House as being damnable. It is a curious thing that this topic should not have risen into prominence until the year 1890, because it certainly existed in times past to as great an extent, and, I believe, to a greater extent, than it does now. The invention of this as a new subject of agitation is due to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who, following me in Debate the other day, made a very violent, very eloquent, and very spirited attack upon the action of the police in this matter, and among a great many very violent expressions he stated that, in his opinion,

I think the right hon. Gentleman would be well advised if, before he makes these violent attacks upon the present Administration, he were to consult those right hon. Gentlemen who sit near him as to what occurred in the previous Administration, with which he was more nearly connected; he would have been saved on this occasion, as he would have been on many previous occasions, from somewhat serious rhetorical misadventures. [“Hear, hear!”] I heard the right hon. Gentleman cheer that last statement I made. He appears to think that we have introduced some very startling novelties into this practice of shadowing. I recollect a previous occasion, when a noble friend of mine who, I think, is not in the House now, raised the question with regard to Irish administration with which he was personally connected—I mean when Lord Cowper was Viceroy, and when Mr. Forster was Chief Secretary. He also thought that in those halcyon days of Irish administration the unheard-of abomination to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded had no place in the action of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends must recollect that though Mr. Forster had undoubtedly great difficulties to deal with in connection with Irish administration, he had methods more drastic than those possessed by the present Government, which saved him to a great extent from having to call upon policemen to closely watch and carefully follow suspected persons. He had even a more summary and effective method, because he promptly put them into prison. I suppose that over 100 out of 1,000 persons who were imprisoned without trial were imprisoned because they were suspected of boycotting and intimidation, and I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, who is so very free with his epithets, to the fact that when these men who were imprisoned without trial on suspicion of boycotting and intimidation were again let loose upon society, they were warned by the Authorities that their movements would be closely watched by the police, and that as soon as suspicion again arose against them they would be again imprisoned. That was before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton became specially responsible for the administration of Ireland. I have alluded to the special facilities which the Legislature gave to Mr. Forster. But Lord Spencer also had facilities which are not possessed—and I do not regret it—by the present Government. Lord Spencer and the right hon. Gentleman opposite gave to themselves, through the co-operation of this House, power by which any policeman might, upon reasonable suspicion of criminal intent on the part of any stranger in the district, bring him up before a single Magistrate and bind him over to keep the peace. When the right hon. Gentleman next desires to make an attack upon the Government, I hope that he will reflect upon the power

he thought necessary to give himself in order to deal with these very questions of boycotting and intimidation which we are doing—as he was bound to do—our best to cope with. Again, anyone who was found out at night under suspicious circumstances could also be taken up by the police and brought before a Magistrate. But neither Lord Spencer nor the right hon. Gentleman opposite confined themselves to the exercise of the powers specially given them by Statute. I read to the House the other day, in answer to a question, a particular example which was brought before the notice of this House by the hon. and learned Member for Longford, some time in 1882, and I will do myself the honour of again reading, with the permission of the Committee, what I have already called to the attention of the House on a different occasion. In the Belfast Morning News, a Nationalist paper, there appeared the following statement on the 9th of June, 1882, with regard to the case of one Grant, a local contractor:—

“Grant had a constable by his side during working hours. When the toils of day were ended his second personality hovered about the precincts of his residence. When visiting his farm the same individual invariably was there. While even on Sundays he relaxed not his vigilance, but moved behind this unhappy gentleman while on his way to prayers.”

On the subject of this statement a question was asked by the hon. and learned Member for Longford of the then Chief Secretary for Ireland. All the then Chief Secretary thought it necessary to say was that it was quite true the police had been carefully watching the individual mentioned, but that in the public interest he declined to say on what ground they were doing so. That person was not suspected, as was stated by the hon. and learned Member for Longford, of having anything to do with the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish, but was suspected of having been concerned in a very grave conspiracy to murder, and he was never convicted, although I have myself no doubt he was guilty. I have no doubt that humane and liberty-loving Gentlemen opposite would never have had him shadowed unless they had the strongest ground of suspicion. I do not know I do them more than justice, and it is on that ground, and that ground alone, I venture to express to the Committee my confidence that probably the police on that occasion, acting under the orders of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, were not acting beyond their duty. That is a case in which on suspicion—on what hon. Gentlemen believe to be groundless suspicion—this man was shadowed with as much severity, and was as such subject to the damnable system—if that is to be the phrase—as any person shadowed during the tenure of office of the present Administration.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): At what distance did the policeman follow him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman the distance.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Was the policeman in uniform?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer even that; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will get the information he desires from his right hon. Friend sitting next to him (Sir G. Trevelyan).

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; I want you to tell me.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It happened in 1882, and though I cannot speak with certainty I think it extremely probable that the man was in uniform. It must be recollected that this was not an isolated act of the Government of Lord Spencer. I have looked through the Papers on this subject, and I say that down to the very expression "shadowing" in those records you will find—[MR. GLADSTONE: Produce them]—that the very men who now denounce us practised almost the same methods.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will, for the sake of the public interest, as well as his own character, produce the records to which he now refers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I doubt whether confidential Orders of this kind should be given to the House.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Then what right have you to state them here?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have the right that every man has when he is accused of what has been called an "abomination," to point out that his accusers, if there be guilt, are as guilty as himself.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Produce them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Before I proceed further with my historical view of the matter, there is one part of the case which I venture to brush aside. In this House and elsewhere we have heard of what is most improperly and absurdly described as the shadowing of English visitors. I suppose that what happens is this: Some gentleman, anxious to become acquainted with the Irish question, takes a tour in Ireland. He associates himself with some organiser of the Land League, or other person who is under police surveillance. He then sees the policeman following, and flatters himself that he is the object of this attention. He then finds himself wafted into unexpected importance, and, perhaps, finally he is immortalised by a question asked across the floor of this House.

THE EARL OF CAVAN (Somerset, S.): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that description to apply to three men about whom I sent to Ireland and about whom I asked a question the other day? Their luggage was searched when they landed. They could not be mistaken for anybody else, for, besides having their luggage searched, they were shadowed from the moment they landed until the moment they left the country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The noble Lord has put on a cap which was not intended for him. I know nothing about the searching of luggage to which he refers, but the three persons must surely have had a very suspicious appearance to have attracted the attention of the police so soon. I was not thinking of the noble Lord's friends, whose case I had, in fact, forgotten, but was referring to cases in which persons thought themselves the object of the special attention of the Irish Government, imagined that their presence in Ireland sent a thrill through the Irish Executive, and that special orders were sent down from Dublin Castle to see that the peace of Ireland was not disturbed by their advent. I now come to what I take to be the serious part of the charge, which I propose to deal with somewhat more fully. In order that the Committee may fully understand the peculiar necessities which have arisen in the last few years for close police surveillance, I must ask them to call to mind what took place at the Thurles and other Conventions, called together by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and some of his Colleagues towards the end of 1888. At the Thurles Convention the following resolution was passed :—

“That the names of landgrabbers, grass-grabbers, emergency men, and their supporters, as well as those who dealt with them, be sent to each branch represented at this Convention, as well as of cattle dealers and pig buyers; and that a Committee of six be appointed in each branch to carry out this Resolution.”

There is not now, and never has been, the slightest doubt as to what that Resolution pointed at. The idea was that any man who had the audacity to do what may be done with impunity in any civilised community in the world—hire a farm which was to let, and from which a man had been evicted—was to be boycotted in the farm and in the town where he went to sell his cattle, and at the fair no man was to be allowed to purchase from him. How was that to be carried out? The Committee of six pointed to the method. What were called Vigilance Committees were appointed to see that those persons who had taken evicted farms should be followed, should be “shadowed” at the markets where they attempted to sell their stock, and that in the pursuit of their lawful calling they should be impeded even to their ruin. The teaching of the hon. Member for East Mayo was fruitful in this case, as it has been in many others. Whatever I have said of the hon. Member for East Mayo, and I have had to say many things of him, and have often found myself in sharp conflict with him, I have never said he was an individual whose teaching did not bear fruit for good or evil. My only regret was that his teaching was so seldom felt for good, and was so often felt for evil. In order that Gentlemen opposite may judge of whether his influence was for good or for evil I will read what was said by the Tipperary Nationalist on November 7, 1888. That paper, giving a description of the proceedings of one of those Vigilance Committees, said—

“The Vigilance Committee successfully to the front in Clonmel . . . From early morning scouts were out in the Clonmel fair on Monday, and wherever the emergency man had his cattle the boys manifested the most practical solicitude imaginable. . . . The notorious Ned Tobin was vigilantly watched, and as a consequence he had to take back his stock. So also had another grabber in the person of Major Gobbett. With the characteristic interest which Mr. T. J. Condon, M.P., takes in the welfare of his constituents, he was present all day, trudging almost knee-deep in slush, anxious to know, you know”

—(observe the humour of the Tipperary Nationalist)—

“whether there was an improvement or declension in the price of cattle.”

That is a general account of the methods pursued by the allies of the liberty-loving Member for Mid Lothian. I will venture to give the Committee an example of the method by which this system of Nationalist shadowing was carried out, and the result which ensued. There was a man named Thomas Fitzgerald; he was poor; he occupied a small farm, and he had a large family. His whole means of livelihood depended upon his working this farm and being able to sell what the farm produced. He occupied this farm in succession to one Casey, who had been evicted [Irish cheers], being hopelessly insolvent. I do not know whether the doctrine above the Gangway opposite is the same doctrine that prevails below the Gangway—that every tenant in Ireland, solvent or insolvent, has an indefeasible title to stay in his farm as long as he pleases, whether he pays rent or not.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to quote, if he can, the statement of any Member below the Gangway to that effect?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I stated that the man had been evicted, and there were cheers from below the Gangway, which showed that hon. Members thought that it was sufficient condemnation of Fitzgerald that he dared to occupy a farm from which an insolvent tenant had been evicted. If those cheers did not mean that, they were even more meaningless than the cheers with which hon. Members usually favour us. This man Fitzgerald, who occupied the farm from which Casey had been evicted, lived for some time afterwards in perfect friendship with his neighbours. For reasons which I need not trouble the House with, this state of things did not last, and he was boycotted.

He was brought to the notice of one of these Vigilance Committees, and the wretched man, when he took his pigs to Dungarvan Fair, found that he was being shadowed by one of the vigilance men for whose appointment the hon. Member for East Mayo was directly responsible, and hon. Members above the Gangway opposite indirectly responsible. He could not sell his pigs and he had to take them back; but it was so very necessary that he should dispose of his stock that he determined to take them to the fair at Waterford, a distance of 20 miles from his farm. He started in the middle of the night in order to arrive at the market in time. The vigilance man who had been set upon his track, who was shadowing him, in fact, heard that he had started, took a car, and arrived at Waterford in time to watch his victim, when that victim should attempt to sell his pigs. Fortunately, the police had reason to believe that Power, the vigilance man who was shadowing Fitzgerald, was engaged in that task, and so Power was himself in turn shadowed. Fitzgerald was relieved from the persecution to which he had been subjected and Power was arrested, and is, I believe, at this moment in prison in default of giving bail. You have here two concurrent examples of shadowing—the shadowing by the National League and the shadowing by the police. Which do you prefer? Which is the damnable system? Is it the system by which this unhappy man was brought to the very verge of ruin for doing nothing, except what he had a perfect right to do, or is it the system by which he was protected from his persecutors?

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Is it not the fact that Fitzgerald has since surrendered the farm?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it is only too probable that a man subjected to the persecution which I have described has at last succumbed. [Cheers.] If hon. Members below the Gangway think that a subject for mutual congratulation, I should be surprised—no, I do not know that I should be surprised if their sentiments were shared by some of those who now support them above the Gangway. I may be told that this shadowing by the police is useless to stop this form of persecution. Well, look at the well-known Salford case. In that case some cattle were sent over here by a man who had taken an evicted farm on Lord Massereene's estate. The former tenant had been evicted for refusing to pay his rent and joining the Plan of Campaign. I think he was the individual who did the shadowing of the man who succeeded him. He came over to England and attempted to do here what the hon. Member for East Mayo recommends his disciples to do in Ireland, and apparently he was fool enough to rely upon the statement, made so frequently by hon. Members opposite, that the law in England is different from the law in Ireland. I think he will have a lower estimate of the legal knowledge of hon. Members opposite now than he had then, for he was promptly brought up not under the Crimes Act, and not before two removable Magistrates, but under the Common Law of England, before an English Judge and English Jury, and he and his associate in crime were subjected to a heavier sentence than even the much-abused removables would probably have passed in the sister island. One more instance only will I give of the value of this system of shadowing in protecting persons in Ireland in the legitimate discharge of their callings. There was a man named Fleming, a small farmer, who had adopted the principles and practices recommended by the hon. Member for East Mayo. He became a member of a Vigilance Committee, and he was followed by a constable in plain clothes. He was overheard stating that he was a paid agent of the National League that co-operates with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. He appealed to the County Court Judge, and the sentence of the Resident Magistrates was confirmed. If you will consider the machinery which the hon. Member for East Mayo, with the full consent of his Party above the Gangway, has set in motion in Ireland for the avowed purpose of ruining every man who takes an evicted farm—if you will notice that the machinery consists essentially in shadowing, and that its whole object is to destroy, the lawful calling of those against whom it is directed, I think the Committee will come to the conclusion not only that we are amply justified in the course which we have taken, but that every lawful means in our power should be used to put an end to this cowardly, tyrannical, criminal system. I pass from the general question of National League shadowing at fairs to the case of Tipperary and the shadowing that has gone on there. In Tipperary there was no question of land-grabbing, of agrarian quarrel between landlord and tenant, of excessive rents, of cruel administration of his estate by the owner of the soil. But some Gentlemen from below the Gangway opposite thought fit to go to this hitherto peaceful community to introduce strife which has caused more suffering and misery than have attended almost any other episode in recent Irish history. The tenants of the landlord, rural and urban, were ordered not to pay rents. When their interests were sold up, a few had the audacity to buy in; certain others had the audacity to continue to pay that which they lawfully owed. What was the consequence? Their houses were wrecked—fired into. Boycotting notices were posted about the town; explosive bombs, playfully called squibs by the hon. Member for East Mayo, were thrown against their houses or into their yards; their servants were compelled to leave; their customers were followed by vigilance men, men told off to boycott; the goods those customers had purchased were taken from them and destroyed; they themselves were threatened and subjected to outrage. I take it that none of these facts will be denied.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Every one of them.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Why did not the right hon. Gentleman submit these alleged facts to examination by a Commission as we proposed?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must beg hon. Members to abstain from these interruptions. They will have ample opportunities of replying.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The shadowing which has taken place in Tipperary is fully justified by the duty of the Government to do their best to stop this chronic intimidation. If a man in Tipperary is known to be engaged in these practices he is shadowed and rightly shadowed.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that? Does he think that it is a monstrous proceeding on the part of the Government to try to protect these unhappy victims of irresponsible tyranny? Perhaps he may say Father Humphreys was innocent of boycotting. Father Humphreys has had the courage of his convictions, and he has openly declared, without concealment and without disguise, that he, at all events, will not disavow this practice of boycotting. [Home Rule cries of "Why don't you prosecute him?"] Hon. Members apparently have not realised the fact that if a man makes a speech in favour of criminal conspiracy, or writes a letter saying that he has taken part in a criminal conspiracy, it is not legal evidence. If the ordinary legal evidence had been forthcoming that Father Humphreys had made the speeches which every one knows that he made, he would have been prosecuted. But the fact of his moral guilt is not denied by himself; and whatever surprises this Debate may hold in store for us in the way of assertion, it will not hold in store the surprise that any of Father Humphrey's friends will get up and say that he is innocent of the boycotting which has been the disgrace and the curse of Tipperary for some time past. Are we to be told that we are violating the liberty of the subject by doing our best to stop the practices of this man, whose whole business in life is to make the liberty of the subject impossible in Tipperary? A more preposterous and ridiculous action has never been done in this House than to point to him as the victim of a vindictive Government. It has not been denied that while we are accused of shadowing, the people who invented it and carried it out to a greater extent than any police in the world are those who obey the unwritten law of the National League. I was amused the other day to see a letter from a Mr. R. Holland Owen in the Macclesfield Chronicle of the 30th of May, 1890. It contains an account of the events of the Tipperary meeting, but I only allude to it for the purpose of reading the following sentence:—

"I had not made myself known up to this, and I began to feel uncomfortable, as I felt I was shadowed, but who by I did not know, so I showed my letter of introduction to a priest on the quiet, and the shadow was at once removed. The Nationalist leaders told me on the Sunday evening they know me for a stranger, and were afraid of an enemy, and had me shadowed."

They are the gentlemen who come down here, and, with the countenance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, profess themselves as the great apostles of the liberty of the subject. They are the men who say that the liberty of the subject is hopelessly interfered with by the process of shadowing, and it turns out that it is a part of their regular system, and that it only differs from the action of the police in that, while they shadow for criminal purposes, the police shadow for the sole purpose of preventing crime. I do not wish to make any attack upon hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. I have not to-night, and I never have, concealed my view of the practices by which they carry out objects which, no doubt, they think noble and patriotic. But I do not propose now to make them the subjects of any personal attack. If I were disposed to make a personal attack at all it would not be upon them, but upon right hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway. I honestly confess that I do not think that history shows any meaner or more contemptible spectacle than that of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, Members for English constituencies, who have themselves been responsible for the government of Ireland, turning round and, in concert with their former foes, doing all in their power to prevent the police from carrying out the most elementary duties of justice—the elementary duty of protecting every man in the exercise of his rights. I think sometimes that to hon. Gentlemen themselves it must occur that they play a very sorry part in this business. To the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton it must occur that, when he makes these attacks upon those who are his successors in a difficult office, they deserve some better treatment than he and his allies give them. I do not mind, and I never have minded, personal criticism and attack; but what I do mind is that the task which we have taken in hand—the vindication of the law—is deliberately hampered in the interests of a particular political combination, and by men whose traditions should have taught them a very different lesson. When I listen to speeches such as that delivered the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who came down and denounced me in the most violent terms because of what he described as the nameless abominations of which we have been guilty, I confess I thought that the ancient traditional honour of a great political Party had fallen low indeed.

(7.8.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: As the right hon. Gentleman has done me the honour to drag me into this Debate, I shall be compelled to occupy for a very short time the attention of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman closed his remarks with what I may call—though I do not think he considered it so—a personal attack. One of the peculiarities of the right hon. Gentleman is that he has got a set of definitions which he applies at his will, and any criticism of his government in Ireland is a personal attack on himself, while the loudest denunciation and the use of the most violent epithets with which the dictionary can supply him—advanced by the right hon. Gentleman without the smallest attempt at particularity or proof—is not to be considered as a personal attack, but as an outburst of honest indignation from a gentleman who is engaged in nothing more or less than a vindication of the law. The attacks of which he complains have not been for his legality, but for his illegality—for the grossly illegal acts to which he has given the direct countenance of the Government in Ireland, and for the culpable indifference with which he has tolerated the illegality of those who act under him. But I am not about to waste the time of the Committee in a general discussion of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman has cast his net very wide. It will not be his fault if this Debate does not extend out of consonance with the views of the right hon. Gentlemen at his side with regard to the speedy winding up of the business of the Session. He has thought fit to make a personal reply to a speech delivered by me on a former occasion; and in regard to that speech I need not say—for it is so much a matter of course—that he has misrepresented it. The right hon. Gentleman says that I made charges on that occasion with respect to which I ought to have made inquiry as to their foundation, or as to the countenance which they have received from former Governments; and he says that with regard to the practice of shadowing—which was described from his own side of the House in language much more violent than that in which I characterised it—I accused him of that abominable practice. I made no accusation upon my own credit or upon my own knowledge. I stood entirely upon what had been said in the Debate in the House of Commons, and I apprehend that it was impossible for any conduct to be more thoroughly Parliamentary. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) has given details of a practice under the name of shadowing, which practice, in my opinion, deserves condemnation in the severest terms that can be found to apply to it. But I do not believe that I used one single expression charging the guilt of that practice on the right hon. Gentleman. I never do make such charges upon him until he has himself adopted, avowed, and defended the abuses that we endeavour to condemn. The hon. Member for East Mayo made those charges, and the right hon. Gentleman did not reply to them. He did not disavow the practice. He did not condemn it. Thus, without holding myself personally responsible—because I did not know how far the right hon. Gentleman might be exactly acquainted with the facts—I described the practice of shadowing, such as it had been described without contradiction in this House, and such, therefore, as I was bound to take it to be, in language less strong than that which was applied to it by a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman says that, in order to avoid rhetorical misadventures, I ought to consult those who have information as to what has been done in former Administrations. The hon. Member for Mayo made known these facts to me before his statement in the House, and I did ask him if there was any precedent for such proceedings in the former Government of Ireland. He said that, to the best of his knowledge, there was not. But I know well that the spirit of Administration has long been anti-national and anti-Irish, and that there have obtained a footing in it practices which are frequently unknown to the heads of the Government in Dublin; and the right hon. Gentleman charges upon me, as Prime Minister in a former Administration, what he ought never to have charged upon me, even if I had been the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. I never make a charge of that kind until I know that the facts have been within the cognisance of the person engaged in the Irish Administration, and until I know that he has made himself responsible for it. I am sorry to say, Sir, that on this occasion the right hon. Gentleman has gone very near to making himself fully responsible for this practice—this abominable practice—which was charged against the Irish Administration in a former Debate, and with which, no doubt, I did charge the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman quotes the case of Mr. Grant, which he says deserves all the blame that has been allotted to the recent proceedings in Ireland in our late discussions. Well, Sir, with respect to the case of this man Grant, I requested the right hon. Gentleman, as he made this accusation, to produce the facts. He has given no engagement to produce the facts. I shall again request him to produce the facts. I shall again state that we have a right to the production of the facts, and I shall again show how hollow is the refuge behind which the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to shelter himself against the production of the facts and of the supports on which he relies for the imputation he thinks fit to make. We have not the facts before us. I hope my right hon. Friend near me will be able to give to the House some light upon this subject—some fuller light than we have obtained from the right hon. Gentleman; but I point out, for the present, that the essence of the charge made against the Irish Administration with respect to the shadowing at Tipperary is this—that it depended upon the fact, first of all, that the shadowing police were kept close to the persons shadowed; secondly, on the fact that the shadowing police were common police-constables, or, at any rate, constables in uniform, thus blazoning the insult in the face of the public; and, thirdly, on the fact that the police were shadowing individuals upon the mere suspicion of what the right hon. Gentleman calls boycotting. When we spoke of boycotting seven years ago we meant boycotting associated with crime. The right hon. Gentleman means boycotting entirely apart from crime.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I do not.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What I mean is this—that the acts which he has denounced and for which he shadows are acts which we contend are acts totally apart from crime. What are the resemblances so far as we know them? The Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) asks what was the distance between the police officer who watched Grant and Grant himself. The right hon. Gentleman says he does not know. I asked the right hon. Gentleman across the Table whether the police officer was in uniform. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not know, and suggested that I should ask my right hon. Friend near me. Then, with regard to the cause for which the shadowing took place, it appears from the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman himself that this man was watched—I will not say whether he was shadowed or not until I know more about it—that this man was watched because he was deemed to be guilty of a conspiracy to murder. That is the parallel the right hon. Gentleman gives for what is now being done. Relying always upon the argument of tu quoque—and I fully grant he has nothing else to rely on—that is the sort of parallel the right hon. Gentleman has established and on which he thinks to ground his charges. So much, then, for his parallelism of circumstances which I need not further elaborate. But I asked the right hon. Gentleman to produce the facts, to produce the records. What said the right hon. Gentleman? “I doubt very much whether I can produce confidential instructions.” It is extremely convenient that there should be a class of controversial papers in existence, the essential conditions of which are these—first of all that they have been made the subject of charges made publicly across the Table in the House; and, secondly, when you are challenged to produce them—“Oh, no, they cannot be produced.” This is the gallant and chivalrous conduct of the right hon. Gentleman, who sees nothing so mean and contemptible as the conduct of politicians above the gangway. Let him show what it is that is mean and contemptible in our conduct, as I will endeavour to show what is gallant and chivalrous in the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. He has quoted especially against me the contents of papers which he says he cannot produce because they are confidential. I ask whether those are the terms upon which Ministers of the Crown have ever been accustomed to defend themselves, and whether those are the terms upon which we are to submit to be lectured by the right hon. Gentleman upon honour and gallantry? All this about confidential papers was a mere subterfuge. We never asked for the production of confidential papers. I want the production of facts, and the right hon. Gentleman having made a charge in this House that we are guilty of, that we allowed, proceedings analogous to those which a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman described as being “damnable,” let the right hon. Gentleman produce the record of the facts. He shall not ride off upon the confidential character of instructions. There is no question about instructions. The question is, What has actually been done? I must ask the right hon. Gentleman’s attention to this. I ask him for no instructions. He has made a charge in this House as to what was done. I ask him, I request him, I demand from him—[Laughter from below the Ministerial Gangway.] An hon. Member makes my demand a subject for indecent laughter. The hon. Gentleman deserves no notice from me, but if he thinks fit to defend his conduct, he can rise and do so in this House. The right hon. Gentleman now understands, I hope, what I am about. He has made an accusation against me. I ask, and I demand, that he shall produce the facts on which it rests. Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not quite sure that I do. What exactly occurred was this. The right hon. Gentleman stated this was a new practice.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say so.

MR. DILLON: I said so; and so it is.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member for Mayo said it was a new practice. I pointed out from existing Parliamentary records that a precisely parallel case—[No, no!] from the Opposition—in my opinion, at all events, a precisely parallel case—occurred before. These facts were alleged by the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), and they were not denied by the Minister of the Crown responsible for the government of Ireland. I do not know what more facts can be asked for.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What the right hon. Gentleman stated was simply an extract from a newspaper. The answer given at the time by my right hon. Friend near me (Sir G. Trevelyan) did not give, and did not purport to give, the exact facts of the case. What I demand of the right hon. Gentleman now is that he shall give a statement from the official records of the Department of the circumstances which occurred and which he made the foundation of his charge. There is nothing in this House by which we can judge of the circumstances of this case. A statement in a newspaper does not help us to judge how far it was a parallel case. I want the police accounts of what the right hon. Gentleman himself describes as a most important police proceeding, not less abominable, if abominable either of them be, than the proceedings that have lately occurred.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not now understand what the right hon. Gentleman wants more than he has got. He is not content with my account taken from a Nationalist newspaper—the Belfast Morning News—as to what occurred. I was, perhaps, in error in reading from a newspaper. I will, therefore, now read to the Committee what actually took place in the House:—

“Mr. Healy asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention had been called to a statement in the Belfast Morning News of June 9 to the effect that the police at Castleblayney have for some days past been perpetually watching a local contractor; that a constable remains at his side during his working hours, and afterwards hovers about his residence; and if he can state the object of this surveillance, and by whom, and for what object it has been directed?”

“Mr. Trevelyan: Sir, it is quite true that the police have been carefully watching the person referred to; but I must decline in the public interest to say upon what grounds they are doing so.”

Mr. A. J. Balfour

(7.28.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgton): It is very easy for hon. Gentlemen to cheer, but they will not cheer, I think, when they have heard what I have got to say. I thought from the first moment of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that he had a very poor case indeed. We had a definite case before us—that of a policeman in full uniform walking by the side of a private citizen, and another policeman in full uniform walking almost upon the heels of the man, following him in the marketplace, following him in company, never allowing a word of his to go unheard, and subjecting him to the greatest temptation to take the law into his own hands. What is the parallel case? The right hon. Gentleman had to defend that, and now he has to defend the statement he made the other day, which, for the first time, I have now the opportunity of answering, that these things were constantly done in our day. The right hon. Gentleman took advantage of the enormous privilege a Minister has in replying to questions, and made a statement I will now proceed to controvert. He made a statement in regard to which he was mistaken. The right hon. Gentleman, and those who listened to him, knew perfectly well that the forms of the House prevented a denial being given at the time; yet they and the Conservative Press have gone on repeating the statement that the most serious charges have been proved against the Liberal Government, and especially against myself. This modern shadowing is a definite thing; it is not the same thing as watching a suspected criminal; it is not the same thing as is known in every civilised country of following a man who is suspected of murderous or dangerous intentions, seeing that he does not commit those actions, keeping an eye upon him. It is as different as the thumbscrew and the handcuff. In one case it is a precaution against crime; in the other, it is the persecution of a supposed criminal, or a man whom the Government determine to regard as such. This species of persecution is perfectly new under the present Government. I have referred to the legal advisers of the Irish Government under the right hon. Member for Newcastle and myself, and the distinguished lawyer who was Solicitor General, and afterwards Attorney General for Ireland, writes—

"I did not, while I was in office, know or hear of this system of shadowing now practised. The MacDermot's recollection is the same. It seems to be a question of degree. No doubt men were watched in our time: but they were not deliberately dogged as they are now—a system which seems more likely to annoy the individual followed than to prevent crime."

What is the case now? A parish priest, Father Kennedy, whose worst crime is that he twice attended meetings of a branch of the National League which the Government had suppressed, is accompanied by policemen in uniform, one at his side, and one close behind him. Take an instance of the watching done by the Liberal Government. In 1882 Dublin was in a terrible state. There had been six or eight dreadful political murders committed. It was known that murderers were abroad in great numbers; it was known by the Government who the murderers were; and what is more, it was known they were premeditating other murders; and there were a series of—thank God, not murders—but attacks made, of which that on Mr. Field will be remembered. We considered it our duty to have a watch kept upon these murderers, or would-be-murderers, and among these so watched was Carey, who will be remembered in connection with the Phoenix Park murders. Carey was watched in such a manner that, though he perceived it, the policeman who followed him was under the impression that Carey did not know he was watched, for I well remember an anecdote in this connection. The Dublin Exhibition was being held at the time, and Carey went to visit it. When he came to the turnstile he paid for himself, and he paid, he said, "for the man who was following him," much disconcerting the policeman, who up to then had been under the impression that Carey did not know he was being watched. The contrast between this mode of watching and the way in which Father Humphreys is dogged by the police, is a contrast everyone can understand. I have asked Irish Members whom I have been able to communicate with, the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and the hon. Member for North Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly), and others, whether, under the Liberal Government, they suffered from this method of shadowing, and they unanimously say it is new to this Government. Similar testimony is given by a newspaper correspondent, who writes in a spirit of great hostility to the Government to which I belonged—the Irish correspondent of the Manchester Guardian—who says that, irritating as was the administration of Sir G. Trevelyan, of which he had full knowledge down to the most minute particulars, it had nothing in common with the despotic encroachment on the liberty of the subject which is now being practised. Thus a writer who is not at all prejudiced in my favour supports the views of our legal advisers and the statements of Irish Members. Against this body of evidence the Government have no official facts to quote. The new method is one of gross personal insult, from which a man cannot free himself. If he commits a technical assault, he is brought before a Resident Magistrate and charged with assaulting a constable in the execution of his duty, and he will get a month's imprisonment, against which sentence there is no appeal. If he brings an action against the constable, everything will be done that a powerful Government can do to cause delay, to prevent damages being obtained, and to hinder the highest Courts from pronouncing against the system. This is the Police Vote, and I will now say a few words on police administration generally. Undoubtedly, the police in Ireland are demoralised by the peculiarities of the present system of administration; and, speaking generally, there are three circumstances which are adverse to good relations between the police and the people. One is the intense centralisation, which renders the Force very costly. In Scotland there are 4,000 police, who cost in pay and pensions £400,000. In Ireland, with only a million more of population, the police number 14,000, and their pay and pensions cost £1,600,000 a year. That is not all. The effect of centralising administration of the police in Ireland is an economical lesson for us in England; it makes reduction of expenditure impossible. In local administration you have the advantage that the authorities can apportion the pay to the rate of wages ruling in the district. In Scotland the rate of police pay differs from 27s. to 21s. a week; in Ireland, whether a constable is employed among the highly paid artisans of Belfast, or in the remote parts of Kerry, his pay and pension is the same. The despotic Military Police Force of Ireland is decidedly expensive as compared with other Police Forces. Then the Irish Police are in bad relations with the people on account of the teaching the police receive from the Government. They are taught to despise the public feeling of their countrymen, and to disregard the right to free speech, because one of the crimes for which a man is shadowed is that he is suspected of having attended a meeting of a suppressed branch of the League. They are also taught to show disrespect to the priests, the very men who can bring some influence other than official influence to bear upon their own relations with the people. Thirdly, they are taught to look down upon Members of Parliament. The Constabulary have been taught to regard with disrespect the representatives of five-sixths of their countrymen. They have carried this to the extent of attempting the arrest of an Irish Member at the door of this House; and though an important Committee drawn from both sides declared this an infringement of privilege, the Government used its majority outside the Committee to burk the Report. The police have been taught to despise the representatives of their country in Parliament—taught to regard their statements as unworthy of credence, and a Force intended to be a neutral body has become the Force of a partisan minority. These assaults upon the freedom of Irishmen arise from the fact that Irishmen have no political power. As Fox once pointed out, "Civil liberty can have no security without political power," and for practical purposes Ireland has hitherto had no political power, being outvoted in this House, and having no representative whatever in the Upper House. For this latest attack on the liberty of individual Irishmen the Government have not even the miserable excuse of precedent. This form of shadowing they did not find. They invented it. It has arisen with the régime of the present Government. With that régime it will die.

regard to the information which I asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to produce, and I may be allowed this opportunity to explain. I demanded from the right hon. Gentleman certain information, and I wish to withdraw the word "demand," which, though I may be entitled to use it, may sound, perhaps, somewhat dictatorial. I will substitute the word "request," and I now beg to request the right hon. Gentleman to obtain information in regard to the case of Grant on three points—first, whether the watching policeman was in plain clothes or in uniform; secondly, at what distance, so far as is known, did the policeman watching stand from the person watched; and, thirdly, whether his presence was purposely made known to the person watched? If the right hon. Gentleman will have the goodness to ascertain these things, so far as he can, he will do something to clear up the matter.

(7.50.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): The objections we maintain to this Constabulary Vote have not been met; there is no pretence of answering our arguments. I have said on previous occasions it is no answer to indulge in mere tu quoque statements. I do not believe in the accuracy of these statements, but even assuming them to be true, they are wholly irrelevant material, and no answer. When the right hon. Gentleman began his speech by saying that statements made from this side had been answered by himself or his predecessors, he entirely forgets that the only answer given before is one we cannot, will not accept, that somebody else was just as bad. You ask us now, in 1890, for very heavy Estimates on account of the Irish police, and if you asked us for the Vote under similar circumstances to those upon which you ask the English Vote, I should not be prepared to deny that you are entitled to every penny of it. But our complaint is that this money is not used for the purpose for which you ask it. Exception is taken to this Vote because the Irish police, instead of being used, as in England, for the purpose of keeping the peace and protecting the people, are planted like an alien army amongst them. It is all very well for you to talk of boycotting and intimidation; we know that you have Ireland in a state approaching that of civil war, and that when you boast of peace and order there you say the thing which is not. Instead of being the guardians of peace and order, your police have become the tools of tyranny. You have succeeded in producing a condition of things which year by year becomes worse. I noticed it was but in a half-hearted way—until he had lashed himself into indignation—that the right hon. Gentleman addressed himself to the defence of his Administration; and this gave encouragement to those of us who have a hope that the right hon. Gentleman will some day get better light and come to be a good Home Ruler. There was something very different in the speech to-night from the earnest, powerful flow of eloquence to which the right hon. Gentleman has long accustomed us, and as we saw him try to make headway our hope of better things from him grew stronger. But the facts remain. I, with other English Members, have been an eye-witness to the brutal proceedings of the Irish police. We have seen the people beaten by the police without provocation or justification. Those assaults have been made upon Members of this House, who have made their complaints here. But you use the police to prevent inquiry. You give us police statements; but you will not call the witnesses. When we complain of what we have seen—some of us of what we have felt—you meet us with statements of witnesses whose names you will not give, whose evidence you will not submit to the test of examination. In vain we heap up facts; we get no answer, and I suppose we must bear it while your system of administration becomes more demoralising and humiliating—I will not say more despised, for that is scarcely possible. The Irish people suffer under the worst possible form of despotism, a constitutional despotism, and we can only go on protesting against a state of things which, though denied, is known to exist. I assume it is right for these policemen to watch, and to follow persons who they believe are going to be guilty of crime. But I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the energies of the police are being devoted only to the detection and punishment of crime such as is of a political character. Now, the attack on this Constabulary Vote is of a political nature.

The Force is being used for the maintenance of Her Majesty's Government, and not for the maintenance of public peace. It is the Government who are determined to break the peace, rather than leave their seats on that Bench. I maintain that the money granted under this Vote is not honestly appropriated. It is devoted to political purposes. It is used for hindering Irishmen from expressing their opinions. It is used in order to try to persuade the people that you have put down the National League. It constitutes the sinews of war, and the war is a civil one between the Irish people and Her Majesty's Government. We protest against your using for your own purposes a Force employed for National purposes. It is all hypocrisy to pretend that this thing, which you call a Constabulary Vote, is really a Vote in the interests of peace and order. There will be peace and order if you clear this Force out of Ireland. I can give instances in which, in the absence of the police, the largest assemblages of Irishmen for political purposes have passed off without the slightest disturbance. That has taken place constantly, and if you would only allow the Irish people, as you did in Limerick the other day, when I was there, the power of assembling together—a power which you dare not deny to the people in London—for the purpose of maintaining their political opinions, the work of the police would be gone at once, and a great deal more than one-half of this expenditure would be saved. But, instead of that, you try to suppress these meetings. You use your police for the purpose of watching those who attend them. At one meeting in Arthurstown there were actually more policemen than grown-up civilians present. Had the police been absent there would have been perfect peace and order. There would have been no attempt to create a disturbance; but, in consequence of the presence of the police, there were broken heads and broken musical instruments. No doubt, I shall be told that we have heard these things over and over again; but I maintain that it is necessary to make these statements in the place in which, if they are untrue, they will be contradicted. They are never contradicted, and we are quite willing to leave the people to draw their own conclusions from that fact. I attended an enormous meeting which was held in Limerick recently. There were probably 60,000 persons present—persons from a neighbourhood which the Government had proclaimed because they said it was disorderly and dangerous. Yet there was no disturbance, and why? Because there were no policemen present. The soldiers and the police had been withdrawn, and if you would only on other occasions trust Irishmen to conduct themselves with decency and propriety, I say there would be perfect peace, perfect order, and perfect quiet. But you do not want to see that. You will not save the public money and time, and it is because you have taken up that attitude that we oppose this Vote. If you will only do justice to Ireland, and the people who live there, you may get rid of this enormous Constabulary Force. You have only to believe that the people are—as we are always telling you they are—law-abiding citizens.

*(8.10.) MR. J. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I intend to give a few facts as to the manner in which the police are used in Ireland by the Chief Secretary. Speaking of the Clanricarde estate I find the rental is something like £1,900 a year, and within the past four years the cost to the Government of evictions on that estate has been something about £10,000, or more than the rental of the estate. The police in the locality have been increased from 15 to 60. The Force has not been increased for the purpose of detecting crime or preventing outrages, or breaches of the peace. Within the past four years there has not been one serious outrage committed in the locality; and as for the peace of the locality, I venture to say that half a dozen policemen could have protected the peace. This extra force has been brought into the district to act as the servant of the landlords, who are the friends of the present Government. Now, how have they been employed? In October, 1887, on the night of the famous midnight meeting at Woodford, the police for their own reasons waited until the excitement was at its height, namely, just as the Member for North-East Cork and his English friends arrived in the town, before they served a proclamation on the promoters of the meeting. Their object, I contend, was to create a breach of the peace. No doubt when the proclamation was served there was some little friction between the police and the people for a little while, but I, together with other gentlemen, interfered, with the result that the friction caused by the conduct of the police ceased there and then, and we received the thanks of the District Inspector of Police for our action. But, strange to say, eight weeks after that, without the slightest intimation, eight or ten of us were arrested, brought to the police barracks, let out on bail, summoned before two Removables, and sent to herd with thieves and pickpockets in Galway Gaol. On the same occasion Mr. Kerry was arrested and charged with taking part in an illegal assembly. The only evidence against him was that of a constable who looked in through the window of Mr. Keary's house and saw Mr. Keary. There was no evidence that Mr. Keary took the slightest part in that meeting, or that he was outside his own door that night; yet he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment. In December, 1887, Mr. Boland, Mr. Reilly, and I went to Loughrea to meet Mr. Egan, whom Mr. Boland and myself had left behind us in Galway Gaol. The fact of a man being singled out by the Chief Secretary as a criminal is sufficient in itself to have him honoured by the people of Ireland. Mr. Egan was accordingly met by a large number of people, and was brought home in triumph. At Mr. Egan's request I addressed a few observations to the people. I was told by one of the police that stones had been thrown at them, and at the commencement of my remarks I stood up on a car, and, in the strongest language I could command, condemned the stone throwing that had taken place; the result was that there was not another single stone thrown. Both my friends, Mr. Boland and Mr. Reilly, remained on the car while I was speaking. On the night of the 12th January following, I was leaving a relative's house, at about 9 o'clock at night, when I was suddenly arrested by two policemen. I asked for, but was denied, the privilege of sending any message to my family, and it was only by shouting to a passer-by that I got the information conveyed to them. Accordingly, my brother, a curate in the town, and my brother-in-law, came to the barracks to see me, but they were not allowed to. A few minutes later Mr. Boland was brought in in custody, having been dragged from off a sick bed. We were point blank denied a cup of tea, and were kept sitting on a form till 9 o'clock the next morning, when we were taken a distance of four miles, brought before two Removable Magistrates, admitted to bail, and left to make our way home as best we could. Although Mr. Reilly sat on the car with Mr. Boland at the time I was speaking, he was not interfered with, but Mr. Boland, who did not take any part in the meeting, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. That is the kind of treatment to which we are subjected in Ireland. The real wonder is that with what we have to suffer we are so quiet and peaceable. It is not the Chief Secretary and police who are to be thanked for that quietness and submission, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I have other illustrations to give. Four men, Messrs. Lynan, Morrissey, and two others, were summoned and sentenced to a month's imprisonment for intimidating a man named James Mitchell, and ordered to find bail at the end of the time to be of good behaviour for four months more, although Mitchell himself positively swore that he knew none of the defendants, and had not been intimidated by any of them. I desire next to show that collusion exists between the Government and the landlord. There is a head constable who has been going about the parish of Portumna with a list obtained from the agent of Lord Clanricarde, and he has been saying to the tenants, "Here is the list of your neighbours who have paid their rent. Why not go and do likewise? If you do not you will find by-and-by that all the other tenants have paid their rents, and you will be left in the lurch." Now, if any hon. Member on this side of the House had stood up at a public meeting in Ireland and named a single tenant as having paid his rent he would as sure as fate be given six months on a plank bed. The next case to which I wish to refer also occurred in my neighbourhood. It is that on an estate, the rental of which is about £1,100 a year, while the cost of it to the Government for police to assist the landlord in collecting his rack-rents is £1,607 a year. Mr. Lewis, the owner of the estate, supplies forage for the horses used by the police, so that if Mr. Lewis is not making a profit out of his land, he is, at all events, making a handsome profit out of the Government for forage. In the harvest of 1888 I find that these policemen arrested a little girl, 13 years of age, for pulling a few turnips on her father's land. She was taken first to the landlord's house, and from thence before a Local Magistrate four miles distant. She was ordered to be released about 8 o'clock at night, and allowed to get home as best she could. The tenants recently held a meeting on this very estate to discuss a document to which there were 25 forged signatures of tenants—I do not know whether the forgery emanated from the Times office or some other Government Office—who asked the interference of the Archbishop in reference to a settlement on the estate. The Archbishop wrote to the signatories, with the result that he found that none of them knew anything whatever about the matter, and they publicly declared that the document was a forgery. The meeting had been announced publicly, and the police, instead of assisting in detecting the forgers, charged down upon the people and batoned them. It was manifest that the police were not in the neighbourhood for the protection of the people, and I have failed to see a single instance in which they have detected crime. With 60 police in the locality, and, except when employed at evictions, having scarcely any duty to perform, they can be frequently seen drunk. At a not very long distant from the town two policemen were found lying drunk upon the road. One was minus his rifle; the other had his side arms. They were taken to barracks, and an investigation was made. Search was made for the rifle, but unsuccessfully. At length the Sergeant came to my house, and requested me to find the rifle for him. I believe the rifle is to be found still; at any rate, I have not heard anything about it, nor do I know that the police have found it. I believe the police are employed to assist the landlords to collect their rack-rents, and if there is any hesitancy about believing that statement I will read the following letter, dated from the seat of Sir Henry Burke, January 13th. Note how it is addressed:—

"Roche.—I think my letter to Carey explains what I mean, that if Sir Henry Burke's rents are paid at 4s. in the £1 the police tax will be removed for the future."

What explanation will the right hon. Gentleman give of that? Although there has not been the slightest friction between Sir Henry Burke and his tenants, the cost of extra police to the district has been 6s. in the £1, not one single penny of which has been levied off the Lewis Estate, nor from off the Clancricarde Estate, except a little corner of it from which the people are not yet driven. The unfortunate people of Woodford, between whom and their landlord there has not been the least friction, have been compelled to pay 6s. in the £1. The facts which I have stated ought to command the attention of the British people, and to lead to the amelioration of the condition of the people of Ireland, while those who are responsible for this tyranny should be driven to the obscurity from which they should never have been allowed to emerge.

(9.11.) MR. W. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary commenced his speech by saying that he had nothing new to reply to. He said that the complaints that were embodied in the speeches delivered before he rose were old complaints that he had replied to over and over again. He waited until the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham had finished his speech, he then waited until two Irish Members had spoken, and though several other Irish Members—myself amongst the number—rose to continue the Debate, and make other charges against the police, instead of giving way to those whom he might reasonably have imagined had complaints to make he insisted on delivering his own speech, which he commenced by saying he had little to reply to. I think the right hon. Gentleman would have been better advised if he had postponed his speech and notes of triumph until he had heard more speeches from this side of the House, and found himself in a position to judge whether there were really any new complaints to make or not. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division did not by any means confine his indictment of the police to the matter of shadowing. He made a great many other complaints, and stated a great many other grievances, in connection with the police in Ireland, which the right hon. Gentleman completely ignored. He ignored every complaint with the single exception of that of shadowing, and he endeavoured to answer the case made against the police on that ground by declaring that a similar system had been carried on in Ireland under the administration of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. The Chief Secretary did not attempt to support that assertion by a single particle of proof. Every Member who has had experience of the practice of Government in Ireland for the last 10 years will agree with the statement made by the Member for East Mayo that shadowing or dogging the footsteps of those against whom no crime can be proved is a totally new practice, and that, whatever the right hon. Gentleman may say, this system of shadowing will be always associated with his name and term of office. Now, I do not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman in the arguments he used in support of shadowing. He declared that it was practised by the organisers of the National League. To begin with, I say that that statement is absolutely without foundation, and I think it is monstrous that the right hon. Gentleman should come down here and solemnly charge the Irish National League with practising a system of shadowing in Ireland, without being able to prove a single case where shadowing has really been practised by anybody save the police. The right hon. Gentleman then attempted to arouse the sympathies of his followers by giving a description of the persons who have been shadowed by the police. He said that only those persons had been shadowed who had been engaged in preventing law-abiding citizens from pursuing their lawful callings, and doing what the law of the land entitled them to do. He gave us the case of the man Fitzgerald, in the neighbourhood of Dungarvan, in the county of Waterford, and he drew a pitiful picture of this man, who had taken an evicted farm, who was not allowed to sell his stock. Yes, but the right hon. Gentleman did not tell the House that the man Fitzgerald, being in possession of that farm, was actually in possession of property which did not belong to him, but to the previous tenant, who had been unjustly evicted, and thrown on the roadside by the landlord. No one can allege for a moment that a man would be interfered with in the slightest degree who occupied a farm in a legitimate manner. But in Ireland a system has grown up which is called land grabbing, which has been proved to be the most disastrous system which has ever afflicted Ireland or the Irish people. It means that when people have been evicted—as they are every day—their property in the land is practically confiscated, and that the man who goes in and takes an evicted farm is, in the opinion of the great majority of the Irish people, in possession of property which does not belong to him. The right hon. Gentleman objects to boycotting land-grabbers. What does he want? No matter how slight his acquaintance with Irish history may be, he must know that these difficulties have always existed in Ireland, so long as evictions have been carried out by the landlords. In one way and another the sense of Ireland is against people taking evicted farms. The right hon. Gentleman objects to boycotting. But as long as the people have grievances they must protest against them, and as long as they are assailed they must protect themselves. The advice of the Irish Members is that it is much better for the people to protect themselves by combination than by resorting to the old methods of outrage and murder, which, under the auspices of the National League, have completely died away, so that Ireland is now freer from crime than England, Scotland, or any other country in Europe. The right hon. Gentleman went on to give us an elaborate account of the circumstances that prevailed in New Tipperary. He said that people had been ordered not to pay their rent, and that people who had shown a disposition to come to terms with their landlords had had their houses wrecked. I will not enter into that more than to say that the statements of the right hon. Gentleman on that head were absolutely misleading, and without foundation, and I have no doubt that when some of my hon. Friends who are acquainted with the circumstances of the struggle in New Tipperary come to address the House they will be able to put a different complexion on the whole case to that sought to be put upon it by the right hon. Gentleman. When the subject is properly gone into it will be found that the invasion of right and acts of illegality are not on the part of the people, but on the part of the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire (Mr. Smith-Barry) himself, who wantonly went down to Cork and interfered to prevent a settlement on an estate with which he had previously had no connection whatever. But now the Chief Secretary would have us believe that the only people who have been shadowed in Ireland have been those engaged in what he called shadowing boycotted men in Ireland. Why, Sir, that is completely begging the whole question. Some of the most gross cases of shadowing have been in regard to people who have had no connection with boycotting or with the land in any degree. I will refer to one case mentioned by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division in his opening statement—the case of Father Brown, of County Wexford. It was never alleged that he had been engaged in a boycotting transaction, or that he had not done everything he could to prevent a breach of the peace in his district. The Government considered that he was guilty of some great conspiracy, and brought down hundreds of soldiers and police, and put in operation all the varied machinery at their disposal under the Coercion Act. But they were unable to find him guilty of crime, so they dogged his footsteps, and even, on one occasion, insisted upon following him into a house where an unfortunate woman was at death's door, and they would not let him alone though he protested he was there to administer the last rites to the woman who was dying. It was not until I raised a question in this House with reference to this priest, who is respected throughout the whole country, that the system of shadowing from which he suffered was discontinued. And yet in his speech the right hon. Gentleman had not one word to say as to cases of that kind. He had not a word to say in the case of Father Humphreys, who has been shadowed; and I fully expected he would have said something about the case of shadowing I brought under his notice the other day. A lady from New Zealand—a Protestant and an Anti-Nationalist—was shadowed in my constituency. I drew attention to the matter, the Chief Secretary denied that the lady had been watched, and the lady herself wrote a letter declaring that the allegation was true, and that the conduct of the police had been abominable. But shadowing is not the only thing we have got against the police in Ireland. We charge against them that instead of being an impartial Police Force, such as you have in this country, or such as any civilised country possesses, the Force is used almost exclusively in the interests of the landlords. If the landlords had not found that the Constabulary were at their beck and call to carry out evictions, they would in nine cases out of 10 have come to terms with their tenants. It is the easiest thing in Ireland to clear a whole townland. In this country if a landlord has a quarrel with his tenant, and wants to evict him, he would find it very difficult to get at short notice a fully-equipped force of men to march to a given part of the country and help him to turn out the inhabitants from their houses, but in Ireland a landlord who wishes to do this—to pull down houses and make grazing farms—has the means ready to his hand. The police of Ireland are really in the hands of the landlords. It is a monstrous thing that the taxpayers of this country should be called upon, year after year, to pay £1,500,000 to support a body of men, one of whose chief occupations is the carrying out of the harsh and cruel evictions of which we read day after day. Another chief occupation of the police is the suppression of public meetings. They are never engaged in hunting down real crime. When murders occur in Ireland, and happily they occur much more seldom in Ireland than in this and other countries, but when they do, the police are the very worst people in the world to detect the criminals. In Kerry, where moonlighting has, unfortunately, taken place, the police have signally failed to detect the criminals. But when a public meeting is to be prevented, you find, as in the case of Tipperary and Cashel meetings, hundreds and hundreds of police present, for the purpose of charging in upon the people, dispersing them at the point of the bayonet, or breaking their heads with batons, preventing Members of Parliament addressing their constituents, shadowing and hunting them as if they were the commonest criminals. These are the duties which take up almost the whole time of the police in Ireland, and it is for this reason that, year after year, the Irish Members, who are as anxious as any English or Scotch Members to see an adequate and proper Police Force in Ireland, come here, and, in the interest of justice, protest against this large sum of money being annually spent in support of an armed Force who fulfil the duties I have described. What is our chief complaint in connection with the police against the Government? It is that, no matter what the police may do, we never can get them censured by the Government. Certainly, in the case of the hon. Member for Spalding (Mr. Halley Stewart), a policeman was punished. The hon. Member went to Tipperary and was shadowed. A lot of constables were told off to drive behind the waggonette in which the hon. Member was seated, and, when driving home at night, the police behaved in a most disgraceful and disorderly manner. Several of them got blind drunk and used insulting language towards some ladies who formed part of the party. For very shame, as an English Member of Parliament was concerned—it was not a matter of insulting half-a-dozen Parnellite Members—the Government reduced one of the police sergeants to the ranks and censured another constable. That is absolutely the only case, as far as my knowledge goes, in which we have alleged anything against the police, and in which the Government have done anything except back up the police through thick and thin. Hon. Members are in the habit of laughing when Mitchelstown is mentioned, but a great many things have occurred, as heart-rending and unjustifiable as the Mitchelstown affair. Take the case of the murder by the police of the boy Hepburn in Tipperary. Not a single policeman had been injured. There was no danger to life or property, but the officer, in panic, or deliberately, ordered his men to fire a volley down a narrow street, with the result that Hepburn, a boy of 14 years, was killed. A Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against the police, but not a man of them was proceeded against by the Government. When we ask for an inquiry into the conduct of the police on that occasion, the Chief Secretary refuses an inquiry. The Attorney General for Ireland backs up the Chief Secretary. What are we to think here? We can only think that the Chief Secretary and the officials in Dublin Castle know that the conduct of the police was unjustifiable, and that they murdered the boy. Why are they afraid to give us an impartial inquiry, which, before the whole world, would set the matter at rest, and decide whether we or the Chief Secretary are right in the view we take? I want to refer to another breach of conduct of the police in Ireland. The police have been constantly set by the Government to perform the duties of shorthand notetakers. There are a few men in the Force who are professional shorthand writers, but outside of these men the Government have extensively employed common constables to report speeches. Some time ago I had the advantage of being prosecuted by the right hon. Gentleman on the ridiculous charge of conspiracy. The right hon. Gentleman got his usual conviction, but he has never had the pluck to follow it up by sending me to prison. At the trial a policeman produced a note-book, and in the most glib manner read my speech, sentence by sentence, without a single inaccuracy. My counsel, in order to test the capacity of the constable to take shorthand notes, read out deliberately, much more slowly than it is customary to speak at a public meeting, half a column of a speech or a leading article, and asked the constable to take it down in shorthand. After he had taken it down he was required to retire and to transcribe his notes. In the course of two hours he returned to Court, and was asked by Counsel, "Well, have you written out the Report you took in shorthand of what I read?" "No, Sir." "And why?" "I was not able to do it, Sir."—"And you made no attempt?" "No, Sir; I could not do it." And yet this miserable wretch evidently thought that by swearing against me he might get some promotion and favour at the hands of the authorities. All over Ireland it has been proved that so demoralised have the police become, so utterly are they lost to a sense of shame, so great is the system of bribery, and egging them on to commit injustice against their fellow-countrymen, that they are guilty of the grossest perjury. Do the right hon. Gentleman and the officials in Dublin Castle take any notice of this conduct? Certainly not. I have known men convicted of perjury, and seen them two or three days afterwards with their notebooks in their hands, taking down speeches which might be used at some subsequent trial. If for no other reason than the perjury of these men we are entitled to protest as strongly as we can against this Vote. In this country the police are employed for the purpose of promoting law and order, but, speaking from experience, I fearlessly assert I have never known a single occasion in Ireland on which a large Police Force has been present, when their presence did not imperil in the greatest possible manner the public peace. A short time ago I was announced to address a public meeting in Wexford. The meeting was to be at night, and the District Inspector came to me and said, "Mr. Redmond, I must have some policemen here. I am greatly afraid there will be a collision, the people are so excited. What do you think we ought to do to keep the public peace?" I was glad to be accosted in that spirit, and I replied, "If you will remove the police from the streets and confine them to barracks, I will guarantee there will be no breach of the peace." I added that he and another policeman might come to the platform and see and hear everything that went on. He acted on my suggestion; 4,000 people attended a night meeting, but there was not the slightest mishap of any kind. It was generally remarked that on other occasions, when the authorities insisted upon having the police present, the results were very different. Under these circumstances, we are entitled to demand that some change should be made. It will not do for the right hon. Gentleman, in a sneering and insolent way towards Members of this House, to impute, what he has not the courage to say openly, that we are in favour of disorder, that we are less anxious than he is to see proper law, and real and true order properly respected. He knows it is the merest absurdity for him to say that 85 Members are so lost to every sense of right and justice that they deliberately pursue a line of conduct which they know to be wrong. We know that the right hon. Gentleman's view is not the view taken by the peoples of England and Scotland. We have confidence that when those peoples get the chance they will declare that the lawfully elected Representatives of Ireland sitting on these Benches are far more desirous to see law and order promoted in Ireland than the right hon. Gentleman, with his imprisonments, shadowing, boycotting, proclamations, and all that miserable machinery which has been tried so often, and failed so often, and which no Government, even a much stronger Government than the present, would attempt to put in force, for a single week, against the people of England or Scotland.

(9.50.) Mr. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I cannot congratulate the other side of the House on the interest they seem to take in this matter. I suppose they consider that the short and smart speech of the Chief Secretary meets the case. I see the Attorney General for Ireland quietly taking a nap, and the Under Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant in an attitude that is anything but one of interest in the discussion that is going on. The Chief Secretary thinks that when he comes here and gives utterance to an official falsehood, supplied to him from Dublin Castle or by some of the implicated parties, the case is met. We will be satisfied with nothing of the kind. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman affects to despise certain right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, but, at the same time, he offers them the sincerest form of flattery by saying in reply to the accusations that are made against him, "You have done likewise, and I am following your example." The only example he can find is that which he finds in the columns of the Belfast Morning News. The right hon. Gentleman says that the prisoners released in 1881 and 1882 were warned to be of good behaviour. I am one of those who at that time, in the language of the

Chief Secretary, was "let loose upon the land." I was not warned, and I never met one of the thousands of my fellow-prisoners who was, nor have I ever met a suspect who was shadowed after the manner in which my constituents are being shadowed now. As the right hon. Gentleman says, what we want an explanation of is the illegalities of the Government and the police. These illegalities the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) calls the elementary duties of the police. I shall have to trouble the Committee with the narration of a few of these illegalities—a few of these elementary duties of the police. The first case I shall refer to is that of Father Kennedy. That rev. gentleman has been persecuted for years. He has been imprisoned more than once, and he is also, I will admit, actively engaged in all the movements of a political character that interest his congregation and parishioners. Was it the elementary duty of the police to go to the house of Father Kennedy, and insist upon entering it, on the ground, as the policeman stated, that there was a National League meeting being held there? Father Kennedy said to the police: "You have no grounds whatever for presuming any such thing, and you have no right to invade my private grounds in this way." The sergeant said insolently to the priest: "I will force my way into your very bedroom." The priest having advised the people to go home, they dispersed, and afterwards, when the case was being tried in a superior Court in Dublin a few days ago, the Judge emphatically denied that the police had any inquisitorial rights under the Act of Parliament. The Crown Prosecutor (Mr. Murphy) suggested that the police had inquired of Father Kennedy the character of the meeting, and had been refused the information. And what was the language used by the Judge? "And quite right," retorted the Chief Baron. "He had no authority to ask such a question, and, under the same circumstances, I would refuse to answer it myself." That language of the Chief Baron directly contradicts the statement officially made from the Treasury Bench in reply to the statements made from this side of the House. We are told, whenever we complain that our constituents are being badly treated, that we have a remedy in a Court of Law. Father Kennedy got a verdict with damages to the extent of £105 and costs. What is the result? That yesterday, or the day before, a notice of appeal was given against the decision of the Chief Baron. It is an insult, therefore, to the intelligence of the people to make these statements day after day. Take another case of a similar character in Cashel, about which I asked the Chief Secretary a question. There a man was assaulted by the police, and he had the temerity to bring his assailant into the Court. The man, O'Brien, who was assaulted, was a retired soldier, belonging to the first-class Army Reserve. The Chief Secretary, in one of his replies, said that was no guarantee of character. At the same time, I trust that Her Majesty's soldiers know how to conduct themselves, and that the discipline which they undergo in the Army is calculated to make them good citizens. A blackthorn stick was broken over O'Brien's head and arm. He swore to the facts of the case, and the constable, Martin Kelly, was asked questions. Well, the Chief Secretary denied that this man was assaulted, although it had actually been sworn by the Inspector who ordered the charge that four men were standing at the corner and assaulted in the manner described; that they were not doing anything to break the peace, but they were standing there, and it was thought they might possibly do something. This evidence having been adduced by the Inspector, the Magistrate who had been in charge of the police who bated the people at the suppressed meeting in Cashel dismissed the case against O'Brien, and this was all the satisfaction the unfortunate man got for accepting the invitation of the Chief Secretary to avail himself of the Courts of Law in Ireland. I shall now refer to the system of "shadowing," which I unhesitatingly say has been adopted to provoke a breach of the peace. In the town of Tipperary the evicted people left their homes in peace, abandoning the property they had created in their holdings to the landlord, and they had taken possession in peace of the homes that they had built for themselves. These homes had been built by an active section of the people of Tipperary.

Father Humphreys, Mr. John Kinnane, Mr. Gill, and Mr. O'Brien Dalton, are the men who have been, beyond all others, engaged in constructing these homes. These are the men who have kept the people within the bounds of peace and order, and these are the men who have been selected by the Government for this species of persecution. An account of this system of boycotting by an independent journalist from Cork, shows that prominent men are surrounded by the police, and watched from an early hour in the morning until some hours after dark; or if one stops to exchange a handshake or word with another, the policeman, in the most offensive and provoking manner, orders them to move on.

"And if any party," the correspondent says, "attempts to remonstrate with the policeman, he is ordered away, or rudely pushed into the street, the same as if he were a corner boy of the most dangerous character. Every stranger is watched, no matter what his political character, and is pursued and annoyed."

I now come to the case of Carew, about which I asked the Chief Secretary a question the other night. Carew is a man who keeps a public house and a grocer's shop in the town of Tipperary. A short time ago I asked a gentleman whether two policemen had not followed my friend, and was told that when the policeman drove him from the shop they actually went upstairs after Mr. Carew. The Chief Secretary said the police did not follow him upstairs, and did not force their way into the private apartments of the publican, but remained only on the licensed part of the premises. I wonder where the Chief Secretary gets his information? Does he get it from the Castle; if he does, the Castle supplies very false information. Mr. Carew, the plaintiff in this case, was sworn and examined, and he stated that both constables were in uniform, and he noticed that one of them had a revolver. He asked them whether they had a warrant for entering his place. They said they had not. He asked them if they had any documents entitling them to enter and they made a similar reply. They also said that it was for nothing connected with his licence that they had gone there. Then Constable Gully was sworn and cross-examined by Mr. Truen, in reply to whom he said he had never stated that he did not go beyond the shop. Mr. Truen said such a statement was made in the House of Commons by the Chief Secretary, and the witness replied that he did not see that statement. I want to know whether the Chief Secretary still adheres to his original assertion that those constables did not go upstairs or beyond the licensed premises. The Chief Secretary blames us for bringing forward these matters, and asks us to be satisfied with his statements, but, in the face of these inaccuracies, with the fact that he denies the sworn statements of the witnesses, how can he expect us to accept his assertions? I have asked the Chief Secretary questions about the interference of the police with individuals patrolling the streets, which they have as much right to do as the Chief Secretary himself, and I have received nothing but the most unsatisfactory replies. There was the case of Mr. David Helan, a Town Commissioner, and a highly respected Tipperary merchant, who was fined for having his goods projecting 17 inches beyond his shop front, although the District Inspector had told him that there was no obstruction, and another person had stated that an arrangement had been come to by which goods might project 18 inches into the streets. This case was nothing but an act of unprovoked interference with the people's rights, and which, under certain circumstances, might have led to a breach of the peace. Then there was the case of Patrick Burke, of William O'Brien Street, Tipperary, who was prevented by a "shadowing" policeman from going to mass, and who later on, when going along the main street, was threatened by a policeman with arrest, and had to return home. Subsequently, on the 17th May, the policeman threatened to put him out of a shop in the main street, and threw him on the top of his head. The man was pointed out to the District Inspector, on the 26th May, and his name asked, with a view to his being summoned, whereupon the District Inspector, whose name was Gamble, replied, "What do you want his name for? I will break your head, you scamp." "Summon that man" said the District Inspector to Police Constable Jennings, and the man was summoned and imprisoned for two months for asking the name of the policeman. He was summoned on the 20th inst. for being drunk on the 6th inst., although he was a temperance man, and had not taken drink either on that day or for 11 months previously. Then there was the case of Nicholas Delaney, a Street Inspector employed by the Tipperary Town Commissioners. He was removed off the flags on to the main street by Sub-Constable Erle. When Delaney remonstrated, and stated who he was, the policeman said, "I don't care a damn what you are." Shortly after this Constable Erle came up to Delaney and said, "I told you before to leave the flags," and Delaney left the flags and went into the roadway. Some hours later an Acting Sergeant removed Delaney off the main street, and refused to tell Delaney his name, so that Delaney was unable to prosecute him. Delaney was soon afterwards liberated without being brought before the Magistrates or subsequently summoned. There are two points connected with this case on which I think we are entitled to an explanation from the Government. This man, being employed by the Town Commissioners, had as good a right to be about the streets as the policeman who turned him off, and if arrested why was he not charged, assuming he had committed an offence? If he had committed no offence why was he arrested? And, having been arrested, why was the name of the policeman refused when asked for? But this sort of thing is a common occurrence in Tipperary. I have given you enough instances to justify our coming to the conclusion that the District and County Inspectors have given their subordinates instructions to refuse the names of policemen, and break the law and commit the illegalities of which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has complained as being part of the elementary duties of Irish police constables. There was another case, namely, that of Bridget Callan, who was standing at her own door when a policeman, named Hobson, inquired what she was doing. She asked his authority for entering her house; he roughly demanded whether she meant to obstruct him in the discharge of his duty. This

I would point out is a very common phrase. A policeman asks if you mean to obstruct him, thereby provoking you into a quarrel which leads to your arrest and punishment before the Resident Magistrate. This man struck the woman across the neck, forcibly driving her head against the latch of the door. He then entered and searched her house, but without finding any one there. Her voice was husky and her throat sore some weeks after the assault. These are a few instances of what occurs in the town of Tipperary. I have numbers of others with which I will not trouble the Committee. I have myself observed the harsh and violent treatment of the people by the police on various occasions. An instance occurred on the day the meeting was addressed at Cork. My hon. Friends the Members for North East Mayo and North East Cork were away in a distant part of the country holding a meeting which the Government had intended to suppress. I was in the town of Cashel, where there were a great many people and a great many policemen. While waiting there I thought I should like to have a look at the historical ruins of the Rock of Cashel. I went there, accompanied by an old man belonging to the place, and he described to me those historical remains. When we came down into the town this old man, who was a respectable tradesman of the place, was walking a few feet behind me when a policeman came up, and, without the slightest provocation or a word being uttered, struck the unfortunate man a blow under the chin, causing blood to flow from his mouth, and from the cut on the lower part of his face. I was so disgusted that I turned round upon the policeman, and asked him why he had committed that assault. I took hold of the policeman and walked up to a District Inspector, named Fruen, and said, "You see that old man, he has been in my company to the Rock of Cashel, and coming back he has been assaulted by this policeman without the slightest provocation." What did Mr. Fruen say? He said, "I can't help that." I said, "Will you restrain that man?" "I will not," he said, "and if you don't leave the place you will get just as bad as he." Well, Sir, I left the place and took the old man away with me. I saw by this incident, and many others during the day in Cashel, that the police were in a brutal state of excitement, and that the Magistrates in charge of them were little better. The more violent the police were, and the more wounds they inflicted on the people the more applause did they receive from their superiors, from whom there was no chance of getting any redress. Now, Sir, this is the state of things at present in Tipperary; but it is not alone in Tipperary that these things occur. I noticed that day in Cashel, and have noticed on other occasions elsewhere, that the police seemed to be utterly demoralised and to have abandoned all discipline. They are very often drunk, and the man who assaulted my guide was in that state. Occasionally we have it on the testimony of the police themselves, who are sometimes obliged to admit that they are not the best of characters. Last year a policeman, who had fired a shot, was put in the box as a witness, and he admitted that he had got into trouble for drunkenness, and had been fined for breach of discipline. He stated that when he fired there were 50 people flinging stones at him and his companions. It often happens in Ireland that when the police have nothing else to do, they get up a conspiracy against people whom they want to get out of the way, and we have recently had a strong case of this kind at Portumna, when five Nationalists were charged with riotous conduct, the police declaring that they had been waylaid and stoned by the defendants, whereas it turned out that the whole story was concocted by the police, who were themselves the worse for drink, one of them admitting that he had been fined for discharging his revolver, when drunk, on the public road. The charge against these men was dismissed, but why is it that the policemen and the emergency men engaged in that affair have not been prosecuted by the Government for perjury? The fact is that the whole machinery of the law is strained for the protection of those who thus abuse the people. The Chief Secretary may think he has done a good day's work when he has disposed of questions put from this side of the House, and made a smart speech in reply to the accusations against the Government, but there is a Court of Appeal before whom we put our case, and that Court of Appeal has given its verdict, which is one of condemnation of the Chief Secretary and his Government in Ireland—a verdict which gives hope to the Irish people that not only the Chief Secretary and his Government, but the present police system of Ireland will be speedily at an end.

(10.38.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): The Committee ought to be assured by someone on this side of the House that there is a large portion of the Irish people who do not agree in the condemnation which is bestowed by Members opposite on the police of Ireland. The Opposition at the commencement of this Debate have apparently, in the exercise of their undoubted right, felt it their duty to offer very little to strike against. They have put up two English Members who seem to know very little about Ireland, whose intervention in this Debate has been of an exceedingly watery description. Those two Englishmen grounded their objections on the difference which exists between the expense involved in the maintenance of the Irish Constabulary and that which is involved in the maintenance of the English police. We were told by one of those hon. Members that the expense of the Irish police per head of the population is three times as great in Ireland as it is in the Metropolis. I could explain the abnormal difference if three-quarters of the Metropolitan Members of Parliament devoted their time and their abilities to inciting the criminal populace of London to break the law, and if they were assisted in that amiable operation by wandering Radicals from various parts of the country, and, furthermore, if they were assisted by right hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Front Opposition Bench, who have occupied a distinguished and prominent position in public affairs, in hounding on the population to resist, and, if possible, overturn the law, I venture to say the Police Rates in the Metropolis would very soon be largely augmented. If, for instance, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a speech in London, and said, as he said about Ireland not so very long ago, that the people ought not to obey a Government which was a Government of unequal laws, then we should have every reason to believe that crime and outrage and lawlessness would largely increase in the Metropolis. We do not find that English and Scotch Members advocate a policy of that kind on this side of the Channel, but whether it is the effect of the Irish air or not, this we know to our cost, that when hon. Members opposite visit Ireland, their great object is to fan and keep alive the flame of disorder and lawlessness. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian rose I looked forward with very great interest to his speech, for I thought that during the course of that speech he would define the policy of his Party, which had deliberately adopted opposition to the law in Ireland as the very foundation stone of the policy they now rest upon. But the right hon. Gentleman devoted his speech to a florid and somewhat violent attack upon my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and challenged him to produce a quotation which the right hon. Gentleman had made from a newspaper extract. When the Chief Secretary for Ireland read an extract from a report, I suppose it was from Hansard, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian came to a sudden and almost comical end. At any rate, there was a very short peroration. But what I want to hear from right hon. Gentlemen opposite is this, how can they now, in the year 1890, defend in the House of Commons, and before the country, boycotting and intimidation, which, four years and a-half ago, they were foremost to condemn? I listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridge-ton Division in the hope that he would give us some reasons for his remarkable conversion. I thought he would have told us how it comes about that at the present moment he is advocating and supporting a policy which for so long he so manfully resisted. But not a word. We have not had a single word from any hon. Member opposite to account for the fact that the great Liberal Party, to which they profess to belong, now support the policy of boycotting and intimidation. The Committee must remember that we are discussing a far wider and a far deeper question than any petty details of police administration. We are discussing the great question whether the House of Commons, and whether the country, will finally adopt or discard criminal intimidation in Ireland, whether an Irishman, no matter how low his position may be, shall enjoy the same freedom as every Englishman and every Scotchman enjoys. I am very glad that hon. Gentlemen opposite agree with me on that. I am aware that the police in Ireland are at loggerheads, not with the Irish people, but a section of the Irish people. Unfortunately, in every civilised country the Executive and the police are always at loggerheads with a certain section of the population. It is so in London; but it is always with the criminal section of the population, and it is exactly that section of the population in Ireland with whom they find themselves at loggerheads. What is the meaning of the attack that has been made upon the Administration in Ireland? It is twofold. First, the Administration are attacked with interfering with the rights of public meeting, and interfering with the right of the subject in the shape of shadowing. Shadowing is a very disagreeable necessity. But if the League shadow a tenant it is the duty of the Executive to shadow the shadower. There is a very great difference between shadowing a Nationalist Member, or one of the Radicals who have gone over to Ireland, and shadowing an Irish tenant. Shadowing an Irish or an English Member, leaves them, what we see them to be on these Benches, very fair specimens of well-fed humanity, but shadowing an Irish tenant, following him into the fair, means his ruin. He does not come and present himself at this House in a well-fed condition, but he calls on us to tell the House of Commons and the country the condition in which the tyranny of the Land League has left him. I say the Government of the country, to whatever Party it belongs, would be unworthy of the name of Government if it did not exert every effort that it can command to stamp out and destroy the most cowardly, most odious, and most detestable tyranny that has ever been exercised in any country. It is said that the Government have interfered with right of meeting. I venture to say if the hon. Member for West Belfast were to go to Belfast tomorrow he might address, as he would with great eloquence, an audience there, depicting the Government in the most odious terms, and might hold them up to public reprobation, and he would not be shadowed in Belfast. Why? Because the necessity for shadowing in Ulster does not exist, and it does not exist because the people there will not allow it to exist. But in Tipperary it is another thing. In Tipperary a meeting was held, not for the purpose of allowing hon. Members to address their constituents, but for the deliberate purpose of furthering the policy of intimidation. We all heard how the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton said, in eloquent terms, that it was a monstrous interference with the inalienable right of Members of Parliament to interfere with the recent meeting at Tipperary, which was got up for the purpose of enabling the Member for South Tipperary to address his constituents. That meeting, of which we have heard so much, and for interfering with which the Government have been so much condemned, was not a meeting got up to enable the hon. Member to address his constituents. It was got up for a very different purpose, to which I will allude.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not quite see how this comes in the Debate on the Police Vote. It will come in the Debate on the Chief Secretary's salary. The question now is in regard to the actions of the police.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling at once. As the hon. Member for South Tipperary alluded to the events at Tipperary, I thought I was justified in doing so. Now, in reference to the action of the police at Tipperary, what I wish to point out is that the police in shadowing hon. Gentlemen who visited that town, were, in my opinion, fulfilling the duty the police of any country ought to perform. The shadowing of hon. Members opposite, and other persons in Ireland, is one of the chief grievances levelled by hon. Gentlemen opposite against the Government. The hon. Member for East Mayo was shadowed—

MR. DILLON: I never was shadowed in the whole course of my life.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Well, the hon. Member ought to have been. The hon. Member portrayed the action of the police at Tipperary, and described it as a monstrous perversion of justice, or words to that effect. The hon. Member went to Tipperary for a set purpose. The meeting was got up to meet the hon. Member who had been round the world with the Home Rule hat, and the Government prevented the hon. Member from making a speech at Tipperary. But great fault has been found with the police, and I suppose we shall hear a great deal about it in the House. I venture to say that the action of the police in Tipperary in preventing the hon. Member making a speech has been amply justified by the hon. Member himself. The action of the police was to prevent intimidation, to prevent the hon. Member, or any other man, from intimidating the Irish people, and forcing them to obey the law of the League instead of the law of the land. It was against such action that the police had been, and, I hope, will be, set in force. The hon. Member has never been ashamed to acknowledge that boycotting is a justifiable course of action. The contention of the Government, backed up by the law, is that, by law, boycotting is a crime. The hon. Member appears to have added a new commandment to the decalogue, "Thou shalt not interfere with intimidation."

MR. DILLON: The hon. Member is making a serious and pointed charge against me. I have always advocated boycotting as an unfortunate necessity in Ireland, and I shall continue to do so. But I have never advocated intimidation, and I defy the hon. and gallant Gentleman to quote any passage from any speech of mine in which I have advocated intimidation.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The hon. Member has challenged me to quote, and I will do so. The hon. Member said on a well-known occasion——

"If any man back down, whatever the Government may say, I will denounce him from public platforms by name, and his life will not be a happy one in Ireland or beyond the sea."

I do not know if hon. Members know what making a man's life unhappy means in Ireland. Intimidation, I think, a very weak phrase to describe it. But knowing this, and remembering the warning, the Government were justified in setting the Constabulary in action to prevent the delivery of a speech in Tipperary which, undoubtedly, would have had the very same import as the speech I have cited. I am justified in saying that by the hon. Member himself, for that very night, though prevented from addressing a public meeting, the hon. Member used words which show the frame of mind in which he returned from the other side of the world.

MR. DILLON: Where?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: On the night of Saturday, May 25, 1890——

MR. DILLON: Where was it delivered?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: It was delivered at Tipperary, not at a public meeting, but at a banquet, where sometimes it is said people speak with more freedom and truth. In speaking that same night at a banquet the hon. Member said that those who had been turned off their farms would, in a short time, retake possession of them, and their names would be honoured from generation to generation, while those of the cowardly dastards he denounced would be dishonoured and their children would be pointed to as the children of traitors. It is said that such language is not intimidation; but it amply justifies the action of the Government in setting the constabulary in action in Tipperary and preventing the hon. Member from openly intimidating people as he did at the banquet. The tenants in Tipperary have no more choice in the line they have taken than Nationalist constituencies have in the choice of their Members. What the Committee have to decide is whether intimidation is to continue in Ireland, whether the Government are or are not to employ every means at their disposal to put down attempts to intimidate the Irish people and deprive them of liberty. For such action the Executive are condemned, because they are interfering with the unquestionable right hon. Members opposite think they possess of intimidating the Irish people by every means in their power for the purpose of building upon that intimidation a political fabric in which the Nationalists shall be masters. The House and the law have decided that intimidation and boycotting are crimes, and before the House condemns the Government it must revoke a number of laws and reverse the proceedings of the last few years, and especially those of the time when the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian was Prime Minister. The policy of the Opposition is based on intimidation; they depend on the League; the League depends on intimidation; therefore, the policy of the Opposition is "Down with the law and up with intimidation," and the policy of the Government is "Down with intimidation and up with the law." I can scarcely realise—it sometimes seems to me an evil dream that any responsible Party in the State should consent to adopt such an un-British, an un-English policy, the policy of the dastard—that men who are safe themselves should hound on the Irish people to resist and disobey the law, and then leave them in the lurch and come over to the House of Commons. [Cries of "No, no!"]

MR. DILLON: I rise to order, Sir. I put it to you whether it is conducive to order in Debate in this House, that the hon. and gallant Member should make grossly offensive charges—charges that are false and baseless. I have never hounded on the Irish people to any action I would not take myself.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The war between us is war to the death.

THE CHAIRMAN: Discussion must be carried on within the usual limits of the Rules of Debate, and the language of the hon. and gallant Member has rather exceeded that scope.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I regret, Sir, if my warmth has betrayed me beyond the Rules of Debate. It is not easy for hon. Members who do not understand the condition of affairs in Ireland, and who do not know what boycotting means, to realise the misery that has been brought about by the action of the League, but it makes my blood boil to think that these things should be supported by a great Party in the State. I cannot believe that it will ultimately be the policy of that Party in the country. I regret that so many of my compatriots have adopted it. It would be to me a great satisfaction if some of the most eloquent of Ireland's sons would forget this policy, which must end in nothing, and join with me, as I am ready to join with any man, in promoting the good of my country. But this policy is one that every loyal Briton, every loyal Irishman ought to resist to the end. I shall resist to the utmost of my power the prospect held before us of a League Parliament, a League Government, League Judges, League Juries, and League Police.

*(11.10.) MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.): A good many hon. Members, even the hon. and gallant Member himself must be wondering what is the practical value in the interests of the peace and prosperity of Ireland of such a speech as that to which we have just listened. Whenever the hon. and gallant Member speaks, whether within or without this House, he seems to be seeking to irritate and to exasperate his political opponents. Across the floor of the House to-night he has flung epithets of contumely; he has used the word "dastard;" but the hon. and gallant Member speaks in the safe precincts of the House, where he is protected by the Chief Secretary, and in Ireland under the protection of the Chief Secretary's policemen. I leave it, therefore, to hon. Members to say where, in such circumstances, the word "dastard" is best applied. The hon. and gallant Gentleman commented on the ignorance which he said two hon. Members who represent English constituencies on this side, who have spoken in the Debate to-night, had shown of Irish affairs; but it may be well to remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that there is a Party in this House and a Party in the country not always impressed with the views and the knowledge of the hon. and gallant Gentleman when he speaks on Irish affairs. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said that in the Debate to-night no attempt had been made to show that the police in Ireland had exceeded the boundary of law. He frequently used the term "criminal intimidation," and it is the practice of hon. Members on the other side of the House to use that phrase as though it applied to one party only. In a few words I desire to comment on one episode that has taken place in Ireland, and to this I invite the attention of the Committee and the Chief Secretary, whom I am glad to see opposite. My hon. Friend the Member for the Rushcliffe Division referred to the Charleville shooting affray, but passed from it as a case sub judice. In that he was under a misapprehension. The matter has been made the subject of two actions, and the jury, having disagreed in each case, the whole thing has, I understand, been allowed to drop. The case is, therefore, no longer sub judice. Justice has not been done, and we are entitled to bring the case before the House of Commons and ask justice from the Chief Secretary in regard to it. The incidents at Charleville are among the most extraordinary that have taken place in Ireland during the last few years, and I hold the Chief Secretary responsible for everything that took place on that occasion. Personally, I have never denounced the Royal Irish Constabulary, who have been induced by good pay and pensions to join the Force, the work of which they afterwards find to be anti-national, political, and extremely distasteful to them. I have always blamed the system which has produced these men, not the men individually, who have only been carrying out their orders. But, at the same time, it must be said that the constabulary of Ireland entered the Force of their own free will, and, therefore, they must be assumed to accept the responsibility of their position, and they must be held to that responsibility, for, being unlike the police in England, armed with deadly weapons, their capacity for mischief is so much greater. We have heard the Chief Secretary glorying in the system of shadowing; does he approve of revolver practice by the Constabulary upon an unarmed crowd? The circumstances that occurred in Charleville were these: The hon. Member for North-East Cork, having been arrested in Cork, was conveyed by a night train to Charleville. At the time that the train reached Charleville a small number of people, about 70 in all, were gathered upon the platform with a band, in order to greet the return of a deputation from Cork, they not knowing that the hon. Member was in the train. There were no police on the platform. The hon. Member was in a compartment with six policemen armed with rifles, and there were 12 other policemen in the train. When those assembled on the platform found that the hon. Member was in the train they began to cheer, and attempted to shake hands with him, but there was no idea of rescuing him. Natural excitement there was, and the wonder is that the people of Ireland can control themselves under such circumstances. There was some cheering, and hooting, and pushing, the head of the District Inspector was bruised, probably by a stick, and this was the only blow alleged to have been struck, and a window in the compartment was broken. Under these circumstances it was that the police deliberately fired three or four shots into the crowd with the deliberate intention, according, as the Attorney General knows, to their instructions, of killing or wounding. By some miracle very little damage was done by the shooting. The man Nolan who subsequently brought an action is alleged to have been wounded in the leg, and the nose of a railway porter was grazed by a bullet. But into these matters I need not enter; they do not affect my case. The fact that people escaped serious injury is no excuse for, or extenuation of the action of the police. Now, what is the alleged justification? There were seven witnesses for the defence, all policemen. There were eight for the plaintiff, including three railway men. In the evidence at the trial it was admitted by the police there was no attempt at rescue, either organised or made. The question is, Were the police justified in thinking that an attack was about to be made upon them? Mr. Justice Murphy pointed out that panic or excitement among the police can be no legal justification for firing into a crowd. The police are expected to keep their heads cool. Here was a small and harmless crowd, and in the train was an armed body of 18 policemen. They could have held their carriage against a much larger number of persons than were on the platform. Mr. Justice Murphy remarked:—

“The people might have cheered Mr. O’Brien and groaned some one else; but there was really nothing in that circumstance. There was evidence that such words as ‘We have him now and we won’t let him go’ were used by the crowd; but he did not think the jury should attach much importance to such words. They might be uttered by some boys on the outskirts of the crowd, or by people in the crowd; but such words should not affect the minds of men with firm minds who were in a carriage armed and prepared to do their duty, though the words might put the men on their guard.”

Further, Chief Baron Palles said—

“That it was a fearful necessity this sudden disorder arising at that station in which it was said it was necessary for justification in point of law to shoot down any one. Four shots were fired. He did not know whether the defendants aimed at any one, but simply fired at the crowd. Now, on the evidence of the defendants themselves, was that necessary? It occurred to him that prima facie the duty of the police should have been to aim at their opponents, such as the man who aimed the blow at District Inspector Concannon; but what they did was to fire into the crowd in the darkness of the night, a crowd of 50 or 100 persons, careless whom they killed.”

Let the Committee remember that the other police were not agitated or alarmed. Those in the other compartment never left it, showing that no rescue was feared. The only pretext for this cowardly, unprovoked, illegal action was the allegation that a shot was fired.

The police declared on their side that a shot was fired from the crowd; but when challenged at the time by the hon. Member for North-East Cork to search the carriage for the bullet, they refused, because they knew nothing of the kind had happened. Further, is it likely that the sympathisers with the hon. Member would fire into the carriage in which he was seated? There is no reason to believe that a shot was fired. Well, we demand justice from the right hon. Gentleman. What is he going to do in this case? He is responsible for the police in Ireland. That police system I have long condemned, and not for the first time, when the right hon. Gentleman took office; and I say it is an atrocious thing to arm a civil force with revolvers and cutlasses, and rifles, not against criminals, but against the people in the case of political disturbances. Let the right hon. Gentleman remember what occurred when a proposal was made to arm the London Police against burglars. Why, the police themselves were unwilling to allow themselves to be armed. Why? They knew they might be provoked into the improper use of their arms, which would lead to investigation and perhaps punishment. In Ireland the motto with the Chief Secretary, as we all know, is that “the police can do no wrong,” and it was because he adheres to this motto that this kind of thing is happening in Ireland. If he had kept them up to a full sense of their responsibility, these men would never have lost their heads; but the police are reckless, because they think that in the mind of the Chief Secretary there is the wish that they should do as they like against the Nationalists of Ireland. I ask again, what is the right hon. Gentleman going to do? The interest of the Force and the interest of the public demand inquiry. The episode is discreditable to the Constabulary. And if the Government refuses an inquiry, their conduct will be on a par with the blind and obstinate policy which in England is rapidly becoming as much despised and hated as it is in Ireland, and the most conspicuous feature of which is its disastrous and miserable failure.

(11.27.) MR. W. O'BRIEN: I am rather surprised that it is necessary for me to rise. I should have thought a Representative of the Government might have answered the hon. Member. Up to the present the Government have evaded discussion of this matter upon the plea that legal proceedings were pending, but that excuse is now at an end. The juries have disagreed on a subsidiary technical point, whether the wound was caused by a bullet or a fall; but upon the main point, whether the police were or were not justified in firing, there was no difference whatever between the Judges and the juries. In both instances the Court held that the police fired in reckless panic. What defence has the right hon. Gentleman to offer, or what does he propose to do? On the day after the occurrence the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General, when questioned, I think by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton), made a distinct allegation that there was an organised attempt by an armed crowd to rescue me that night at Charleville, and that this was when the crowd was fired on. Does the Chief Secretary stick to that statement now? If he does not, all I can say is that he ought by this time to have humbly withdrawn it and to have apologised to the House for having made it. If he sticks to it, he is the only human being who does so. It is admitted on all hands that the people came there for a wholly different purpose, never dreaming of seeing me there. But, though it is now acknowledged that this is a ridiculous story, though the Judges and his own police witnesses have admitted it, neither of the right hon. Gentlemen has, up to this hour, in any manner apologised to the House and the country for his misleading statements. I will not attempt to give the facts of the case as my own version. I find that I have simply to take the facts as they are stated in the charges of the two Judges who tried the case. They were two of the most eminent Judges on the Irish Bench, and, certainly, partiality to us or partiality to the police are the very last things anybody would accuse them of. Mr. Justice Murphy presided at the first trial. He said it appeared from the evidence that a small crowd of persons went from the town of Charleville to the railway station to meet the deputation from Cork, and there was "No evidence that they expected Mr. O'Brien in the train, so that there could have been no attempt beforehand at organising a rescue."

Mr. Herbert Gladstone

There was, he said—

"No evidence that the people had any arms with them or used violence. They might have cheered Mr. O'Brien and groaned at somebody else," but there was nothing in that circumstance, or in any words they said, that should have had any effect on firm minds. He added that such a thing as a rescue by an armed force he had never heard of in the country. It was clear, said his Lordship,

"That, on the instant of the firing, Mr. O'Brien insisted that all the firing was from the police themselves, and that there was no firing from outside."

Through his whole charge the Judge intimated in the plainest manner, and without the slightest disguise, his own opinion that the story of an attempted rescue was a perfectly ridiculous one and that the story of a shot having being fired from outside is a story which the police themselves did not venture to insist on when they were taxed with it by myself on the spot. It was impossible to hear Judge Murphy's charge without feeling that he himself believed there was not a shadow of justification, either in the way of attack by the people or of danger to the policemen's lives, for the reckless discharge of firearms into the midst of an unarmed crowd. Yet that is the state of things confessed by the Judge's charge, and yet the jury were allowed to ride off on the false issue of whether the wound was caused by a spike or a bullet. On that point alone legal remedies have failed, and there has been a disagreement of the jury. The Government, taking advantage of that miserable little technicality, will institute no inquiry, and will administer no rebuke to the police in the face of the Judge's plain declaration of their recklessness and their panic. The case came on for trial a second time before the Lord Chief Baron, and again, in the plainest way, the Judge intimated his opinion that the conduct of the police was reckless, indefensible, and criminal. He said he thought that the jury might come to the conclusion that the crowd which went to the station to welcome their townsman back from Cork was in its initiation a perfectly lawful assembly. If, he added, there was an attempt to rescue Mr. O'Brien, it must have been a very sudden affair, and must have been arranged in the space of three minutes.

"Looking broadly at the matter," he said, "Having regard to the suddenness of the whole affair, the plainly innocent purpose with which the people went to the station, it is for the jury, as men of the world, to say whether they are prepared to hold that the assembly was a riotous assembly, bearing in mind that the acts were the acts of individuals, and that there was no common purpose for rescuing Mr. O'Brien or attacking the police."

From beginning to end of the charge the Judge showed he took the very same view as Mr. Justice Murphy as to the recklessness with which the police acted that night. In each case 10 of the jurors were for finding a verdict for the plaintiff. Two of them in each case could not satisfy themselves that it was a bullet wound, and not a wound caused by a spike, and upon that miserable little side-issue District Inspector Concannon has ridden off. I say it is monstrous in a case of this sort for the Chief Secretary to refer people to civil relief. The proper legal remedy would be for District Inspector Concannon to be placed on his trial for a most wanton and murderous outrage. I want to know from the Government whether they are going to let the matter rest here. In the face of the Judge's Charge, is the District Inspector's action to be allowed to face without investigation or the slightest judicial censure? At least £500 expenses must have been incurred by the police in fighting these cases in the Law Courts. Are the Government going to pass those expenses? Are they, in defiance of the Judges' Charge, not only going to shield Mr. Concannon from justice, but actually to reward him by paying his expenses out of the pockets of the British taxpayer? If they are, I venture to say that a more scandalous misappropriation of public money was never made, and I hope it will be resented and resisted by every means in our power. We want to know from the Government whether anything will be done to bring the perpetrators of this night's work to justice? There ought to be no beating about the bush in the matter. If the Government approve of District Inspector Concannon's conduct, let them say so and take the responsibility of backing him up. On the other hand, if they do not approve of it, let us have an apology for the utterly baseless excuses on which their conduct was championed before. We are entitled to demand an explicit, unambiguous answer to that question, whether or not District Inspector Concannon's expenses are to be paid out of the public purse? If they are, I venture to say that the Government are just as guilty as the District Inspector; and if they will give us no legal remedy now, please God some day or other we shall get, at a General Election, the only legal remedy open to the Irish people under the circumstances. And now as to the general question that we have been discussing to-night. The Chief Secretary spoke on almost all subjects connected with the Royal Irish Constabulary except the three topics of expensiveness, inefficiency, and brutality. The Chief Secretary finds it easier to indulge once more to-night in his habit of launching vague general accusations against the people of Tipperary. He can slander Tipperary. He has failed to conquer it. I daresay the object of all his proclamations and of all this shadowing in Tipperary has been to break down the combination of the Smith-Barry tenants. Well, Sir, I venture to say that speeches like his to-night are very awkward speeches for his own purpose, for the moral of all his complaints about Tipperary is the utter futility of all this police tyranny. The effect of all that has been done for nearly 12 months in that small town is, that the combination of Smith-Barry's tenants holds the field more victoriously than ever, and the right hon. Gentleman, with all his police force in that town, has to acknowledge himself perfectly helpless and baffled in face of that combination. There have been 12 months now of a conflict of that sort, with all the intolerable little petty tyranny that these policemen have exercised on every man who has been on the Nationalist side, and the police have failed to detach a single tenant from the Smith-Barry combination, and have only succeeded in detaching constituency after constituency from the Tory Party in the United Kingdom. So once more the Chief Secretary has illustrated to-night the utter hopelessness of his attempts to make true the boasts that he published through England a year or a year and a half ago, that all was halcyon peace in Ireland. Once more, practically speaking, he has confessed his utter hopelessness and helplessness in the face of the spirit of the people of Tipperary. Take an instance as a proof of how utterly worthless and ineffectual is this Police Force, which costs you nearly £1,500,000 a year—take the case admitted by the Attorney General himself last Friday—the case of a boycotted woman in Tipperary who was attacked, we are told, and her house wrecked by the mob, and nobody made amenable. As far as the attack and wrecking are concerned, I do not believe a word of it. I am not imputing anything to the Attorney General personally, but to his informants. But, suppose it is true, where was Colonel Caddell and the 137 policemen who had been massed in the town for the last nine months? I take it for granted that Colonel Caddell and his 137 policemen were too busy shadowing Father Humphreys, who is a stamp of criminal that the Chief Secretary alone is responsible for; but they did not succeed in doing that much effectually—for what is the fact? Why, yesterday week, right under the noses of these policemen, Father Humphreys presided at the branch of the National League which you solemnly declared to be suppressed nearly 12 months ago, and which you assured the English people was a thing of the past; and at that League meeting, held under their noses, the only three adherents of Smith-Barry left in the town of Tipperary came forward and made their peace with the National League, and petitioned to be allowed to join the combination of tenants, and were accordingly allowed to do so. That is how you are succeeding in Tipperary. Let me give another instance of the utter helplessness of the police in reference to the work of detecting real crime as compared with crime which we glory in, and which three-fourths of our race glory in. Take another case, admitted the other day in this House. The Attorney General told my hon. Friend the Member for East Clare that during the last six months there were 66 agrarian outrages in the County of Clare, which Colonel Turner boasted nearly 12 months ago had been reduced to a state of halcyon peace and contentment by coercion—66 agrarian outrages in a county which is mulcted to the extent of £5,000 a year for extra police, and the Attorney General told us not one single person had been made amenable. The fact of it is, these policemen are fit for nothing in the world except whatever they can do with their rifles and bayonets. The whole system is one of the most atrocious in the world. Take their system of promotion. Let me mention one instance. There are at this moment 11 cases in which verdicts for wilful murder stand recorded against the police in Ireland, and in not a single one of these instances has one of these policemen been brought to justice. But that is not the worst, because some of these men, some of these murderers, have been actually promoted. I will give chapter and verse. Constable Swindell was, by a Coroner's jury, found guilty of the wilful murder of a man named Aherne, in Middleton. Of course, he was shielded from justice by the Crown, and prevented from being brought to trial. But that is not the worst. A couple of months afterwards, the man absolutely received what is called "a favourable record" in the General Orders of the constabulary. He received a favourable record, which is the invariable preliminary to promotion, and it was expressly stated to be for distinguished conduct in retaining a prisoner under difficult circumstances. The distinguished conduct was running a bayonet through the body of an unarmed man and killing him, and for that distinguished conduct, which a Coroner's jury called murder, Constable Swindell received the public thanks of the Inspector General, and is now on the high road to promotion. Every young constable in the Force is taught that if he wants promotion he had better imitate Constable Swindell. The fact of it is, that you proceed upon the principle—and that is at the bottom of the whole failure of your system in Ireland—of treating the Irish people as inferiors and as enemies; and the result is, you have the most utterly inefficient and utterly brutal Police Force in the world. No decent man, woman, or child in the community will touch a policeman with a 40 foot pole, and to break heads and give perjured evidence against Members of Parliament is all they are fit for, except that we are conscious that their action is opening the eyes of the English people to their character. Latterly we are inundated with instances of crying wrong and violence inflicted by the police upon the people. There is scarcely a parish in Ireland which does not furnish you with instances. Our only difficulty is to choose between dozens and dozens of cases which crowd in upon us from every part of the country. The Member for Leeds has just brought forward one case, and it is only one out of hundreds in every part of the country—one case which has elicited the condemnation of two Judges. When the conduct of the Police who, in the most horrible circumstances fired three or four shots into an unarmed homestead at night, is brought to your notice, we are not even favoured with a reply to the charge. I can only tell you there are hundreds and thousands of the best men in the Royal Irish Constabulary who feel just as keenly as we do the demoralisation you have been introducing into the Force, and the encouragement you have been giving to the bad and reckless elements amongst them. I verily believe that Englishmen, sooner or later, will be horrified at the inner working of this Force in the matter of promotion, and in the matter of utter demoralisation, and I believe that if there was no other argument for overturning the whole of the Dublin Castle system of government root and branch, you would have a conclusive one in the exclusiveness, utter inefficiency, and utter anti-national character of the enormous Force you preserve in Ireland for the purpose of domineering over the Irish people and repressing their just aspirations.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SPIRITS.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Motion for appointment of Select Committee [23rd June.]

(12.4.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I beg to move that the Order for this Motion be discharged. I have put it down in an amended form.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order be discharged."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I am very glad the Government have acceded to our views on this matter, and that they have also acceded to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) in regard to the question of the consumption of ether as an intoxicant. I would suggest that now the Pharmacy Bill has gone to the House of Lords the Government should take some means for the protection of the Revenue by insisting that ether should not be allowed to be sold by the ordinary druggist, and that it should pay some Licence Duty. They might then prevent this stuff, which is most injurious to health, being drunk in every little village in the mountains.

(12.5.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds): I would point out that ether is used as an anæsthetic quite as much as chloroform, and anything that rendered it difficult for the medical profession so to use it would be a great misfortune. Ether is a product of alcohol; but in itself is not an article of Excise at all, and I think it would be well to limit the reference to the use of ether as an intoxicant so as not to put any difficulty in the way of its use as an anæsthetic.

(12.6.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I put my Amendment upon the Paper because there are certain districts in Tyrone, and Londonderry especially, where the sale and consumption of ether has become a positive danger. It is not sold by druggists alone, but in every small shebeen. Ether is publicly sold much to the destruction of the public health.

Question put, and agreed to.

Order discharged.

SUPERANNUATIONS (OFFICERS OF COUNTY COUNCILS) BILL—(No. 134.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*12.7.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I do not rise to move the Second Reading of this Bill, but to ask leave of the House to withdraw the Bill, with a view to give the County Councils an opportunity of discussing the question during their autumn sittings. The Bill has the approval and support of many Members on both sides of the House, and my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board has expressed, on a former occasion, his approval of the principle of the Bill, and that it is a subject well worthy of the consideration of the House. In asking leave to withdraw the Bill, I beg to give notice that I shall re-introduce it next Session. I now move that the Order be discharged.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Order be discharged, and the Bill withdrawn,"—(Mr. Norris)—put, and agreed to.

MIDWIVES REGISTRATION BILL.

(No. 29.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

*(12.9.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): There is no doubt that this Bill, as it stands, presents some very objectionable features; but, at the same time, there is a strong feeling entertained in all parts of the House that a satisfactory arrangement might be arrived at if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee.

(12.10.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Do I understand the Government will give time this Session for the passing of the measure after it has been considered by a Select Committee? There are a good many contentious things in the Bill, but I would not object to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee if we are to understand it is not to be pressed this Session.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I hope my hon. Friend will not persevere with his opposition, because if the Bill is referred to a Select Committee many of its objectionable features will be eliminated.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

TRUSTEES APPOINTMENT BILL (LORDS.)—(No. 364.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.10.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I should like to explain how this Bill comes down from the House of Lords. Some years ago an Act was passed for enabling the Trustees of Nonconformist chapels to be appointed in a very simple and inexpensive manner. That Act was intended to apply to Nonconformist chapels in England. Shortly afterwards the Court of Chancery decided that the Act did not extend to chapels held in trust for denominations, but only to chapels held in trust for a specific congregation. The effect of this decision was to exclude all Wesleyan Chapels from the benefits of the Act. The object of this Bill is to provide that the old Act shall include Wesleyan chapels. If this Bill is passed it will very much reduce the cost of and facilitate the appointment of new Trustees. It is a purely technical Bill. It has been drawn by an eminent conveyancer, and it comes down with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Herschell. It will prove an act of justice to a large section of English Nonconformists, and, therefore, I hope the House will agree to the Second Reading.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Law?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Personally, I am prepared to take it as it comes from the House of Lords.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

MOTIONS.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT (SCOTLAND) MACDIARMID SCHOOL FUNDS.

*(12.14.) MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to move—

The people of the Braes District of Portree, which is a very poor one, complain that certain educational facilities they have enjoyed for the last 40 years are now taken away from them. A school was established there 40 years ago, and at a later period another school was established, and now it is proposed to do away with one of the schools. It is well known that one of the great disadvantages education labours under in the Highlands is the distance poor children are obliged to travel to school. If this school is closed as proposed, children will have to travel four miles to school instead of three. It is not to be expected that children ill fed and clad like those of the Braes can attend regularly under such circumstances, and as even hitherto the attendance is not up to the mark, if this project is carried out the present rather limited attendance will fall off altogether.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent to the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Scotland) Commissioners for the management of the endowment known as the Macdiarmid School Funds, so far as relates to the parish of Portree."—(Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh.)

*(12.18.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): The Commissioners, in framing this scheme, were very much guided by the information and opinions they obtained as to the state of education in the district.

There are two schools in the district, but neither of them is very good. One is attended by about 36, and the other by about 29 children on an average. The schools are not far distant from each other, and the opinion of the Commissioners was that one good school would be sufficient, to be supplemented by itinerant teaching, as is provided by the Scottish Education Act, for the very scattered population of the remoter parts of the parish. Neither of the schools has a very high position in the opinion of the Education Office. Indeed, Her Majesty's Inspector has given something like a threat to both schools that unless their quality is improved the grant cannot be continued. In order to make the public school efficient, which it is proposed to continue, it is desirable that some money should be spent upon it. The scheme which my hon. Friend proposes to interfere with provides that part of the endowment shall be expended upon the improvement of the school accommodation. It is understood that about £200 will be required for that purpose, and the whole capital of the endowment is only £1,000. My hon. Friend is in error when he says the scheme of the Commissioners proposes to give the money for bursaries. Part of the money, in the first place, is to be expended on improving the buildings; in the second place, the Governors shall apply such sum as shall be required out of their annual income in providing school material, including, in the case of girls, material for industrial work; and, thirdly, the residue of the income shall be applied by the Governors either in establishing bursaries or in supplementing the salary of the teacher, or providing or supplementing the salary of a female assistant teacher in the public school at Braes. There is little doubt that the latter alternative will be preferred. The whole matter is left in the hands of the Governing Body, who are the minister of Portree, some one appointed by the School Board, and Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools for the district. The scheme has the full approval of the School Board of the parish. Hitherto the endowment has not been doing much good, and I ask the House to support the scheme of the Commissioners.

(12.24.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): It was for the benefit of a very poor district that this £1,000 was left. The school was the first school built in the district in 1847, and it was built, as a good many Highland schools are, in a convenient centre, so that children from the neighbourhood could attend with ease. Then a school was built almost alongside this school by the Free Church in 1860, and the proposal of the Commissioners is that of these two schools one shall be discontinued. The school to be discontinued is the older school, the foundation school, and it so happens it is the better conducted school. It has an average attendance of 29, and 15s. per head is earned on average attendance. In the other school the average grant is only 10s. per head. It is proposed to add to the buildings. The hon. Member for Glasgow University (Mr. J. A. Campbell) states that £200 is to be spent in adding to the buildings. The accommodation at present in the public school is £90, and the average attendance is over 65. Are you going to do over again what you have done in the Highlands, by erecting schools that are not required? The bursaries are to be allocated to the parish of Portree, where the better class population is to be found. The result will be that the better class children will carry off the endowments, and the money will not go to the district for which the money was left originally. Another proposal is to supplement the teachers' salary. Does the hon. Member for Glasgow University imagine for a moment that this is a place where you can look for higher education? The small number of children in average attendance shows that they are not the class for whom higher education can be provided. It is proposed also to build a school three miles away from the existing schools. If you use the money in putting a school down in the midst of the population it will be usefully employed.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SPIRITS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether, on grounds of public health, it is desirable that certain classes of Spirits, British and Foreign, should be kept in bond for a definite period before they are allowed to pass into consumption, and to inquire into the system of blending British and Foreign Spirits in or out of bond, and into the propriety of applying the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act and the Merchandise Marks Act to the case of British and Foreign Spirits, and mixtures of British and Foreign Spirits, and also into the sale of ether as an intoxicant.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Somervell, Sir Henry Roscoe, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Boord, Sir Edward Harland, Mr. Flynn, Colonel Hill, Mr. Hozier, Mr. M'Ewan, and Mr. Jackson.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the Quorum.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

METROPOLITAN WATER COMPANIES.

Return ordered—

"Of the Accounts, as they are respectively made up, of the Metropolitan Water Companies to the 30th day of September, and the 31st day of December, 1889."—(Mr. Long.)

Return presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 283.]

POST OFFICE EMPLOYÉS.

(12.40.) On the Motion for adjournment:—

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Before that Motion is put, I wish to ask the Postmaster General a question as to which I will only trouble him with a few words on account of the gravity of the situation. I wish to ask him whether it is a fact, as I heard stated this evening, that sorters and telegraph boys are summoned for Tuesday morning to act as blacklegs in place of the regular postmen? I wish to ask whether, in view of the position of affairs in the Post Office, this is to be done? I have just come from a meeting of the Postmen's Union, at which no less than 1,000 Post Office employés were present. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Shipton, among others, and a resolution was unanimously passed that the Postmen's Union, which consists of more than three-fourths of the Postal Staff in the Metropolis, should authorise the Trades' Union Council, which represents 40,000 workmen, to make representations to Government and to Parliament with a view to mediation between the Post Office and the Union, and that no action should be taken by the Union pending the receipt of a Report from the Trades' Union Council as to the effect of the representations made. It was further provided that such Report should be presented within 12 days, and it was stipulated that the Postmaster General should not proceed to violent measures in the way of supplanting the men or reducing or suspending Post Office employés. I think it is right that the right hon. Gentleman should understand the position of affairs, in view of the grave intelligence which came to the meeting, that he was about to take violent measures to-morrow morning. In taking the action the meeting did the men did not act exactly in consonance with their own feelings, but they were guided by a strict sense of duty, and they also acted upon the urgent advice of their leaders. I hold in my hand a placard which was posted at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman this afternoon, and which has been taken by the Post Office employés as a direct repudiation of a request which was made on behalf of the Postmen's Union by letter this afternoon. This placard was regarded by the men as a direct threat of supplanting them in their work by means of blacklegs, and I must state that the placard was publicly burned at the meeting. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will realise what is the state of things, and that he will not drive the men to extremities.

* (12.45.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University) : I doubt if this House has ever before listened to such a speech as has just been made. I regret that any Member of this House should have thought it consonant with his public duty to indulge in such observations as the hon. Gentleman has just uttered in a matter of very serious public interest. I have no knowledge of any placard having been issued this afternoon by my authority or by the authority of the Department; and, therefore, if the hon. Gentleman thinks he has served the interests of his friends by referring to that, certainly the charge he wished to levy against my Department recoils upon himself. I can only say that in dealing with a question which would never have assumed its present proportions had it not been for the uncalled-for interference of professional agitators, I have sought, as far as I can, to keep in view the interests of members of the Service and of the public; and I am happy to assure the hon. Member that I believe I have made satisfactory arrangements for carrying on the Public Service if any misguided persons should so far forget their public duties as to desert them without reason or excuse. I cannot speak as I should like to do within the limits of Parliamentary courtesy of the tone taken by the hon. Member in referring to individuals who have volunteered their services to the Department in offensive and opprobrious terms which are unworthy of this House; but I will say that, if those misguided individuals who have listened to the mischievous counsels which they now appear to see through have at last learned wisdom, I am glad. The hon. Member himself has had the candour to admit that this somewhat tardy repentance is due to the fact that they have become aware that their services are not indispensable. I am quite prepared efficiently to maintain the Postal Service of this Metropolis, whatever may be said by the hon. Member and those who act with him. I am happy to say I hold in my hand a Resolution, which has just reached me from the important E.C. District, to the effect that that meeting of postmen had unanimously passed a resolution strongly deprecating any extreme action which would tend to disorganise the London Postal Service, and requesting the Postmaster General to receive a deputation of postmen with a view to their grievances being inquired into. As I have already stated on several occasions in the course of the last few weeks, I am perfectly ready to receive any deputation of postmen which approaches me in a regular and recognised manner; and I am inclined to believe that the labour spent by mischievous agitators in fomenting these disturbances in the Public Services will be found to be entirely thrown away.

(12.48.) MR. CONYBEARE: In reference to the placard I should like to explain that I have a copy of it here. It is duly signed. It is dated the 7th July, 1889, and it begins with the words "Mr. Raikes directs." If the right hon. Gentleman was not aware that it had been issued, I think his lack of knowledge shows there is a great deal more disorganisation in the Office than he is aware of.

House adjourned at ten minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 8th July, 1890.

THE MILITARY AND POLICE DISTURBANCES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: As there have been some rather uncertain and conflicting reports regarding the Metropolitan Police and also regarding an incident at Wellington Barracks—although the two matters do not seem to be in connection—I have given private notice to the noble Marquess that I would ask him whether he can state how these matters stand? Of course, I do not ask the question with the slightest intention of embarrassing the Government; but I think an authentic statement, particularly if, as I believe it may be, of a reassuring character, will be satisfactory to the House and to the public.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY):

I have seen the Chief Commissioner of Police, and I gather from him that the disturbance last night has been somewhat exaggerated in the reports which have appeared in the morning papers, and, even according to those reports, was not of a very aggravated character; but it is undoubtedly true that there has been a certain disaffection in a small and limited section of the police, and that it was at Bow Street and in its neighbourhood especially that the influence of that section was felt. Under the circumstances, and as a crowd of a not very reputable character assembled in that locality, the Assistant Commissioner thought it desirable to send for a squadron of the Life Guards. Their appearance was quite sufficient to restore order, and, as far as it is possible to judge, there is no reason for apprehending that order will be disturbed again. If it is, of course there is ample preparation for any such contingency. With respect to the other matter, I speak with more hesitation, in the first place because it is a military matter, on which a civilian must necessarily speak with much doubt, and, also, because it is the subject of investigation by a Court of Inquiry. Therefore, it would be undesirable for me to express an opinion when evidence is being received and sifted, and the result of that evidence will, no doubt, be before the public before long. Though any breach of military discipline is very much to be deplored, and ought to be visited with proper punishment, still, I think that it would be absurd to lend any importance to what has taken place. It is an accidental want of discipline in a particular part of Her Majesty's Army, and I have no doubt that it will be very speedily remedied, and that discipline will be restored.

SETTLED LAND BILL.—(No. 99.)

Reported from the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., with amendments; The Report thereof received; Bill, re-committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 185.)

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ORDERS CONFIRMATION

(No. 14) BILL.

A Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to Aberdeen, Dundee, Glasgow, Kelvinside, and Moss Side and Stretford—Was presented by the Lord Balfour.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): I ask your Lordships to suspend the Sessional Order of the 10th March last, in order to enable the First Reading to be taken of a Bill to confirm certain Electric Lighting Provisional Orders. The circumstances are so very special that I have no hesitation whatever in asking this indulgence from the House, and I believe, when I put a few facts before you, which I will do as shortly as I can, the permission will be given unanimously. Under the Electric Lighting Act of 1882 there was a Schedule which stated, as regards Scotland, both in urban and in rural communities, what public body was to be the Local Authority for the purpose of giving assent under the Electric Lighting Acts; but the draftsman of that Schedule had evidently not been made aware of all the peculiar provisions of the different private Acts affecting the various Scottish burghs, and when this came to be considered for the purpose of getting the assent of the Local Authorities, it became evident that the Act of 1882 and those Private Acts were not consistent with one another. In fact, a very great deal of confusion had arisen, and it became necessary, early in the present Session, to introduce a Bill for the sole purpose of amending the Schedule of that Act. A very great deal of correspondence and negotiation was necessary in order to adjust that Schedule to the requirements of all the different urban and rural communities in Scotland, and it took a considerable time to carry it out. Until that Bill had received the Royal Assent it was technically impossible for the Board of Trade to proceed with the confirmation of those Electric Lighting Acts. That Bill received the Royal Assent on Friday last, and, therefore, I have taken the very earliest opportunity possible of introducing a Bill to confirm the Electric Lighting Orders for the towns mentioned, which Electric Lighting Orders have been adjusted very carefully between the Board of Trade and the different persons concerned, upon the faith and in the belief that the Bill I have mentioned would pass Parliament. With regard to the Kelvinside Electric Lighting Order, which is also confirmed by this Bill, there is the additional difficulty that Glasgow was asking in the present Session of Parliament for a large extension of boundaries, which would have included Kelvinside, and until Parliament had passed judgment upon that Bill, which it has now done, it was impossible for us to say who would be the Local Authority for the purpose of carrying out the Electric Lighting Acts. One of these Electric Lighting Orders refers to a place which is not in Scotland, that is, the Moss Side Order, and that one had to be postponed because there was procedure before the Local Government Board as to another application by the Corporation of the City of Manchester for extending the City boundaries, and if that permission had been given the City Corporation would have become the Local Authority. The Local Government Board have refused that application, and we think the Electric Lighting Order should now be granted. So far as I know, there will be no substantial objection to any of these Orders, and I have every ground for hoping that before the time for dealing with the matter in Committee arrives the opposition will be got rid of. Of course, the only way to test that is to read the Bill a first and second time, and see whether anybody petitions against them. My Lords, if this indulgence is not given, the result will be that the Cities of Aberdeen, Dundee, and Glasgow will be prevented from having electric lighting during the present year, and the matter will have to stand over for another year. Under all the circumstances, I hope the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees will see no objection to the suspension of the Sessional Order, in order to enable this Bill confirming the Provisional Orders I have mentioned.

Moved—

“That the Sessional Order of the 10th March last, ‘That no Bill originating in this House confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a first time after Friday, the 16th day of May next,’ be dispensed with in respect of the said Bill, and that the Bill be now read 1^a.”—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I have very little to say upon this matter. The circumstances, as detailed by the noble Lord opposite, are so very particular that I shall not think of offering any opposition to the Motion he has made.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 1^a accordingly, to be printed, and referred to the Examiners.

INTESTATE ESTATES BILL.—(No. 148.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD BRAMWELL: I think the proposal in this Bill which I ask your Lordships to read a second time is a right one. It applies to the case of a man dying without issue, child, grandchild, or other descendent, intestate, and leaving a widow, and to no other case. If he leaves a will of course the Bill has no application, if he leaves a descendant the Bill has no application, and if he does not leave a widow the Bill does not come into operation. Your Lordships know, I dare say, that at present in such a case as the Bill applies to the widow has half the personal estate, and the next-of-kin, however remote they may be, have the other half of the personal estate. In reference to real property the widow is also entitled to dower, unless the conveyance has been to her husband, and the dower is barred, as it usually is; but practically, I should say that people who die worth no more than this Bill supposes very seldom leave any real property. Substantially, the result is that the widow has half the personalty and the next-of-kin, however remote they may be, get the other half. Of course, the next-of-kin may be the father or the mother of the intestate, but I suppose that is comparatively a rare case, because parents generally die before those of their children as have attained such an age as to leave a widow. Practically, therefore, I believe the Bill will very rarely come into operation except in cases where the competition is between the widow and the collaterals. Now the Bill proposes that in such a case as I have supposed the widow should have a minimum interest in the intestate's property to the amount of £500, which would make some sort of a provision for her. That is the substance of the proposal that is now before your Lordships. If the man dies worth more than £500 up to £1,000, why then his widow gets the £500 only, and the residue is divisible amongst the next of kin. If he dies worth more than £1,000 then the intention of the Bill is that it should not apply that she should have half of the entire sum whatever it may be. Now this is a small matter; I confess, and I cannot see that there is any particular principle in it beyond this, that it is reasonable that the widow should be preferred practically to collaterals. If I am asked why £500 should be named I cannot give any particular reason for it. It might be that £1,000 would be better; it might be that £600 would be better; it might be that £400 would be better; I cannot say. But those who have brought forward the Bill (and your Lordships know, I suppose, that it has passed the Second Reading in the House of Commons) have thought that £500 is a reasonable amount to put in the Bill. I think so too. I do not think it is giving the widow too much, and I do not think it is taking anything unreasonable away from those who would otherwise get the property. I ask your Lordships to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Bramwell.)

LORD MORRIS: Before the Bill is read a second time, as I see it applies to Ireland, where it would make an enormous difference as regards the present state of the law, I should like to say a few words. In Ireland the peasantry and small farmers make some sort of division of their property when in extremis, which is carried out, generally speaking, with a good deal of strictness by their relatives, though it may not be very legal. They are fond of obeying the exhortations and directions of the death-bed. This Bill would have a large effect in Ireland, because £500 there would be a large estate among the class of persons to whom it would apply, and it would lead, in my opinion, not only to a good deal of difference in the state of the law but very often to riots and possibly to murders. We know from what has occurred in Ireland the tenacity with which they hold by their land; and if a man dies and leaves a young widow, and she becomes under this Bill the holder of his land, which might be personal property, and under £500 in value, if she marries and carries off that property to her second husband, the father and mother, brothers and sisters, nephews and nieces, as the case might be, of that man would look upon that personal property as really their own, and according to modern legislation they would be very right in looking at it from that point of view, and, in my opinion, that might lead to most disastrous results. At all events, I do not think it is a matter that ought to be hurriedly run through.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT, 1882, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 164.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD SUDELEY: I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill. Its object is very simple, that is to say, to slightly amend the Act of 1882. Under Clause 2 it gives a certain larger power to the Board of Trade, but I understand that Department has no objection to undertake that additional duty. In Clause 4 of the Act of 1882 the Board of Trade, who undertook the duty, were not to undertake it in respect of the Coal Mines Regulation Act and the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, which were worked under the Home Office; but the arrangement under the Board of Trade has worked so well that the working of those two other Acts has also been placed under them as far as boiler explosions are concerned. Then, under Clause 3 there is an alteration made as to what passed under the Act of 1882. Under the Act of 1882 if a boiler explosion occurred at sea it would have been necessary to make the report to the Board of Trade within 24 hours after the explosion. It is perfectly clear that could not be done in every case, because often it is some weeks before a ship arrives in harbour. This provision is, therefore, to extend the time, by stating "or as soon afterwards as possible." With those alterations in the Bill I beg to move the Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Sudeley.)

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I do not rise to offer any objection to the Second Reading, but only to point out that, though the exemption with regard to steamships in the Act of 1882 is repealed, there is no direct enactment that I can see in regard to the notices which are necessary to be given under certain circumstances. I hope the noble Lord will himself, or by consultation with the promoters of the Bill, consent to put in an Amendment for giving the statutory notice required. There is one other matter of rather more importance, which I hope will receive his attention and consideration. A recent case has occurred which had reference to an explosion on board a small steamboat engaged in fishing, which has shown the Board of Trade that there is no statutory power to compel the owner or his servants to give evidence in such case. We get notice of the explosion, but we get no real information as to how and why it occurred. It seems to the Board of Trade that this would be a favourable opportunity for endeavouring to get further power to ensure that those who knew what occurred should state what really did occur for the information of the Board of Trade and give evidence upon the subject. I do not desire to press for an answer now, but I hope the point will be considered by the promoters of the Bill, because it is one which is not without importance.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think the Bill might go before the Committee of the whole House but for what the noble Lord opposite has said, that it requires inquiry and investigation.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: It is a very simple matter, and I should not object to its being dealt with in Committee of the whole House if your Lordships will agree to it.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1867, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 169.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD REAY: My Lords, the object of this Bill is simply to enable the authorities in burghs to provide hospitals within a convenient distance of the burghs, outside the limits of those burghs, but in close proximity. I understand there is no objection to the Bill, and I beg to move that it be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Reay.)

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): There is no objection to the Bill of which the noble Lord opposite has moved the Second Reading. On the contrary, I think it is a very useful one. One thing, however, I think it is desirable to point out to the noble Lord, and that is that under the Bill it might appear that the powers given might be exercised in a rather arbitrary manner, but, as the whole Bill comes under the 89th section of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, all the provisions of that section are still continued in force; and under that clause it would, except by agreement, be impossible for the Local Authority to take any site beyond the burgh unless by a Provisional Order. As your Lordships are well aware, before obtaining a Provisional Order it is necessary to advertise the matter, and the Provisional Order must at last be sanctioned by both Houses of Parliament. Under those circumstances I think there is no danger of the powers under this Bill being exercised in an arbitrary manner. I am, therefore, very happy to assent to the Bill proposed by the noble Lord.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

IRELAND—OUTRAGES IN TIPPERARY.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I rise to ask for a statement of the outrages which have occurred in or near the town of Tipperary, and of the circumstances; also whether it is true that an explosive was placed recently at the door of an ironmonger named Duggan, who had paid his rent to Mr. Smith-Barry; and whether Duggan has since written a letter giving in his adherence to the National League?

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): The notice of the noble Earl's question has appeared on the Paper for so short a time that I have been unable to obtain for him detailed information with regard to many of the outrages referred to. I am able to state, however, that 25 outrages have been reported by the police as having occurred in Tipperary since December, 1889, in connection with what has been known as the Smith-Barry estate dispute. I hold in my hand the particulars with regard to four or five of these outrages, which, with the permission of the House, I will read. The first is the case of a Mr. Rutherford, who was a boycotted shopkeeper in Tipperary, whose servants all left him. On June 14, 1890, a man named English, who had gone to work for Mr. Rutherford, was assaulted in the street in Tipperary. As he was walking down the street he was struck from behind with a loaded whip, his head being severely cut, and his assailant escaped. In the second case Mrs. Fahey came into the town on June 24, 1890, and purchased an iron pot in the house of Mr. Duggan, a boycotted shopkeeper, and on her way home she was waylaid by a man who took the pot from her by force, saying that the National League had sent him for it, and he warned Mrs. Fahey not to enter Duggan's shop again. In the third case, on June 24th, 1890, a mob collected outside the house of Patrick Clifford, a boycotted news-vendor at Tipperary, and broke the windows with stones, and damage to the value of about £10 was done. Clifford's name appeared on a list of boycotted persons posted over Tipperary in printed notices on June 24. In the fourth case—and this is the case mentioned in the noble Lord's question—on June 28, 1890, an explosive, consisting of a piece of brass piping loaded with gunpowder, was thrown at Duggan's house, and exploded without injuring any person. Duggan was boycotted in Tipperary. As my noble Friend suggests in his question, it is believed that he has since written a letter surrendering himself to the National League. In the fifth case two young girls, servants or work girls to Miss White, a boycotted woman in Tipperary, were attacked in the streets of Tipperary on July 2, by two men, who assaulted them, used abusive language, and threatened them. These men were arrested by the police, and committed to prison in default of bail. Those are five of the latest cases out of the 25 reported by the police. If the noble Lord desires further information on the subject I will endeavour to obtain it, but I am afraid I cannot do more now with the notice I have had.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 8th July, 1890.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL BILL.

(By Order.)

Bill, as amended, considered.

*(3.7.) MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to move, on page 3 of the preamble, to leave out lines 31 to 34 inclusive. This is an Omnibus Bill, promoted by the London County Council, and in it they seek for power to appoint five Members upon the Thames Conservancy Board. The Thames Conservancy, as at present constituted, was incorporated in the year 1857; it was further added to by an Act passed in 1867, and again by an Act of 1886. Since that year there has been no change. But during that time various Bills have been laid before Parliament. The late Metropolitan Board of Works sought on four occasions to have a nominee upon the Conservancy Board, but, after very careful consideration by the Committees to which those Bills were referred, their application was rejected, and they were refused a nomination, because it was considered that the then constitution of the Conservancy Board was such as to secure attention to all the interests along the waterside, and that it was not necessary for the Metropolitan Board of Works to be represented, as they had to deal with the land works, and not with the river generally. I think I am correct in saying that from the first constitution of the Conservancy Board there has been no question as to the way in which the Board has conducted the work assigned to it. It has carefully watched over the interests of the Port of London, and there has been no complaint made against it. When the present Bill was before a Select Committee upstairs, only one member of the London County Council—Mr. Haggis—was examined, and all he had to say was that the County Council wished to be represented. There is no reason to doubt that it is a laudable ambition on the part of the County Council of London to desire representation. It was originally proposed that the Council should have seven members, but the Committee cut down the number to five. As I have said, there was no evidence except that of Mr. Haggis, and he was obliged to confess that there had been no complaint of the way in which the Conservancy Board had executed the duties confided to them. If the present proposal is carried out it means this, that the upper portion of the River Thames will also require to be represented on the Conservancy Board, and, if five members are allotted to the London County Council, of course, the property on the banks of the river or abutting upon it would claim a proportionate representation, and the Conservancy would again become an unwieldy and unworkable body. Under its present constitution the Board is a workable Board, and no person can drive a single pile into the river without the sanction of the Board. Encroachments by that means are prevented, and very valuable work is done. The Select Committee has sanctioned a proposition that the County Council shall have five representatives, but, if that proposal is acceded to, those persons who have interests along the whole banks of the river will not long remain satisfied to be cut out from representation. It will, therefore, be necessary to make provision for a much larger representation than now exists. As I have said, there has been no complaint of the manner in which the present Board discharge their duties; the number of representatives is a workable number, it represents the whole of the area of the City of London, together with the merchandise, shipping, and other interests of the River Thames and the Port of London. The London County Council, as we know, has the conduct generally of the main drainage of the Metropolitan area, and the late Metropolitan Board of Works, whose successors the London County Council are, found in the Thames Conservancy Board a most desirable check upon their proceedings. They were prevented from fouling the river, and, if the proposal now before the House to give a representation of five members of the Conservancy Board to the County Council is entertained, it means that those five members will represent the authority which has to deal with the sewage of London in the Metropolitan area generally, and who would have the power of voting for their own measures, whether they tended to preserve the purity of the Thames or not. I am afraid that the present conduct of the sewage and the management of the outflow where it is dealt with is not so satisfactory that we ought to give to the County Council increased power of voting upon any question upon which the purification of the Thames is dependent, and in addition the representatives of the Council would be both Judges, jury, and plaintiffs in their own case. That, I think, is one of the reasons why it is most inexpedient that this power should be granted to them. It is only the thin end of the wedge that is now sought to be inserted; and I trust that hon. Members will feel generally that it is not for the interest of the Port of London that this portion of the Bill of the County Council should be granted. I therefore beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "so," in line 34, both inclusive.—(Mr. Lafone.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*(3.15.) MR. STORY-MASKELYNE (Wilts, Cricklade): Hon. Members will be aware that I have had something to do with the conservancy of the Thames in the past, and I have therefore a locus standi in asking the House to listen to me for two or three minutes. I beg to second the Amendment which has been moved by the hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Lafone), and I do so not altogether upon the ground upon which the hon. Gentleman relies, but really in the interest of the Thames itself, and of all who are concerned in it, whether they are County Councils or riparian owners or other persons. I am afraid that if we consent to this proposal we shall be in great danger of making this Board of Conservancy still more unwieldy than it is now. It is already a very unwieldy body, and if we are going to add five members to it we shall only make it more unwieldy still. Moreover, we cannot add these five members without accepting the demand of other County Councils up the River Thames that they also shall be represented. I, for one, desire to see all persons who are really interested represented, because I think that the best way of dealing with the many interests relating to the Thames is to have a proper representative body, but not in the unwieldy form which the Conservancy, has had from its first institution as a Board of Riparian Commissioners, nearly 200 years ago. The proposal now made involves our giving a similar unwieldy form to the representation, and I am afraid the result would be practically to constitute a little Parliament as incapable of carrying out really good measures as other Parliaments appear to be. What I feel is that the proper way of dealing with this question is not to add five Members to-day and more Members to-morrow, but to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the whole question of the Conservancy of the Thames, and the reconstitution of the Conservancy Board on a representative basis. That is certainly what we ought to do, if we really desire to carry out the objects of the several useful Acts which have been passed. I may remind the House that the Thames is one of the most ancient highways of the Kingdom, and it is also a recreation ground for a very large section of Her Majesty's subjects. The Bill which I had the honour to introduce and to carry through this House some years ago had for its object the preservation of the Thames for the public, not merely as a place for house boats and skiffs, and for every form of rough to disport upon, but as a place of enjoyment where order is to be kept and something like decency observed. That Act has, I believe, worked exceedingly well, and I am bound to say of the Conservators, that as far as they, not having the moral strength of a representative body, have been able to carry it out, they have endeavoured to do so. Furthermore, it appears that the Thames, as a highway, has been admirably preserved by the Conservators, and they deserve all the credit that can be given to them for keeping its bed and the locks in good condition. They have also done their best, at any rate, to keep it pure. Below London they have had great and difficult problems to deal with, and various Acts of Parliament have placed matters very much beyond their control; but, so far as the upper part of the Thames is concerned, they have done their work well. I feel that no body of this kind, having to deal with large public interests, can in these days effectually deal with them unless it is a representative body, and a representative body in the best sense of the word. Now that we have Local Government, I am of opinion that the best form of representative government would be for every Local Authority along the banks of the Thames, through the County Councils, to have representation upon the Conservancy Board. The proper way to secure that object is not, however, to add five Members to-day and two to-morrow, but to hand the whole matter over to a Select Committee to inquire into and to advise the House as to the best plan for managing what really is the oldest and grandest highway in this country, not merely for commerce, but for pleasure. Therefore, I second the Amendment, because I believe that in retarding the honourable aspirations of the London County Councils to be represented in this large way upon the Conservancy Board I am enlisting the County Council itself on my side when I prefer the request that the House will give us a Select Committee to investigate the whole subject, and endeavour to place it on a proper and satisfactory footing.

the present Bill, and if it is rejected, as my hon. Friend proposes, he will only defeat his own object, and the greatest municipality on the banks of the Thames will continue to be absolutely unrepresented. My hon. Friend says that he thinks the best mode of dealing with the question is to refer it to a Select Committee, before whom the whole of the facts can be presented, and who will present a Report to the House. But that is exactly what has been done already. The clause as it stands in the Bill is the result of the deliberations of a Committee of this House; and yet my hon. Friend suggests that the best mode of dealing with the question is to refer it to a Committee. At the same time, he refuses to endorse the decision to which a Committee has already arrived. If he succeeds in his object, London will have no voice in reference to the management of the Thames. This clause was fully discussed before the Committee upstairs, and I would submit to the House that it is a question more for the consideration of a Committee upstairs than for this House, with the great amount of work it has upon its hands. It will be remembered that the Thames passes for about 23 miles through the administrative county of the Council of London, who have the administration of the bridges and other duties to discharge in reference to the Thames. No doubt those who live in the upper part of the river have a great interest in all that concerns the Thames; but it is obvious that it is of much more importance to the residents on the lower part to control what is done in the upper part than it can be for the upper part to control the lower reaches of the river. Our interest in London, therefore, is much greater than that of those who live on the upper portion of the river. I cordially agree with everything my hon. Friend the Member for Cricklade (Mr. Story-Maskelyne) said in his speech, except in the conclusion he drew. He said that the Thames is a great recreation ground for the citizens of London. That is precisely one of the reasons why we submit to the House that the citizens of London ought, through their representatives, to have some voice in the management of the river. Can it be said that the amount of representation which is proposed is excessive? There will be 28 representatives on the Conservancy Board, and it is only proposed that five should be representatives of the London County Council. The point, however, that is now before the House is not as to the exact number. My hon. Friend does not propose to reduce it to four, three, or two; but he says that the citizens of London, through the County Council, their own representatives, shall have no voice in the management of the Thames. I come next to the question of the River Lea. I am reluctant to occupy the time of the House unnecessarily. The circumstances which relate to the River Lea are mutatis mutandis, very much the same as those which relate to the Thames; but instead of asking for five representatives it is thought that two would afford adequate representation. In that proposal I entirely concur. The County Council accepts the result arrived at by the Select Committee, and I ask the House to support the Committee in the conclusions to which after careful consideration they have arrived.

(3.25.) MR. MURDOCH (Reading): I must reiterate the complaint which was made by the hon. Member for Bermondsey as to the title of this Bill. It is entitled "A Bill for the improvement and alteration of a bridge over Bow Creek at Barking and for the acquisition and management of Brockwell Park."

SIR J. LUBBOCK: Will the hon. Member kindly read the rest of the description of the Bill?

MR. MURDOCH: "And to confer various further powers on the London County Council." That is exactly what I was coming to. I find nothing in the Bill about the bridge at Barking Creek; and in regard to Brockwell Park, every Member of the House will be thankful that something should be done to preserve that open space for the benefit of the Metropolis. But when the Bill goes further and attempts, and under the guise of its provisions, to appoint upon the Thames Conservancy five representatives of the London County Council, most hon. Members will feel that they have been taken by surprise, and that attention has not been properly directed to the provisions of the Bill. I need hardly remind the House that the subject of the Thames Conservancy has received consideration in this House from time to time. Two Acts have been passed—one in 1864 and the other in 1866—which settled most clearly, and I believe most satisfactorily, the constitution of the Thames Conservancy Board. By the Act of 1864, which was brought in at the instigation of the Board of Trade, and upon which Bill I find the names of Mr. Hutt and Mr. Peel, there were added to the Thames Conservancy two owners of shipping, one of steamers upon the Thames, two owners of lighters, and one representative of the dock owners. In 1866 a further Bill was introduced into Parliament, which was entitled "The Upper Navigation of the Thames Bill." That measure also was brought in at the instigation of the Board of Trade, and it has upon it the names of Mr. Milner Gibson, the President of the Board of Trade at that time, and of Mr. Monsell. By that Act four Members were added to represent the upper navigation of the Thames, it being felt that that interest had in former years been greatly neglected, while the interests of the lower river, and especially of London, had been over represented. We must remember that from time to time the Metropolitan Board of Works had endeavoured to get members placed upon the Thames Conservancy Board. Parliament always resisted their endeavours; and, I think, that when we want to know something about a Bill before Parliament it is only right that we should carefully study the statement of the promoters of the Bill. There are a few matters in the present statement which I should like to mention. The first is this: The London County Council, as the successors of the Metropolitan Board of Works, are anxious to have a certain share in the management of the Thames, and they say, "the County Council have extensive sewage works on the river, in connection with which considerable difficulty and costly litigation arose between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Conservancy Board, which it is believed would have been avoided"—I particularly direct attention to these words—"had there been on the Conservancy Board a Representative of the Metropolitan Board of Works." Now, what does that mean? Does it not mean that if they had had Representatives the Metropolitan Board of Works would have had a paramount influence, and would have been able to overturn the decision of the members of the Conservancy Board. Further than this, the London County Council base their claim for representation upon the Board upon the fact that they have to maintain nearly all the bridges crossing the Thames, and certain sewage works. Now, I maintain that having these bridges over the Thames, and having also sewage works which empty themselves into the river, their interests are entirely antagonistic to those of the Conservancy of the Thames, and, therefore, it is of immense importance that they should not have members upon the Conservancy Board who may act against the other interests which that Board represents. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) has called attention to the fact that evidence was taken before the Select Committee in support of the claim of the County Council to have representation upon the Conservancy Board. But I wish to remind the House that only one witness was called—a prominent member of the London County Council—and that Gentleman, although he wished undoubtedly to make the best he could of his case, was not able to say, on cross-examination, that there was any reason or ground of complaint against the Thames Conservancy Board. I have the evidence before me, but I cannot now take up the time of the House by entering into it. If, however, hon. Members will read it, they will see that over and over again Mr. Haggis stated that there was no ground of complaint against the Thames Conservancy Board. And now there is one word I should like to say with regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Cricklade. The hon. Member was himself the means of passing a Bill through this House, which is known by the name of the Story-Maskelyne Act. That Act is one which gives very considerable powers. It deals with the use of the Thames for recreation purposes. It is an extremely useful Act, and it has enabled the Thames Conservancy Board to deal with one of the grounds upon which the London County Council claim the right of representation—that is the recreation ground—and the Conservancy

Mr. Murdock

Board have discharged their duties in that respect in a manner which has given satisfaction, not only to the riparian owners, but to those who use the Thames for recreation purposes. I trust that the House will re-affirm the decision it has given over and over again, namely, that it is against the interests of the Thames itself, and of all of us who take a pride in the river, that certain members, representing either the London County Council or any body of that description, should be placed on the Conservancy Board at the present time.

(3.35.)* MR. H. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): In spite of the pride which the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House takes in the River Thames, the speech of the hon. Gentleman illustrates the hardship and inconvenience of the course which he is taking. The Bill was discussed on the Second Reading, and some of the points which were then disposed of are actually raised now as a reason for mutilating the measure as it has come down from the Committee. The hon. Member shows how we suffer in London from a lack of municipal experience, or he would hardly have told the House that it is an unfair thing to put general powers into a General Powers Bill such as is constantly presented by every great municipality in this country. Precedents were cited by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. Fowler), on the Second Reading of the Bill, to show that there is nothing unusual in bringing in a Bill under a title which includes all the objects set forth. The hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) made that a point on the Second Reading, and as it was disposed of then, it ought not to have been raised again. It would require that Members should read through the evidence submitted to the Committee upstairs, to understand the Bill. It was very completely dealt with by the Committee. Previous Acts of Parliament dealing with Thames Conservancy have been referred to, but they were all adopted on the Reports of Select Committees, and I think it is most inconvenient that when a private Bill has undergone full consideration upstairs, and modified proposals are submitted to the House, general objections should be raised to the measure when it comes down to us.

The hon. Member says that only one witness was called in support of this part of the Bill. Does he know why that was? It was because the Committee did not want to hear more; and not one witness was called against it. That is a specimen of the way in which the Bill is treated now. I should be loth to trouble the House with the evidence which was given, but it is quite clear that nobody is as much interested in the navigation and condition of the Thames as the people whom the London County Council represent. My hon. Friend says that they use it, and want to use it, as a great recreation ground. That was one of the arguments used by counsel in support of our claim, and it was further argued that the London County Council, as riparian owners, and as the Sanitary Authority deeply interested in the supply of pure water to the Metropolis, should have proper representation upon the Conservancy Board. The City of London is already represented. It has, I believe, no less than seven members, including the Lord Mayor. No complaint is made against the Thames Conservancy Board. The Bill is not a blow aimed at the Conservancy Board, but it is simply a claim on the part of the citizens of London for just representation in matters affecting the Metropolis. Twenty-three miles of the river go through the County of London, and at present only $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the City of London are represented. The City with $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles has seven representatives, while the County of London with $21\frac{1}{2}$ miles has none. In olden times this House was content to accept the decisions arrived at by its Committees upstairs. This matter has been carefully gone into by a Select Committee, who investigated the whole question, and I believe that the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Bailey), who presided over the Committee, is prepared to get up and support the decision at which the Committee arrived. Mr. Haggis, the Deputy Chairman of the County Council, stated to the Committee that there is no special grievance against the Thames Conservancy, but he pointed out that the management of the river, both above and below the Metropolis, is a matter vitally concerning the prosperity of London. That is a very sound contention, and as the Council has succeeded the body which freed or built the bridges, with the exception of the three which are within the City boundaries, there is good reason why they should have some control of the river. It is said that as the County Council are the Sewerage Authority in London, their interests are antagonistic to that of preserving the purity of the Thames, and that they might be unfairly employed if that body are allowed to be represented on the Conservancy Board. It is hardly necessary, I think, to point out that the pollution of the Upper Thames is of immense and growing importance to the inhabitants of London, and that they have a greater interest in preventing it than even the Conservancy Board. I will not trouble the House with anything further in the shape of argument. I am content to rest the case upon the evidence taken before the Committee. The simple fact that the Chairman of the Committee, who is known to hon. Members as one of the most fair minded men in the House, stated that the Committee did not wish to hear further evidence, ought, I think, to be sufficient for hon. Gentlemen opposite. The principle of representation on the Lea Conservancy Board is already admitted, because the Metropolitan Board of Works had one representative, and all the Metropolitan community who live in such districts as Hackney are vitally interested in securing that the Lea shall not be further polluted by the Tottenham Board and other Local Authorities. I trust that these clauses will be agreed to without a Division.

*(3.40.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): As the Representative of a constituency which runs for 16 miles along the River Thames, I wish to say that we feel, so far as the upper part of the Thames is concerned, that our representation, instead of being too great at the present moment, is not sufficiently large. The two Acts of 1864 and 1866 went carefully into the question of local interests, and we are certainly of opinion that if an addition is made to the representatives of the lower part of the river we shall be much injured and our interests not properly attended to. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last spoke of the sewage upon other parts of the river. Do the London County Council propose to take charge of the river all the way up to Oxford, or what is it that they propose to do? We consider that we are quite as able to take care of the river as any gentlemen from the London County Council, who have separate and different interests from our own. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the City of London having a large representation; but it must not be forgotten that the City of London is the Port Sanitary Authority; that it pays all the expenses; and that it has given up its dues. It is, therefore, only right and natural that it should be fairly represented, so as to balance the interests of the lightermen in the river below against the riparian interests of the owners in the upper part of the Thames. I do not think there has ever been a complaint against the conduct of the Conservancy Board. Not a single Petition has been presented against them. They have done their work to the best of their ability, and have always done what they considered to be most advantageous for the river. All that is wanted is authority to take care of the river, and I am afraid that the Thames itself is likely to be injured if it is placed under the jurisdiction of any County Council whatever. If London is to have five Members why should not Middlesex have the same or nearly as many representatives upon the Conservancy Board, seeing that nearly as many miles of the river run through it. If the constitution of the Board is to be interfered with at all, let every interest be properly considered, and not that of the London County Council alone. If these clauses are removed from the Bill, all the other provisions that are of value may remain untouched. Hitherto the Conservancy Board has worked very well, and it would be a thousand pities to interfere with what is doing well in order to give additional representation to the London County Council. The extra power could only be sought to cheapen the disposal of the sewage, which would have the effect of making the mouth of the Thames one vast sewer, and would operate to the detriment of trade and the health of the inhabitants.

*(3.45.) SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I submit to the House that the examination which it is possible to give to the Bill here is not sufficient to justify us in assenting to the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bermondsey, and setting aside the decision of the Select Committee. It is quite true, as the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) has stated, that only one witness was called before the Select Committee in support of the claims of the London County Council, but a complete answer to that objection has been given by the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. W. H. Lawson), that answer being first that the Committee expressed themselves satisfied with the grounds on which the general claim of the County Council was put forward; secondly, that no evidence against that claim was offered; and next, on the ground that the Council are supposed to represent the interests of the Metropolis, on whose behalf the claim was made. It seems to me that this fallacy runs through the whole of the arguments which have been advanced by the opponents of the measure:—They have been arguing the question as if in this matter the County Council have an interest opposed to the general interests of the community. [MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: Hear, hear!] Apparently the hon. Member who has just sat down maintains that position, and is of opinion that the London County Council have interests in the matter which are opposed to the general interests of the community. Now, what are they? The County Council are the largest Representative Body in London; they are directly elected by the inhabitants of the Metropolis; they have jurisdiction over a frontage of 23 miles on each side of the river, and at this moment they have no direct representation on the Conservancy Board, while the City of London, with a frontage of only one and a half miles, is represented by seven Members. I will not stop to consider whether the representation of the City of London is excessive or only the proper amount of representation, but I would ask, that being the state of the case, upon what ground it can be said that the London County Council, representing such extensive interests, and charged with the responsibility of representing the wants and wishes of such a large portion of the community, can probably run counter to the general interests of the Metropolis. So far as the Metropolitan Sewage Scheme is concerned, as it at present exists, it has received the sanction of Parliament, and the sewage itself is discharged into the Thames very much below the part of the river which we are considering now. I submit that the claim which the London County Council has preferred to having an increased representation of five members upon the Conservancy Board is simply a proper or fair recognition of the position they occupy. As regards the River Lea their claim is, in my judgment, even much stronger. I do not know a more disgraceful history than the history of the pollution of the River Lea, and I am satisfied that if the Council had had a share in the control of the river, and possessed representatives who were directly interested in maintaining the purity of the Lea, it would not have been reduced to the shocking position which it has occupied of late years in the lower parts of the river. I submit that the claim of the London County Council to have five seats on the Conservancy Board is moderate, just, and proper, and as they have no interests which are in conflict with those of the general public they ought not to be excluded from it.

Mr. Dixon-Hartland

*(3.50.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I desire to speak without prejudice in regard to the London County Council. I am glad that Parliament has entrusted to them the power they now enjoy, and I have no jealousy whatever of them. As far as I am concerned, I should be glad to see their interests fully represented on the Conservancy Board, but I cannot agree with what has fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell). In the first place I cannot admit that this question has been fairly considered, if by that term is meant the kind of consideration which Parliament in former years bestowed upon it. I can remember being a Member of a Select Committee on the Thames which considered the Bill of 1866, carried through this House by Mr. Milner-Gibson. Before the passing of the Act of 1864, a Select Committee of this House was appointed to consider how the matter could best be dealt with, and, in 1864, a Bill was brought in, I think, by the Government of the day. At any rate, it was a Hybrid Bill, and was considered by a Hybrid Committee, before whom all the interests affected were adequately heard; the same course being taken in 1866, and again two years ago, when a Select Committee, appointed at the instance of my hon. Friend the Member for Cricklade, considered the reform of the traffic on the Thames, and in the following year the conclusions of this Committee were embodied in a Hybrid Bill, and considered by a Hybrid Committee. Thus Parliament has determined, in dealing with the Thames, to treat it as a public matter, and not as one to be dealt with in a Private Bill. What has happened in this case? The London County Council, in the exercise of their judgment and discretion, have considered that they are injuriously affected by having no direct representative on the Board of Conservancy, and, therefore, in a private Bill ostensibly relating to very different subjects, they have introduced a clause to give them that representation. This was to be done by an ordinary Private Bill, by a Committee before whom only one witness was examined, and not a single word was heard from the rival interests of the Upper Thames, which possibly did not even know that the matter was being dealt with by Parliament. I myself have no fault to find with the Thames Conservancy, as at present constituted. I believe that it does its duty very well, but, on the other hand, I quite admit that there may be just arguments for the more direct representation of the inhabitants of London on that Board. At present, seven members are sent by the City, and four by certain trading interests, so that London has altogether a representation of 11 out of 23. This Bill proposes to extend the metropolitan representation to 16 out of 28. I confess that it appears to me that the proposal is not fair to the interests of the Upper Thames. What reason can there be for the representation of the London County Council upon this Board that does not equally extend to the Councils of other counties which border on the Thames? Essex, Surrey, Kent, Oxfordshire, Berkshire, Wilts, and Gloucestershire. I think that in these circumstances the wisest course will be for the House to decline to adopt the proposal contained in this Bill relating to this matter, and next year to appoint a Select Committee to consider the whole question of the conservancy of the Thames. In that way the House would have all the riparian and other interests fully awake to the necessity of taking care of themselves; complete evidence would be given in regard to the whole subject, and it would be able to arrive at a fair conclusion on a subject which has hitherto been treated as a public matter, and one which ought not to be dealt with by a private Bill.

*(3.55.) SIR J. BAILEY (Hereford): As Chairman of the Committee which considered the Bill, I wish to say a word in the first place as to the title of the Bill. When it came before the Committee it was a Bill "For the improvement and alteration of the Bridge over Bow Creek and Barking and to confer other powers." The Committee cut out of the Bill the question of a bridge between the London County Council and a neighbouring area, on finding that the County Council had not agreed with the neighbouring area. The title of a Bill, however, cannot, I believe, be changed when it has once come before the House. I certainly cannot altogether agree with the remarks which have fallen from my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade as to what he says Parliament has done in regard to the Thames Conservancy, as I find that the original Conservancy Act was one of the few Acts concerning the Metropolis which was introduced as a private and not as a public Bill. In 1857 the Thames Conservancy Bill was introduced as a private Bill, and Sir E. May, in his chapter on private Bills, has pointed out that in 1874-5-6-7 Bills to give further powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works were passed as private Bills. With regard to the fact of only one witness having been examined, I may say that there had been another Bill before us, relating to the Conservancy, and we felt that we did not require much more evidence than that which had been given before that Committee. Therefore, when this Bill came before us we had no desire to hear many witnesses. The Thames Conservancy has been undergoing a perpetual change since it was first established. At first the Trinity House regulated the lower reaches, and the Corporation went up as far as Staines, while above that there was a heterogeneous body, consisting of all the authorities of the riparian counties, including Berkshire and Oxfordshire. An Act was then passed appointing 12 Conservators, seven representing the City of London, and five the Trinity House, the Lord High Admiral, and other interests, while, by a subsequent Act, representation was given to certain traders. When, by a later Act, representation was given to the traders, wharf owners and occupiers, ship proprietors, and so on, the control of the Upper Thames was united with that of the Thames below Teddington Lock, and four representatives were given to the upper portions of the river. An hon. Member sitting below me has spoken of the Board of Trade in this matter, and I should like to show what the opinion of the Board of Trade was. In 1867, when this matter was before the House of Commons, the Board of Trade wrote a letter in which they stated that it appeared to them to be desirable that the Metropolitan Board of Works—of which the London County Council is the successor—should be connected with and represented on the Thames Conservancy Board. That was the opinion of the Board of Trade in 1867. Since then, in the year 1888, the conservancy of rivers has been given to County Councils, and it seems to me absurd that this great municipality of London should be the only County Council not having some power of control over its own river. An hon. Member has said it is absurd to suppose that the London County Council can look after the river at Oxford, and in the upper reaches of the Thames. Then why should four Members from Oxford and Berkshire take part in the management of the tidal stream? Since the opinion of the Board of Trade was given in 1867, the Metropolitan Board of Works and their successors the London County Council have done an enormous amount of work in the valley of the Thames. They have control of the metropolitan bridges and embankments, which cost £22,000 or £23,000 a year, and upon which £2,500,000 have been spent. Most of the drinking water of London is derived from the Thames and the Lea, and surely the body which has the right to look after the health of the Metropolis should be represented on the Thames Conservancy. They have exclusive jurisdiction over a frontage of 21½ miles of the river, and I must say that I do not think any Committee upstairs could have come to any other conclusion than that a body having that enormous authority over the banks of the Thames are entitled to have some share in the management of that river.

(4.0.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): After the remarks which have been made by the hon. Baronet opposite, I think that very little further need be said on the subject. Therefore, I do not propose to detain the House for more than a minute or two. On the part of the County Council of London, I think I may say that they will hear with pleasure the promise which has been made by the President of the Board of Trade that there will be a Select Committee on the whole question next year. I think it would be of the greatest advantage to all concerned that the matter should be thoroughly threshed out and determined. In the meantime, however, I think it would be necessary to pass the measure now before the House, in order that the London County Council may be properly represented on this particular Board. As I understand the question, the only argument against giving representation to the London County Council is that if it is granted some evil must happen to the Thames. Now, no evil can possibly come of appointing five members out of 28, and the views of the London County Council would then be properly laid before the Board.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: The City of London already possesses seven representatives.

EARL COMPTON: I am only speaking about what is asked for in this Bill. All that is claimed is that the London County Council should have five representatives upon the Board. The hon. Member appears to foresee danger from the appointment of five Members, but I would ask what possible evil effect a small minority of five could have among 28. What harm to the river or the interests of the riparian owners could such a minority do? The only effect of acceding to the claim of the Council would be to secure that the views of the Council would be properly placed before the Board, and I cannot see why the Conservancy Board should be so very anxious not to have those views placed before them. There is one question I would like to ask, namely, whether Her Majesty's Government are unanimous in their opposition to this provision of the Bill? I have been given to understand that the President of the Local Government Board is distinctly in favour of it. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman is not in his place at this moment, but I hope that before the discussion closes we shall have the advantage of hearing his views. At present only one Member of the Government has spoken; he has opposed the Bill; not altogether, on its merits, but in order that a Select Committee may be appointed next year. Are we to understand, from the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Government wish their supporters to vote against the Bill, if it goes to a Division? As I believe that the President of the Local Government Board is favourable to the Bill, I think that he ought to give expression to his opinion, so that the Division may not be considered in any way a Party one. At the same time I know that a Whip has been issued to Members on the other side of the House, with a view of opposing this particular clause and certain other clauses which are about to be discussed. The supporters of the Bill have had no Whip of any kind. They think the justice of the case ought to be quite sufficient to secure a large majority in favour of the Bill, of those who have listened to the Debate after the plain and clear statement of the Chairman of the Select Committee. I think that no hon. Member who heard him can have the slightest hesitation in supporting the clauses which propose to give a representation to the London County Council upon the Thames Conservancy Board.

(4.7.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As the noble Lord has referred to me, I feel bound to say just one word upon the subject. The noble Lord is perfectly accurate in saying that I am distinctly in favour of the London County Council being represented on the Thames Conservancy Board. Having constituted a great body like the London County Council, it ought to have something to say with regard to a river which runs through so large a portion of its district; but as to whether or not the representation proposed in this Bill is too large—whether it is adequate or inadequate I do not express any opinion, and on that question I desire to withhold my opinion.

I think the course suggested by my right hon. Friend (Sir M. Hicks Beach) is the right and proper course. It is quite clear that if the London County Council are to be represented on the Board there will be claims for representation on the part of other County Councils through whose district the river runs; and that they also should have representation given to them. That, I take it, would be the view of the London County Council also; and that being so, I should deprecate the London County Council proceeding with these clauses this year, looking to the fact that the matter, by their own admission, is one that ought to be carefully considered by a Select Committee, with a view of settling the representation of the various interests concerned.

(4.10.) SIR W. HARCOURT(Derby): I am glad, at all events, that we have had the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that London has some interest in the River Thames, and that Representatives of London should have a voice in its management. I am very glad to find that one right hon. Gentleman sitting on that Bench holds that opinion.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I said so, too.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I am glad to find that two Members of the Government have declared in favour of such representation. The question we have to vote upon now is whether we should upset the decision of the Committee which has sat upstairs. That is a very grave thing for the House to do. We hear a great deal as to the desirability of the process of delegation; but if we delegate duties of this kind, and then upset the decision arrived at, I am afraid we shall give the House more work to do than we shall escape by the delegation. On what ground is it proposed to reverse the decision of the Select Committee? I have heard none, except that the matter can be taken into consideration next year. I think it would be most inconvenient to appoint Committees and then to dispose of the result of their deliberations in this manner. The Chairman of the Committee in his business-like speech gave the reasons for the decision which the Committee has arrived at, and I have heard no arguments from the other side of the House which should induce us to upset that decision. Why, then, are we to overthrow the decision of the Committee? The President of the Local Government Board has alleged none. He has said, and said truly, that what this clause does, namely, to give a representation to the London County Council upon the Conservancy Board, is a proper thing. The acceptance of the representation of London proposed by the Bill does not exclude the representation hereafter of other County Councils on that Board. Nor is there any reason why we should delay doing justice to the Metropolis in the matter, because there is not yet a proposal before the House to give representation to other County Councils. It is perfectly possible to give representation to London—and London, after all, is the first interest so far as the Thames is concerned, both in regard to its trade, its water supply, and its population—and to take other claims into consideration hereafter. No doubt there are other important claims, but the claim of London ought not to be postponed until other bodies make theirs. There is nothing whatever in the present proposal to exclude Parliament, if it thinks fit, from giving representation to other bodies; but the first and primary claim is that of the County Council of London, and I hope that it will be affirmed by the House.

Mr. Ritchie

(4.12.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I desire to oppose the claim of that august body, the County Council of London, in the interests of my constituents, the sailors and fishermen who ply their calling between Erith and the North Sea. They believe that their interests will be seriously affected by the adoption of Clause 22 of the Bill, and I should like to call attention to the circumstances which already exist, and of which they now complain. The London County Council, as the apostolic successors of the Metropolitan Board of Works, are responsible for the gigantic nuisance caused by the sewage work at Crossness, Barking. Sir Robert Rawlinson has stated that 150,000,000 gallons of sewage affluent are thrown into the River Thames daily. That, as was said by Lord Rosebery in his valedictory address to the County Council on the 23rd of April, was considered absolutely intolerable by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and they ordered the construction of two steamers to remove the sewage sludge to the Nore. It is now in process of removal, not to the Nore, but to the fishing ground of my constituents 15 miles further down. Two schemes are before the Main Drainage Committee, both of which have the utmost terror for my constituents. One, is that Canvey Island should be filled to the brim with sewage, and the other that a canal 46 miles long should be constructed through the County of Essex to take the sewage out to Foulness and Shoebury, thereby entirely destroying the oyster fisheries of the Crouch, and also probably destroying one of the few flourishing towns of Essex, namely, Southend. I do not mean to say that the County Council are not right from their point of view; and choosing the line where they are likely to meet with the least possible resistance, they propose to go to Essex. My constituents, however, are determined to oppose this portion of the Bill to the full extent of their power.

(4.15.) Mr. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.), who was indistinctly heard owing to loud calls for a Division, said: I think it may expedite matters if I make now the remarks I intended to make upon another clause of this Bill. Parliament has decided, after great care and deliberation, to provide a Board of Conservancy for the River Thames, and I do not think that the recommendation of a Committee, who only examined one witness, ought to be adopted. The witness who was called on behalf of the County Council — Mr. Haggis — was cross-examined by Mr. Littler, and being questioned as to whether the Council were not proposing mere theoretical legislation, he said he thought the river was more likely to be kept clear and pure by having the people of London represented on the Board than by excluding them. But with regard to the representation of the people of London, it is a well-known fact that the interests of the County Council and of the Thames Conservancy are sometimes diametrically opposed. It is said that the County Council have the management of the bridges. No doubt; but in constructing new ones and maintaining the existing bridges, it is often necessary to drive piles into the river, and the Thames Conservancy acts as a great check at present in preventing obstruction. Moreover, as has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Essex (Major Rasch), the sewage of London is, to a great extent, under the control of the County Council, and if they neglect to do their duty the Conservancy Board is able to bring pressure to bear upon them. If, however, you give the Council five representatives upon the Board, you will have men who will be able to act as judges in their own case. In my opinion, the best mode of dealing with the subject will be to relegate it to a Select Committee for examination next year, as suggested by the President of the Board of Trade. The House will then be in a position to legislate carefully for all the various interests at stake.

(4.33.) Mr. WEBSTER: After the decision of the House which has just been expressed as to the further representation of the County Council on the Thames Conservancy Board, I think it is unnecessary for me to enter at any length into the arguments which can be adduced against the Council having further representation on the Conservancy Board of the River Lea. I think the whole of the question of representation on the Thames and Lea Conservancy Boards should be considered, as was suggested by the hon. Member for Cricklade, by a Select Committee of the House, and therefore I do not propose to speak at any length on the point. I fully acknowledge that the state of the River Lea is, and has been, unsatisfactory for some years past, but how the presence of another representative of the County Council upon the Conservancy Board could effect any great change in the condition of the river I fail to understand. I beg to move the rejection of that part of the Preamble which relates to the Lea, and I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite not to put the House to the trouble of a Division.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 1, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "increased," in line 8, both inclusive.—(Mr. Webster.)

* (4.34.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I must confess that I am surprised by the action taken by Her Majesty's Government. By the reply the Government gave to the deputation which waited upon them the other day, we understood they were prepared to support these clauses. Last night I had an interview with my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, and I certainly understood from him that, although he was going to move for a Committee, the Motion would not interfere with his support of the clauses we have just been discussing. Had we known that the Government were going in the opposite Lobby and going to take their supporters with them, we should have thought it necessary to issue a whip, too. The clause, however, with reference to the Lea stands in a very different position to that which relates to the Thames, and I should like to know what Her Majesty's Government propose to do in regard to it? If they are going to include an inquiry into the Lea in the reference to the Committee they have proposed—[Cries of "No!"—] I am only expressing my own opinion—it would be useless to occupy the time of the House by going to a Division on the question of the Lea. I should imagine, however, that the Committee which is to inquire into the Thames will have quite enough to do, and I can hardly think Her Majesty's Government would propose to include the inquiry into the management of the Lea. If that is the case, I hope the President of the Local Government Board will support the London County Council and will resist the present Amendment. This is a large question, and the Bill has been very carefully inquired into by a Committee upstairs. The Bill is now in the form in which it left the Committee, and I hope that, notwithstanding the Division just taken, the majority of the House will support the decision of their own Committee.

* (4.36.) MR. RITCHIE: I am bound to say the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Lubbock) has hardly dealt fairly with us as to what took place between himself and myself last night. The right hon. Baronet says that in the interview I had with him last night I conveyed to him an intimation that the Government were going to support the clause with regard to the Thames Conservancy. I went to see the right hon. Baronet with the view of expressing to him the contrary, and I told the right hon. Baronet that, after the interview I had had with the deputation from the London County Council, I thought it right he should know that it was extremely probable that the clause with regard to the Thames Conservancy would be opposed. I thought the right hon. Baronet understood that the object of the interview was to convey that, because he expressed his thanks to me for the intimation which I had given to him to that effect. The interview I had with the deputation of the London County Council was with reference to all the opposed clauses of the Bill. It is perfectly true I allowed the County Council deputation to infer or to believe that I was in favour of the representation of the London County Council upon the Thames Conservancy Board, but I certainly did not commit myself or my right hon. Friend, with whose Department this question more particularly lies, to an approval of the exact proposal made in the Bill. The only intimation I made was that I was in favour of that representation. This particular question, however, stands on a different footing. Something has been said about the water supply of London. If there is one river which the London people are more concerned about with regard to its purity than any other it is the River Lea. The London County Council have already got a representation upon the Conservancy Board of the Lea—a representation of one—and looking to the fact that a Committee of the House of Commons has considered that that representation ought to be increased from one to two, I shall certainly support the clause.

* (4.39.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I only wish to say I am sorry I did not understand my right hon. Friend. I understood that the clause would be opposed, but not that it would be opposed by the Government. However, my main object was not to make any complaint, but to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman the course which he proposed to take.

(4.40.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not propose to enter at all into the misunderstanding which appears to have arisen between the Government and their supporters on this side of the House, but I want to thoroughly understand the attitude of the Government on the whole question, because it is one which deeply affects the people of the Metropolis, and one which, no doubt, they will follow with a very attentive eye. By the last Division the Government and their supporters resolved that London, through her County Council, shall not have a voice on the Thames Conservancy. [Cries of "No, no!"] That is what the Vote means. Now comes the question whether the Council shall have a voice in the management of the Lea, and the President of the Local Government Board says, "Oh, yes; they shall have a voice on the Lea, but not on the Thames."

*MR. RITCHIE: I did not vote.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If he did not, the whole force of the Government was used in the last Division—[cries of "No!"]—and the result of the Division was received with cheers by hon. Gentlemen opposite as a Party triumph. ["Who were the Tellers?"] I am stating that which is an undoubted fact.

An hon. MEMBER: A lot of the Members for London voted against the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes; and it is not merely the Government on that side, but the Government on this side who voted against it. It was really a good Unionist Division. I saw it myself. I saw that it was a question whether the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale was to be told in the Lobby against the Amendment. ["Oh!"] I have a perfect right to refer to the fact; I have a right to state that I noticed it was a question whether the noble Lord should be polled in the Division against giving London, through the County Council, a voice upon the management of the Thames. Under these circumstances, and by these influences, London has been, for the present at least, refused that voice. Whether it will ever get it in the future we do not know. Whether there will be a combination to overthrow the decision of the Committee remains to be seen. What is the use of promising a Committee if you whip up a majority to overthrow the Committee's decision? What is the use of promising a Committee on this subject if you mean to treat the decision of the Committee with the contempt with which you have treated the decision of the present Committee? Now, having decided against the London County Council in regard to the Thames, on what ground does the right hon. Gentleman say London is entitled to a voice as regards the Lea? If you are to postpone the question as to London till next year, why not postpone the question as to the Lea as well? He says London is not dependent upon the Thames for its water supply. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman is right; but I thought a very great part—I even believed the greater part—of the water supplied to London is taken from the Thames above Kingston. I cannot understand, and it will be for the people of London to endeavour to understand, what is the ground that actuates the Government in refusing to London's representative body to-day a voice in the management of the Thames, and then coming forward and saying they are entitled to that voice in the case of the Lea.

*(4.45.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think it would be easy to get into the space of time occupied by the right hon. Gentleman's speech a graver or a more absurd amount of Party misrepresentation. In the first place, this was not a Party Division. Two Members of the Government voted in the opposite Lobby to myself. Some Members of the Government did not vote at all. One of the Tellers for the minority was a staunch supporter of the Conservative Party, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, and the Chairman of Committees, both leading Unionists, were in the opposite Lobby to us. Secondly, we do not oppose the principle of the representation of the London County Council upon the Thames Conservancy. What we contended for was that, before the principle was adopted by the House, the whole question of the representation of the other riparian County Councils should be considered as well. That I think the right hon. Gentleman will see, if he reflects for a moment, is the only reasonable and just course. It is not merely a matter of opinion. It is a course which the House has adopted for the last 25 years in dealing with the question of the government of the Thames. If such a Committee is moved for next Session my impression is that it is probable that the Conservancy Body will be so re-modelled as to include the representation of the London County Council and the other County Councils affected as well. But of one thing I am quite sure; if this Bill had been passed this year, as it has been passed by the Select Committee, a larger representation would have been given to the Metropolitan interest out of the whole number than is likely to be given after full and impartial consideration. I have only to say now I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend in considering that the question of the conservancy of the Lea stands as it has always been regarded by Parliament on an entirely different basis to that of the conservancy of the Thames. I therefore trust that my hon. Friend behind me will not think it necessary to press his Amendment to a Division.

*(450.) MR. LAWSON: We do not know what the next Session may bring forth, and I should like to challenge the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that the majority of his supporters on that side did not vote against the principle of the representation of the London Council on the Thames Conservancy Board. They struck out words in the Preamble, and, therefore, under this Bill there can be no representation of the London Council on that Board for the next year, or until the House has accepted the decision of the Committee in favour of such representation which may or may not be made. The course pursued by the Government, and I speak from the view of the County Council, and not from a Party standpoint, has been rather tortuous as well as unfortunate. The President of the Local Government Board told the deputation who waited upon him that he was in favour of all the clauses except that which dealt with juries, as to the desirability of which he was not quite certain. At the last moment, at the eleventh hour, when the Parliamentary Agent understood the Bill would not meet with opposition from the Government, or from the prominent Members of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman turns round and declares against the Bill on the ground put forward by the President of the Board of Trade. I do not know who the two Members of the Government were who voted in our Lobby, but I do not think they saw many of their supporters there. I am glad to think that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) was a sufficiently staunch County Councillor not only not to repudiate the Council in this House, but to tell in favour of the Bill, and I regret that the other Conservative Members of the County Council were not present to take part in the Division.

*(452.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I propose to speak to the Amendment, and not to address myself to the question of the Division that has just taken place. There are a number of very delicate interests connected with the River Lea; and in 1868 a Royal Commission, which considered the whole question, nicely balanced all these interests and apportioned the proper number of members on the Lea Conservancy Board to each. The number of members was fixed at 13, and care was taken to provide that no interest should be over-represented. This was confirmed by the Act under which the Lea Conservancy Board was constituted. It is possible that by lapse of time the arrangement then made may be properly disturbed, but, if so, it should only be after such a full inquiry as took place in 1868. Several times the Metropolitan Board of Works endeavoured to increase their representation on the Lea Conservancy Board, and several times Parliament refused to let them do so. We are now asked to disturb the present basis of representation merely because a Committee of four upstairs voted in favour of it. With all respect to the hon. Baronet who was Chairman of that Committee, those of us who are experienced in Committee work know that such decisions are often arrived at merely by the vote of the Chairman. The only reason that is given for the proposed change is that the representative of the County Council may be unwell or unable to be present. The same reasoning would apply to the other bodies that are represented, and there can be no more reason for giving the County Council two members instead of one than for giving the other bodies two instead of one.

*(454.) SIR C. RUSSELL: The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) affirmed that he was in favour of the principle of the representation of the County Council, and did not express even a personal opinion that the representation claimed by the present Bill was an excessive or improper amount of representation. Yet the right hon. Gentleman did not vote in the Division. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) has now made it very clear what is the real attitude of the Government on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman has informed the Committee that he looks forward to the diminution, and not the increase, in the future of the representation.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Including the remainder.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: But he holds to the opinion that that would be too large a representation of the London County Council. So far as the representation of the other bodies is concerned, there is no division of opinion on this side of the House. We ask that all the interests concerned in the River Thames shall be represented upon the Board; but how can this question of re-modelling the Conservancy Board be injuriously affected in any way by the acceptance of the just claim now made by the County Council? As regards the question of the River Lea, I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board spoke for the Government or not. It is desirable to know whether he did or did not. If he did, I will not prolong the discussion. Of course, if he was not justified in speaking in the name of the Government it will be necessary to justify the view taken by the Committee upstairs; but, for the present, assuming that he was representing the views of the Government, I do not propose to trouble the House further.

(456.) MR. R. G. WEBSTER: I beg leave to withdraw up to line 13 of the Amendment.

*MR. SPEAKER: The omission was only moved up to line 8.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(457.) MR. R. G. WEBSTER: I beg now to move the omission of lines 13 to 18 inclusive.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must observe that lines 14 to 18 embrace matters of very wide divergence. They include the building powers of the County Council, and the powers relative to the supply of water and to the markets of London.

(458.) MR. R. G. WEBSTER: Then, with the permission of the House, I will move the omission of lines 13 to 15 inclusive. My remarks on this Amendment shall be very brief. It appears, Sir, that by these lines various changes will be made in the Building Acts of London. Some of these changes are very desirable, and if they become law will be very useful. My objection to them is that they should be introduced by means of a Private Bill. I think it is quite contrary to the practice of Parliament that such provisions should be inserted in Private Bills, and I would point out the great difficulty that will be caused to architects, surveyors, and other persons interested in buildings in London if we allow the London County Council to introduce various changes in the Building Acts through the instrumentality of a private measure. At present there is before a Committee, presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan), a public Bill introduced by the London County Council. I think it would be a very proper thing if these provisions were removed from this Bill, with which they have practically nothing to do, and put into the public Bill, so that they may be discussed in all their bearings. It is an extremely inconvenient thing to have these Bills shot into the House of Commons by the County Council, with provisions in them which, if adopted, would make the legislation of this House very confusing indeed. I therefore ask that these provisions should be taken out of this Bill and referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings of the Metropolis.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 13, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "forth," in line 15, both inclusive.—(Mr. Webster.)

*MR. RITCHIE: I hope that the House will not assent to the proposal which has just been made. I think the object of my hon. Friend in moving the omission of these lines is to cut down a Bill which will give the London County Council some controlling power with regard to the manner in which public buildings in the Metropolis shall be erected. I have gone carefully through all these clauses, and I have had them examined by my professional adviser; and though perhaps they may be open to some improvement, yet on the authority of the information I have received I say that every one of them is a great advance on the existing law, and I therefore hope that the House will not cut them out.

(5.1.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am extremely glad to hear the language held by the right hon. Gentleman. It is language too rare on the other side of the House. Public attention is a good deal occupied at present with the question as to how the time of the House of Commons is being spent. I hope it will be noted what is the subject to which Her Majesty's Government and their supporters have devoted this afternoon. There has been an attempt to overthrow, clause by clause, the decision of a Committee upstairs upon a private Bill. That is the sort of occupation which they think most fit for the House of Commons. The object is apparent. It is to cut down as much as possible—of course, I am not speaking of the right hon. Gentleman, because that has never been the spirit in which he has spoken or acted—and to refuse to the County Council, as representing the City of London, the only possible power and authority which affects the interests of the inhabitants of London. Everybody knows that that is the spirit of the opposition to this Bill. That is the spirit which dictated the Division just taken, the object of which was either to refuse the power altogether or, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said, at least to cut down the number of the County Council representatives on this body.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The right hon. Gentleman will excuse me, but that is not what I said. I pointed out that there were already seven Members sent by the City to the Conservancy Board, and I suggested the proposed increase of members from the County Council in addition to those members was hardly fair in the interests of the Upper Thames.

Mr. Ritchie

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I hope the House will not stray from the Amendment before it, which relates to further provisions for buildings.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If hon. Members choose to have these Debates they must not object if we take part in them. It is not we who raised this discussion. We should have been extremely glad to have assented to the decision of the Committee. We have asked you to abide by it; but clause by clause, and section by section, hon. Members opposite have tried to defeat it. A great deal of time has already been spent on this matter. I hope that now hon. Members opposite will take the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and allow the House to come to a decision on it.

(5.5.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman in the somewhat acrimonious line of debate he has adopted; but I think that the President of the Local Government Board has entirely misunderstood the intentions of the proposer of the Amendment. His intention is not to cause certain clauses relating to buildings in the Metropolis to disappear altogether, but it is to cut them out of this Bill, for the purpose of tacking them on to a Public Bill called the Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill. I submit that Clauses 33 and 34, which are governed by this part of the Preamble which it is now proposed to omit, might be very appropriately transferred to the Bill I have mentioned, because it deals with practically the same subject—it deals with kindred matters. I think that for the public convenience, for the convenience of those who have to follow these Acts of Parliament, and for the simplification of the law, it would be a very desirable thing indeed to have these clauses relating to buildings in London—which, as my hon. Friend has pointed out, really have no proper place in this Bill—taken out of it and moved in the form of a new clause in the Public Bill standing in the name of the right hon. Baronet opposite. I have reason to know that some of the authorities of the House are in favour of the transposition of these clauses as suggested; and I therefore hope that the House will give a candid and impartial consideration to the change, which I, for one, certainly advocate in no spirit of hostility or obstruction, but merely for the convenience of the public and the simplification of our Statute Law. If the Amendment is carried, I shall put down the clauses thus cut out as new clauses to the Public Bill.

*(5.8.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: The hon. Member said he wished the clauses to be referred to the Committee sitting upstairs on the Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill. But there is no Committee sitting on that Bill. The Committee has reported the Bill to the House. I do not deny that there might be some convenience if the clauses could be incorporated in that Bill; but I am not encouraged to adopt the course suggested by the hon. Member, because he himself blocked that Bill last night.

MR. BAUMANN: I hope the right hon. Baronet will allow me to explain that I blocked the Bill in order to await the result of this discussion. If these clauses are cut out of this Bill I shall put down a Motion to re-commit the public Bill for the purpose of tacking them on to it.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: If the hon. Member really wishes that these clauses should be inserted in that Bill, surely his course last night should have been to move the re-committal of the Bill. But, exercising his rights as a private Member, he simply blocked the Bill when it came on after 12 o'clock. I am afraid that if I were to adopt his suggestion now these clauses, which everybody admit to be valuable ones, would be lost altogether. Under these circumstances, I hope the hon. Member will withdraw his Amendment.

*(5.12.) MR. H. LAWSON: I am afraid that the zeal of the hon. Member for the simplification of the law will only lead to blocking Metropolitan business. If his suggestion were adopted, the probability is that these clauses would not pass into law this Session at all. I originally moved the Second Reading of the Bill, and it was impossible to negotiate with hon. Members opposite, who refused to allow the Committee stage to be taken. But now the state of public business is such that it is highly improbable the enemies of the London County Council in this House will allow it to pass a further stage. It would therefore be unwise to excise these clauses from the Bill now before us, in order to get them inserted in the other Bill.

*(5.13.) MR. MURDOCH: I think that in the interests of builders, surveyors, architects, and others, it would be well to adopt the suggestion of my hon. Friend, as it would simplify matters very much if all clauses relating to buildings in the Metropolis were to be found in one Bill. We are now discussing the London County Council Bill, but there is nothing in the title which will enable surveyors, architects, builders, and others to know that it contains clauses which affect their business. It would be far better to have all these provisions in one Bill.

*(5.14.) MR. RITCHIE: I have on hand at the present time a Bill consolidating the law with regard to all these matters in London, and I hope soon, by means of it, to place in the hands of all concerned a complete list of the provisions affecting them.

(5.15.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I am very pleased to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to consolidating the Bill with regard to buildings in London. I rose for the very purpose of making such a suggestion. I think at the present time, if hon. Members believe these clauses are of importance, the best plan will be to allow them to pass. To agree to such an Amendment as this when we are approaching the middle of July, and to attempt to transfer them from one Bill to another, as to which there is a strong probability that it will not pass into law, will not certainly be a wise course to pursue. It is, I think, a very ingenious mode of getting rid of the clauses altogether. Those who have a deep interest in the welfare of the Bill have nothing to gain by this proposed transference.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER: After the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board I beg to ask leave to withdraw my Amendment. ["No, no."]

Question put, and agreed to.

*(5.16.) MR. R. G. WEBSTER: With regard to Clause 32, which exempts members of the County Council from jury service, I certainly could not imagine any men better qualified to sit on juries. It is also slightly anomalous that in one and the same Bill, amongst its multifarious contents, are found the County Council asking for fresh duties in one clause, and in the next exemption from those duties which, in common with the vast majority of citizens, they are occasionally called on to perform. As I understand, however, the contention is that their public duties are already very onerous, I will not propose my Amendment for the omission of that clause.

*MR. SPEAKER: The decision just come to by the House negating the proposal to omit lines 13 to 15 in the Preamble gives the sanction to Clauses 33 and 34, which will therefore stand part of the Bill. It is not competent, therefore, to move their omission.

Another Amendment made.

Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

COLONIAL POSTAL RATES.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a statement showing the internal rates of postage on newspapers and printed matter in the various colonies of the British Empire as at 1st January, 1890?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The information cannot be furnished by the Colonial Office or Post Office with completeness; but if the hon. Member wishes it shall be obtained by a Circular Despatch to the different colonies. The replies will not be received during the present Session; and perhaps the hon. Member will communicate with me if he thinks it necessary that such a Circular should be sent.

CUSTOM HOUSE MESSENGERS.

MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any Memorial has been recently received by the Treasury from the established messengers at the Custom House, praying for the redress of certain grievances; and whether, if so, he will state when a reply to it may be expected; whether the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs have recently decided to fill only each alternate vacancy to the first-class messengerships; whether he will state the reason for which two vacancies in such class have remained unfilled; and whether, in view of the fact that the whole of the second-class messengers entered the Service under the conditions set forth in the Treasury Minute of 1st April, 1873, giving them the right of rising to the maximum of £90 per annum, he will take the necessary steps for the carrying out of such Treasury Minute?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have made inquiry, and I cannot find that the Memorial from the messengers of the Customs has been received at the Treasury. Copies of such a Memorial have been forwarded to the Treasury; but, according to the well-known rules of the Service, the signed original must be presented before the prayer of the Memorial can receive attention.

HIRED CLERICAL ASSISTANTS.

MR. J. R. KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state the greatest number of men who have been employed in any one week during the last three months upon clerical duties in the various Government Offices and whose services have been hired from both Messrs. Waterlow and Messrs. Vacher; whether such men have been paid regular daily or weekly wages by Messrs. Waterlow and Messrs. Vacher respectively, or only for the hours during which their services may have been required in the Government Offices, and whether, if he has no information on the subject, he would cause inquiries to be made on the subject; whether he can state if it is the practice of both Messrs. Waterlow and Messrs. Vacher to make a profit of from 15 to 20 per cent. on the sums paid to them in respect of the daily services of such men, and whether, if he is unable to do so, he will cause inquiries to be made on the subject; and whether the practice of so hiring men through agents for work in Government Offices is not in direct opposition to the opinion expressed in the Report of the Playfair Commission?

MR. JACKSON: I am unable to give the detailed information as to law stationers clerks for which the hon. Member asks. I am not aware that the Playfair Commission expressed any such general condemnation of the practice of employing these clerks as the hon. Member attributes to it; but however that may be, the Treasury have not contemplated the permanent employment of law stationers clerks in Government Departments; but assistance of this kind must be procured for temporary purposes from time to time to meet emergencies.

ST. GILES'S, CAMBERWELL.

MR. J. R. KELLY: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Vestry of St. Giles's, Camberwell, are acting in excess of their powers in ordering and enforcing the making of structural alterations to the drains of houses built in their district in 1877 under the sanction of their officer and that of the City Architect; and whether if in so acting the Vestry, while complying with the letter of the Nuisances Removal Act of 1855, are violating the real intent and spirit of the provisions of that statute?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have communicated with the Vestry of St. Giles's, Camberwell, but I have received no such information as to the facts as would enable me to come to any conclusion on the subject. Moreover, the matter is one in which the Local Government Board have no jurisdiction whatever. I gather that the Vestry consider that they are proceeding in accordance with the provisions of the Nuisances Removal Acts. I am not aware whether an order of Justices has been made in the matter, but assuming that such order has been made there would be an appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions against the decision.

CONSTANTINOPLE HOSPITAL DUES.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, considering the grievance to which British ship-owners have been subjected, owing to the present mode of collecting the Hospital dues in the ports of Constantinople and Smyrna, attention to which was promised many weeks ago, he will now state the decision of Her Majesty's Government in respect thereto?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Treasury have agreed to a reduction of the Constantinople Hospital Dues from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a ton to 1d. per three tons from the first convenient date. No proposal for reduction of the Smyrna Hospital Dues is before Her Majesty's Government.

LIVE STOCK AND INCOME TAX.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the case that an owner and occupier of land can be charged Income Tax under Schedules A and B, when the only profit he derives consists in the enhanced value of his live stock; and whether increased value of live stock is held to constitute "profit" before such value has been realised?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; the owner and occupier of land may, under certain circumstances, be charged Income Tax under Schedules A and B, when the only profit he derives consists in the enhanced value of his live stock before such value is realised. If, for instance, an occupier were to hold over lambs or other stock produced in the year, the increased value of his stock must be brought into the profit and loss account. The question whether such increased value constitutes profit or not is for the District Commissioners.

IRELAND—MR. KIRKWOOD, J.P.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if Mr. William R. Kirkwood, of Killala, County Mayo, still holds the Commission of the Peace for that county, or, if he has been dismissed or superseded, what are the reasons which prompted the taking of this course?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that Mr. Kirkwood has been suspended by the Lord Chancellor from the discharge of Magisterial duties, pending inquiry and decision as to certain charges which have been brought against him with reference to the discharge of his duties as a Magistrate.

RICHMOND DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to an inquest held on Friday last at the Richmond District Lunatic Asylum, Dublin, into the death of Christopher O'Connor, who had for 40 years held appointments in the Criminal Lunatic Asylum at Dundrum, and had risen to the rank of head attendant, which he held for over 20 years; whether he has observed the conflicting medical evidence given at the inquest, Dr. Ashe, Resident Physician of the Criminal Asylum, stating—

"He knew a case in which a patient's ribs gave way of their own account without any violence;"

Dr. Nolan, Senior Assistant Physician of the Richmond Asylum, testifying that "the injuries could not have been sustained by a man lying quietly in his bed;"

and Dr. Thomas Myles, who made a special post-mortem examination, deposing

"he found the deceased had fracture of four ribs on the right side and two on the left. Three of the ribs were broken in two places, two of them, the sixth and seventh, were driven into the right lung. . . . From the nature of the injuries to the ribs witness concluded they were due to a great crushing force recently inflicted, and probably at the same time. Deceased could not have inflicted the injuries on himself;"

whether he is aware that death from broken ribs is a common occurrence in lunatic asylums; whether his attention has been called to the finding of the Jury, that—

"Death was due to the fracture of the ribs, two of which perforated the right lung, the injuries being caused by violence, and that they had no evidence to show how this violence occurred. They recommended the widow and children of the deceased to the consideration of the Treasury on account of his long and faithful services;"

and will the recommendation of the Jury be given effect to?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums report that the newspaper statements in regard to the evidence given are misleading. There were no reporters present on the first day of the inquest, and the Inspectors are now awaiting copies of the depositions called for by them. The statements in paragraphs 3 and 4 appear to be correct. The recommendations of the Jury will receive consideration, but the Inspectors understand that the man died possessed of considerable property.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY AND HOUSES FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, during the past few years, the Midland Railway Company have acquired in St. Pancras large areas under compulsory powers, and that, in consequence, 23,000 of the working classes have had their dwellings taken down, and been obliged to leave that district of London; if he is aware that, within the last few months, a total of 37 houses have been demolished in Somers Town, St. Pancras, occupied by about 325 individuals, chiefly belonging to the working classes, and that these houses were acquired by arrangement from Messrs. Salter, Issott, and Salter, and sold to the Midland Railway Company prior to the 15th of last December, the date when private Bills have to be scheduled, and that a demolition of houses which would cause the removal of nearly, it is estimated, 2,000 other residents in St. Pancras is contemplated; and whether he will cause steps to be taken that, in case of any future demolition of houses used by the working classes in St. Pancras, the provisions of the Acts are all duly enforced, and suitable dwellings are erected for those evicted?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am not in possession of the exact figures showing what has been the actual result of the Bills promoted by the Midland Railway Company during the last few years. The schedule of the Bill now before Parliament shows that houses inhabited by 2,050 persons may be demolished. The Bill, however, not only provides, in compliance with Standing Orders, for the re-housing of persons displaced under the powers of the Bill, but a special provision has been inserted at the instance of the Home Office by which the usual clause as to replacing demolished working-class dwellings is extended, not only to houses acquired compulsorily under the powers of the Bill, but to houses acquired by agreement. So far as Parliament gives me power in the matter, I will not fail to have regard to the interests of the working classes who may be disturbed under schemes promoted by the Railway Company in question.

THE ACCOUNTANT BRANCH OF THE NAVAL SERVICE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the number of officers and writers on board Her Majesty's ships, and the highest and lowest pay in each class; whether the duties are almost identical and in the largest part performed by the writers; when the last inquiry was made into the condition of the Accountant Branch of the Naval Service; and whether he will consider the advisability of abolishing the present expensive officer class of Accountants?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The number of Accountant Officers and Writers on the list on the 1st April, 1890, were respectively:—Accountant Officers, 455; Writers, 279; and the highest and lowest pay in each class is:—Accountant Officers—Fleet Paymaster, £602 5s. Od.; Assistant Clerk, £45 12s. 6d.; Writers—1st class, £91 5s. Od.; 3rd class, £36 10s. Od. It is entirely a mistake to describe the duties of Accountant Officers and Writers as identical. The Accountant Officer has frequently to perform work of a highly important and confidential nature, and he is not only entrusted with the management of the official work afloat, including the duties of cashier, but he also has charge of the Ship's Steward and his staff. The condition of the Writers was the subject of an inquiry by a Committee in 1888, but no change was then recommended. The Accountant Branch was inquired into in 1869 and 1870, and some further alterations were made in 1873; and quite recently the subject has been under the consideration of the Board, with the result that it has been found necessary to increase the number of Paymasters and Assistant Paymasters.

DEATH FROM STARVATION AT WOOLWICH.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will make inquiries as to the death by starvation of a man (unknown), on Friday last, in a common lodging house in High Street, Woolwich; whether he has observed that Dr. James Watson deposed before the Coroner that, in his opinion, the death was due to starvation, and that the Jury found accordingly; and if he has any more information as to the death by starvation of Elizabeth Barrett?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have no information as to the alleged death from starvation in a common lodging house in High Street, Woolwich, but I will make inquiry with regard to the case. With respect to the case of Elizabeth Barrett, I have not yet received from the Coroner a copy of the depositions. As soon as it is received I will consider whether it is necessary to communicate with the Guardians on the subject. I am not at present in a position to give the House any further information respecting the case.

"BARRY v. BALL."

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that the civil action of Mr. Thomas Barry, P.L.G., against D. J. Ball, is fixed for trial on Thursday next, the 10th instant; if he is aware that Mr. Barry is now confined in Cork Gaol as a bail prisoner for the alleged offence arising out of the proceedings in connection with which the civil action is being brought against the District Inspector; and whether the Prison Authorities will produce Mr. Barry, or cause him to be produced, in Court on Thursday, in order that he may give evidence in support of his own cause of action?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As this question appears on to-day's Paper without previous notice, I have been unable to obtain a Report on the matter of fact referred to in the first paragraph. The General Prisons Board report that the prisoner mentioned is at present in Cork Prison for refusing to give bail in respect to an assault, but whether in connection with the case referred to in the question they are not aware. The Prisons Board have no power to act as suggested in the last paragraph; but it is open to the bail prisoner's advisers to obtain a writ of habeas corpus, which would be at once complied with.

*MR. FLYNN: In view of the fact that the civil action is to be tried on Thursday next, and that this man had this charge sprung suddenly upon him, I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks it too much to telegraph to Ireland to instruct the Constabulary Authorities to take the necessary steps to allow this man to be heard as a witness in his own civil action?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is a perfectly well understood form of procedure by which this gentleman can get permission to attend.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): But might not this gentleman be saved the expense of going through that form by the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should very much doubt if we have power to do that.

LLANCAIACH STATION.

MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will take the necessary steps in order to have the recommendations of Colonel Rich carried into effect, which he made in his Report of 21st August, 1889, on the dangerous state of the Llancaiach Station of the Great Western Railway?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Since the date of Colonel Rich's Report a new station at Treharris has been opened. The Board of Trade are informed by the Great Western Railway Company that they are waiting to see the effect upon the traffic of the opening of the new station before deciding either to improve the existing Llancaiach Station or to remove it altogether. The Board of Trade have no authority to make any requirements in the matter.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, before this House is called upon to assent to any

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Bill for the surrender of Heligoland to Germany, full information will be afforded as to all territorial engagements not hitherto communicated to Parliament, also as to any new responsibilities (if any) recently incurred by this country in the event of war breaking out on the Continent of Europe, and especially as to the present relations of Her Majesty to what is known as the Triple Alliance, or to the engagements for mutual support made between Germany, Austria, and Italy?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have already informed the House that Her Majesty's Government have entered into no new engagements or responsibilities, and their attitude in regard to other Powers has been frequently and plainly defined both in this and in the other House of Parliament.

COUNTY COURT RETURNS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why the usual annual Returns relating to County Courts, of Remitted Actions, Plaints, and Sittings, have not yet been presented, and when they will be in the hands of Members?

*MR. JACKSON: I have made inquiry about this Return. I believe that really it is a Home Office Return, and it has been usually moved for by a private Member. It has not yet been moved for this Session, but I think it is just about ready, and I will endeavour to place it on the Table.

BECHUANALAND.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what jurisdiction Her Majesty has in the Bechuanaland Protectorate; by what right, or under what Instrument, the Administrator of Bechuanaland can compel chiefs in the Protectorate to consent to the construction of a telegraph line across their territories against their will; and whether the British South Africa Company, in taking over the work of constructing a telegraph through the Protectorate from the Government, is bound to carry it out under the conditions imposed by the Charter?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty has an inherent jurisdiction over British subjects, and has the usual authority possessed by a European Sovereign who assumes the duty of protecting native African chiefs against violence. Further details as to Her Majesty's powers, especially over whites, will be found in a series of Instruments executed by the chiefs at the time Sir Charles Warren visited them in 1885. These Instruments are printed at pages 45 to 48 of the Blue Book C 4,588 of 1885. The right to make the telegraph is not based on any Instrument, but on the natural right of the protecting Power to do all things essential to the safety of the protected area. The Company is, no doubt, bound to respect the provisions of the Charter in all that it does; but it is not perceived how the Company in laying a telegraph-wire can infringe any provision of the Charter.

THE CASE OF JOHN MORRISSEY.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether John Morrissey, arrested and imprisoned on the 31st March last, under an order of the County Court Judge of Kildare, is still in gaol; whether he is aware that Morrissey was arrested and imprisoned for contempt of Court in not having obeyed an injunction to remove certain huts erected on the holding of a Mrs. Kelly for the shelter of evicted tenants; and whether Morrissey was in any degree bound to carry out the injunction referred to; and, if not, whether he will take into consideration, in case Morrissey has not yet been released, the advisability of now releasing him from prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question appears to relate to the case of Michael Morrissey, who was committed to prison on 21st March for contempt of Court, by order of the County Court Judge of Kildare. Morrissey was bound to obey the injunction. It has been open to him at any time to obtain his immediate release by purging his contempt of Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether, knowing the facts of this case, and that this unfortunate man is only the husband of the niece of the tenant, and has no power of obeying the injunction of the County Court Judge, the Government will interfere and order his release?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I rightly understand the hon. Member his contention is that this man has no power to purge his contempt of Court or to obey the injunction. But the hon. Member must be aware that I have no power to interfere in cases of contempt of Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But the Government have already interfered by releasing the tenant and her niece. The County Court Judge only sits once in three months, and this man will have to remain in prison till October unless the Government interfere.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Does not the right hon. Gentleman recollect that three years ago the Home Secretary interfered in the case of an Englishman imprisoned for contempt in one of the Western counties?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that is an error. My right hon. Friend denies that he did interfere.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But, as a matter of fact, the Government have interfered in this case by ordering the release of the tenant and her niece. Do the Government intend to keep this man, who has already been in gaol four months, under detention for a further period, although there is no possibility of his going before the County Court Judge for some months to come?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the Government find it part of their duty to review the sentence they will, of course, do so.

MR. CLANCY: I may, perhaps, mention that at the last Quarter Sessions the County Court Judge was asked to release the woman and refused to do so.

THE FINN VALLEY RAILWAY.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received from the Finn Valley Railway Company a resolution of their Board, stating that they are "prepared to work the extension railway from Stranorlar to Glenties at cost price"; and whether, in view of his statement that the Government attach great importance to satisfactory arrangements for working being made, if possible, with existing Railway Companies, now that this Company have proposed satisfactory arrangements for working this extension, he will state whether the Government are prepared now to forward the Stranorlar and Glenties line?

*MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; I received yesterday a copy of the resolution mentioned from the Secretary to the Finn Valley Railway Company. Inquiry will be made and the proposal considered, but I cannot at present express any opinion upon it.

THE PUBLICANS' PETITION.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Walsall whether he intends to take any further steps with regard to the Petition "presented on 26th June, by the hon. Member for the Ripon Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire, from inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland," in favour of the Compensation Clauses, seeing that the Select Committee on Public Petitions report—

"That many of the signatures are in the same handwriting, that some few names are fictitious, and that a very small number are obscene, and they are of opinion that the Orders of the House have not been complied with."

SIR C. FORSTER (Walsall): The Committee of Public Petitions have found that the Petition recently presented by the hon. Member for the Ripon Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire in favour of the Licensing Clauses of the Local Taxation Bill contained 611,342 signatures. The Committee have gone carefully into the matter, and have discovered that while 7 per cent. of the signatures are in the same handwriting, others are obscene. These facts, no doubt, detract from the value of the Petition, but the Committee are of opinion that they do not afford sufficient grounds for its rejection, especially as it was so numerously signed.

SIR W. LAWSON: Are we to understand that 40,000 of the signatures were in the same handwriting?

SIR C. FORSTER: I have given the hon. Baronet all the information in my possession.

IRISH POOR RATE COLLECTORS.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to resolutions adopted by Poor Rate Collectors in Ireland, with reference to the onerous duties imposed on them in connection with carrying out the provisions of the Franchise Act, for which no remuneration is provided; and if he can hold out any hope of remedial legislation in the near future?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The attention of the Irish Government has been called to the resolutions referred to, and, as I have already stated, I am quite ready to introduce a Bill to meet the cases of the Poor Law officials where they are at present insufficiently remunerated for their duties under the Franchise Act, if assured that the Bill will meet with the general assent of all Parties in the House. Since making that statement I have received no assurance to that effect. I am, however, prepared to bring in a Bill; but it must be understood that it can only be passed as an unopposed Bill.

IRISH PRISON LIBRARIES.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that under the rules of the General Prisons Board a prisoner is only allowed to have one book out of the library per month, and that this rule is rigorously enforced, whether the book contains 100 or 1,000 pages; whether there is any sufficient reason for this limitation; and whether he will direct that prisoners who are entitled to have the use of books from the prison library shall be allowed to change such books as often as they may need to, provided that such permission is not abused in the sense of spending in reading time which should be otherwise employed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the number of volumes in the prison libraries is not fixed, but varies according to the average number of prisoners. New books are added to the libraries each year, as a rule. The sum allowed by the Treasury for the purchase of new library books each year is at the rate of 1s. 3d. per prisoner of the daily average number of prisoners. The annual expenditure, therefore, varies from year to year, and cannot be exactly stated without reference to the Stationery Office. It is contrary to practice to allow any books to be introduced other than those provided in the manner above described; but if special cause were shown the practice would, no doubt, be relaxed?

MR. CONYBEARE: In view of the fact in my own experience that the prisoners find it very difficult to get books renewed, and are not able to change even small books for a whole month, I ask will the right hon. Gentleman give the Governors of gaols greater latitude in this matter?

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire as to the practice in this matter in English prisons? Will he ascertain whether books are not more frequently issued in those prisons; and will he consider the desirability of more frequently issuing them in Irish prisons, so long as the prison tasks are not interfered with?

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman issue instructions for prisoners to be allowed a complete work instead of only one volume at a time?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can only say that the practice which obtains in English prisons is similar to that in Irish gaols.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what number of volumes is as a rule contained in the gaol libraries of the Irish Prisons, how often the books are renewed, and what sum annually is spent in furnishing them; and whether, if donations of books were received from charitable persons, the General Prisons Board would allow them to be added to the prison libraries? I will also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he cannot see his way to giving prisoners a greater choice of works, seeing that they are now mainly supplied with the lives of saints, and that such works are seldom in harmony with their religion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the frequency with which library books are issued to prisoners depends, according to regulations, on a prisoner's length of sentence and class. Those in the second-class receive a new book every month, those in the first-class, who have spent above 12 months in prison, receive a new book when required, while those in the lower classes receive only one book during two months or six weeks. The rule is generally strictly enforced; but as regards the size of the book, which is selected by the prisoner himself, if it turns out to be of very small size, the Governor sometimes allows him to exchange it for a larger. The present regulation is based on the principle of increasing a prisoner's privileges, by a graduated scale, according to his conduct and industry and the length of his sentence. The Prisons Board informs me that it has worked satisfactorily.

CLONMEL GAOL.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that the warders in Clonmel Gaol have to perform the following severe duties every ninth week, namely, that they commence work every morning at 4 a.m., and cease work on three days at 10 p.m., at 6.30, and 8.30 p.m. on the other days; what is the number of the staff in the said prison; what is the average number of prisoners confined therein; whether there is any special reason why the warders should have such long hours of duty; and whether he will cause such an addition to the staff to be made as will relieve them of this grievance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that, owing to the construction of Clonmel Prison, the cook-house being detached from the main building, it is necessary that an officer should rise each morning at 4 o'clock in summer, at 5 o'clock in winter, to light the fires. The Governor, however, reports that this duty (which in other prisons where the cook-house is under the main roof can be performed by the night guard) takes only about five minutes, after which the officer can return to his room till 6 a.m. The duty falls to each warder only one week in every 11, not as stated in the question. Only a small proportion of officers is kept on duty till 10 p.m., half the staff being allowed off duty in turn at 6.30 p.m., and the rest at 8.15 p.m. In addition to the Governor, Chaplain, Medical Officer, and Clerk, there are 13 subordinate officers in this prison. The daily average number of prisoners for the year ended 31st March last was 94.7. The reason why the warders have very occasionally to rise at an early hour is given in the first part of the reply; but it is not the fact that the hours of duty in this prison are, on the whole, exceptionally long. On the contrary, the Governor, who has had experience of several other prisons, reports that he does not know of any prison where the officers have less cause of complaint on this ground or where the Sunday half-holiday, or the alternate evenings relief from duty, is more strictly observed. Under these circumstances, it is not considered necessary to increase the staff of this prison.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in Derry Gaol the hours of duty were 6 a.m. in the summer and 7 in the winter. Why, in this prison at Clonmel, should the hours be longer except for duty in the cook-house?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather that that is the only reason.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will take into his consideration the propriety of allocating the amount which had been set apart for the extinction of licences to County Councils, for the purpose of creating and assisting a County Pension Fund for old age, established either as a separate County Fund, or carried on by the agency of Friendly Societies?

MR. J. R. KELLY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has considered, and, if not, will consider, the advisability of utilising the £350,000, which was to have been devoted by the County Councils to the extinction of public house licences, for the purpose of making provision for the superannuation of the teachers in all elementary schools, whether Board or Voluntary schools?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): In answer to the questions of the hon. Members for Leominster and North Camberwell, I can only repeat that the Government will carefully consider all proposals relative to the disposition of the Fund intended for the extinction of licences.

MR. SEXTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give an intimation as to how soon the Amendments are likely to be put down?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to give any indication at present.

THE CENSUS.

MR. J. KELLY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government has considered the advisability of providing in the forthcoming Census Bill for the taking of the census quinquennially in future; and whether he will state to the House when the Census Bill may be expected to be introduced?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We hope to introduce the Census Bill very shortly, and I think I must ask my hon. Friend to wait until then for details as to his proposals.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the 4th Article of the Capitulation of Heligoland in 1807 provided that the inhabitants should not be molested in their privileges, and that the 10th Article of Capitulation stated that it is one of the privileges of the inhabitants of the island not to be obliged to serve on board kings' ships contrary to their inclinations, and guaranteed that privilege to the inhabitants in the future; whether any time limit was assigned to this guarantee of privileges; and whether Her Majesty's Government have stipulated in the Anglo-German Convention that Germany shall be bound to maintain the privileges thus guaranteed by England in 1807?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The provisions of the Articles are accurately stated. There is no record of any time limit. By paragraph 3 of the 12th Article of the Agreement all natives of Heligoland and their children born before the date of the signature of the Agreement are free from the obligation of service in the military and naval forces of Germany; and by paragraph 4 of the same Agreement it is provided that native laws and customs now existing shall remain, as far as possible, undisturbed.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to ask, in connection with this important question, whether the right hon. Gentleman will lay on the Table of the House the Capitulation to which reference has been made?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will inquire if that can be done.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I have a Motion on the Paper for the production of the Articles of Capitulation, and I believe it is not opposed.

MR. CHANNING: Are we to understand that the privileges guaranteed without time limit in 1807 are not restricted, and, to some extent, violated by the imposition of the time limit under the Anglo-German Agreement?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have stated that the privileges in question are guaranteed to all persons now living, and I think we have gone as far as we could in the circumstances.

*MR. CHANNING: I have one more question. In what position will those Heligoland, who under the second section of the 12th Article of the Agreement exercise the right of option of retaining their British nationality, be placed? Will their children born after the Treaty be in the same position as the children of Heligoland, who do not exercise that option?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it must be clear to the hon. Gentleman that that is a question of a legal character, of which notice ought to be given.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the confidential Report of the Military Authorities with regard to the strategical value of Heligoland has been shown by him to the hon. Member for Preston; and, if so, whether he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of this Report, as well as Copies of those portions of the evidence given before the Royal Commission on Colonial Defences, which were instanced by Lord Knutsford on 30th March, 1885, as proving that persons of experience were of opinion that Heligoland was of strategical value to this country?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I did show the hon. Member for Preston a confidential Report by the Military Authorities relative to Heligoland, and there is nothing unusual in such a proceeding. As I said on the 26th ult., I cannot consent to lay on the Table confidential Reports of our military advisers.

MR. SUMMERS: Will the right hon. Gentleman show this Report to other Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That depends on the circumstances of the application. I have no objection, as a rule, to show confidential Reports to hon. Members when that confidence is not likely to be abused.

MR. SUMMERS: Perhaps I may be allowed to read the following passage from a letter written by the hon. Member for Preston to one of his constituents. He says—

“As the cession to another Power of any portion of British territory, especially in Europe, is a very important matter, I may say that, having been shown by Mr. W. H. Smith, with his usual kindness and courtesy, a confidential Report of our Military Authorities, I have no doubt whatever on that score as to the wisdom of the Agreement recently concluded.”

I wish to ask, therefore, whether the right hon. Gentleman will show this Report to other Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I regret that letter was written. I think that when a confidential Report is shown confidentially to an hon. Member of this House, it is an error in judgment to refer to the contents of that Report.

*MR. CHANNING: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, with reference to the second part of the question of my hon. Friend, whether the Government will adopt the usual course, where a Minister of the Crown has referred to evidence in support of his statement, of laying the evidence on the Table?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not the usual course to lay on the Table the evidence on which the Ministers of the Crown act in matters of this kind. I think the hon. Member has, in his question, put the statement of Lord Knutsford too high. What he did say was, that there were some persons who entertained a different view as to the strategical value of Heligoland, and I answered a question in the House to that effect some few days ago. There is hardly a single thing on which some person cannot be found to differ.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The right hon. Gentleman has left the question in some obscurity. I will ask whether, as the right hon. Gentleman has shown this communication to an hon. Member on his own side of the House, he intends to refuse to show it to an hon. Member sitting on the other side; or whether he will show it to hon. Members on this side as well?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I may ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he conceives that the error of judgment lay with the hon. Member for Preston, or with himself?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is quite possible that the error of judgment may have lain with me, but I think also that my hon. Friend committed an error of judgment in referring in writing to a confidential Paper. I think it is undesirable that the hon. Member for Aberdeen should put to me a question of the character of that which he has asked. I have always been prepared to show confidential Papers of importance to hon. Members sitting in any part of the House. I have not drawn a distinction between hon. Members opposite and Members on the Government side; but now that this Paper has been referred to, I must exercise my own discretion as to whether or not it is right that I should show it.

MR. CLANCY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether we are to understand that, in his opinion, there are hon. Members in this House who, if shown a confidential Report, would betray his confidence?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. CONYBEARE: How, in the absence of this confidential communication bearing on the strategical value of Heligoland, is the House to come to any proper decision as to whether it is right for this country to give up Heligoland or not?

[No answer was given.]

MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the fact that, under the terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties, the Commissioners find themselves absolutely precluded from making any suggestions or recommendations whatever; whether it was the intention of the Government in framing the terms of the Reference to preclude them from making any recommendations in accordance with the evidence which might be adduced; and, if so, why; whether it is the usual practice in appointing Royal Commissions to limit them to the mere hearing of evidence; and whether he will consider the advisability of at once extending the scope of the Commissioners' functions to insure that some useful and practical result may accrue from their labours?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties were very carefully considered, and were communicated to Parliament before they were embodied in the Royal Warrant, and no suggestion has been made by the Commissioners that they find them to be inadequate. There is nothing unusual in the appointment of Commissions to investigate a question of this intricate character and to report the facts.

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to ask whether, when the Government moved the terms of that Reference, they intended that the labours of the Commission should be absolutely without result?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not prepared to enter into an argument with the hon. Gentleman.

LABOUR IN INDIA.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the Government of India accepts, and will apply to, the regulation and limitation of the hours of labour in mines and in factories, the principles to which Her Majesty's Government assented at the Conference recently held on the invitation of the Emperor of Germany?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): There has not yet been time to obtain a reply from the Government of India to the Despatch of the Secretary of State dealing with the labour regulations, and I must ask the hon. Member to repeat the question.

MR. HOYLE: I will certainly do so.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. GROTRIAN (Hull): I beg, in the absence of the hon. Member for Central Hull, to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India propose to hand over the Tirhoot State Railway to the Bengal and North Western Railway; (2) whether, inasmuch as the Tirhoot State Railway is owned by the Government of India and returns about 7 per cent. on the capital invested, and the Bengal and North Western Railway is a private company and returns only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the invested share capital, he can explain for what consideration the Government of India is surrendering a valuable dividend paying investment; (3) whether the Tirhoot State Railway was to have been handed over to the Bengal and North Western Railway in March or April last, and whether the reason why the transfer was not then made was because the Bengal and North Western Railway insisted upon the Government completing the extension, then in progress, from Durbungah to the town of Seetamarhi; (4) whether this transfer is against the advice of the Bengal Government, and the Government of India, and against the wish of the inhabitants (Europeans and Natives) of North Behar, through which the Tirhoot line runs; and (5) whether Government will re-consider its determination?

*SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative, but for management only, and for the purpose of securing economy and efficiency. (2) The answer to the second paragraph is that the last year's earnings of the two lines were not as stated in the question, but were for the Bengal and North Western Railway 4·18 per cent., and the Tirhoot State Railway 4·62 per cent. The division of profit between the Government and the company will be in proportion to their respective capitals. (3) The answer to the third paragraph is in the negative. (4) To the fourth paragraph, yes, so far as the Government of India is concerned. It was at first in favour of, and afterwards against, the arrangement. (5) The answer to the last paragraph is in the negative.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Is the North Western Railway to obtain an equal division of the profits for the working of the line?

*SIR J. GORST: I must ask for notice of that question.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Are we to understand that this line has been handed over to a company having its headquarters in London, contrary to the view of the Government of India?

*SIR J. GORST: I have answered the question, and the hon. Member must draw his own conclusions from the answer.

SHIP COMPOSITION.

SIR ROGER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty who is the officer responsible for the selection of the compositions that are ordered from time to time to be used on the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships; is this officer an expert, and what previous technical experience and education has he had to qualify him for this important duty; and by whom was he appointed, for how long, and has the appointment been sanctioned by the Treasury?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk): In reply to the first part of the question, the Controller of the Navy; to the second, the Controller is not an expert in the literal sense of the word, but he has large experience, and has the advantage of a most competent officer specially deputed to watch the result of compositions applied to ships of the Navy, and those of the Mercantile Marine. The Controller's assistant in this matter was appointed by the First Lord in April, 1888. Treasury sanction has not been obtained.

IRELAND—MR. T. W. RUSSELL, J.P.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there is any precedent for the appointment of Mr. Thomas W. Russell to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Dublin, he being unconnected by property, residence, or otherwise, with any district in that county; and, if not, why such a precedent was set in the case of Mr. Russell?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is no uncommon practice for a gentleman living on the border of one county to be placed on the Commission of the Peace for the adjoining county, although he has neither a residence nor property in that adjoining county.

MAGISTRATES IN THE COUNTY OF DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY: I beg further to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of Catholics and the number of non-Catholics who were in the Commission of the Peace for the County of Dublin on the 31st August, 1886, and.

the number of Catholics and the number of non-Catholics appointed Magistrates for that county since that date?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that no official record is kept of the religion of Magistrates; but according to the Return presented to Parliament on August 27, 1886, the number of Magistrates in the County of Dublin was stated to be 339, of whom 106 were believed to be Roman Catholics, 230 to belong to other denominations, and the religion of three was unknown. Since then 53 ordinary Magistrates (not including the military officers placed temporarily in the Commission for military purposes) have been appointed for the County of Dublin, of whom eight are believed to be Roman Catholics, and the remaining 45 to belong to other denominations.

THE TIPPERARY MAGISTRATES.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that it was appointed to hold a Petty Sessions Court at Ballyporeen, County Tipperary, on the 1st instant, and that a large number of litigants assembled at the Court House on that day in order to have their cases heard; whether it is a fact that the Magistrates did not attend, although two Resident Magistrates held a Court under the Criminal Law Procedure Act on the day before at Fermoy, within easy distance of Ballyporeen; and whether he will make inquiries, and, if necessary, give instructions that Courts shall be attended by Magistrates at appointed times, so as to accommodate the public?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that on the occasion referred to the Resident Magistrate in whose district the Petty Sessions are held was prevented from attending through illness, and as a local Justice who attends these Petty Sessions very regularly happened not to attend on that occasion, they fell through. Any public inconvenience which may have been occasioned is much to be regretted. As regards the suggestion in the second paragraph, there does not appear to have been any reason to anticipate on the previous day that the Petty Sessions would fall through, and the Resident Magistrates who were at Fermoy left that place upon their duty there being completed. Every effort is made to secure that sittings of fixed Petty Sessions shall not be disarranged by reason of the non-attendance of a Magistrate.

THE BAILING OF PRISONERS.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that on 24th June, at the Clonmel Quarter Sessions, two young men, named William Ryan and Joseph Ryan, were ordered to be released on bail; whether four Magistrates of the county, named respectively Messrs. Richard Bagwell, Gerald Fitzgerald, Albert Quinn, and Mr. Hemphill, on being applied to successively, refused to go to the prison, which was quite near, for the purpose of having the prisoners released, although the sureties produced the perfected bail bond, and although it is necessary a Magistrate should attend under the circumstances; and whether he will inquire from the above mentioned gentlemen if they declined to perform their Magisterial duties; and, if so, why?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the first Magistrate applied to declined taking bail, as he was not satisfied of the sufficiency of one of the sureties. The other three Magistrates were applied to and they declined, not knowing anything of the securities. The bail was then completed before Mr. J. V. Guery, J.P. As a matter of fact, no practical inconvenience was sustained by the prisoners, as their bail was completed about two and a half hours after the application was first made.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask whether the Resident Magistrate or the Magistrate in the case has the power of decision as to whether the securities are sufficient or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Before I answer that question, I should have notice of it. My belief is that the Magistrate has power to decide.

THE CASE OF MR. JOHN LYONS.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the case of Mr. John Lyons, a merchant of Portumna, and three other men, at present undergoing a sentence of two months' imprisonment with hard labour for the alleged intimidation of James Mitchell, Mitchell, when produced as a witness by the Crown, swore that he did not know any of the defendants; that they had never intimidated him, or attempted to do so, and that they had never in any way attempted to induce him not to buy Dillon's hay; and if he will consider the advisability of releasing these men from prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As already stated in reply to previous questions, the case referred to had a careful hearing, and the evidence was fully considered before the Court of First Instance, and subsequently before the County Court Judge on appeal. On the facts of the case, therefore, there appears to be no ground to interfere with the course of the law. It is, however, of course, open to the prisoners to memorial the Lord Lieutenant in the usual way should they so desire.

MR. ROCHE: The Chief Secretary has not answered my question, which was, "Whether Mr. Mitchell, when produced as a witness by the Crown, swore that he did not know any of the defendants, that they had never intimidated him, or attempted to do so, and that they had never in any way attempted to induce him not to buy Dillon's hay." Did Mr. Mitchell make that statement in Court or did he not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think in answer to the previous question of the hon. Member, I declined to discuss before the House the evidence given in a case of this kind.

THE GUARDS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been directed to the statement in the evening papers of the 7th, given on the authority of the Press Association, and if he will make inquiries as to the alleged refusal of the Guards, on Monday morning, to turn out for parade?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The reports of this occurrence given in the Press are much exaggerated. No doubt there was some dissatisfaction in the battalion at being ordered to attend a parade yesterday morning, and for a short time most of the men failed to appear on parade at the time fixed. The whole of them were afterwards paraded for duty, and were marched off in perfect order to their several guards and duties. Special inquiry is now being made into the circumstances.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Can the right hon. Gent'eman tell the House how it happened that the War Office yesterday seemed not to have information which was in possession of the daily Press? I would also ask whether he can account for the seeming discrepancy between the statement which he has now made and the statement made by the Prime Minister in another place this evening with reference to the same affair?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: As to the second question of the hon. Member, I have no explanation to make, as I have not heard the statement of the Prime Minister. In reply to the first question I admit that I ought to have been informed of this occurrence yesterday. The truth of the matter is that the Military Authorities were holding an inquiry, and desired to complete it so as to give me the result. I thus came down to the House accidentally unprepared to answer the question that was put to me.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to ask, with reference to the statement of the Prime Minister in the House of Lords—"Order!" This is a very serious matter. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Prime Minister seemed to attach much greater importance to this question than he appears to do? So far from trying to explain away matters—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Oh, all right.

SIR FREDERICK CARINGTON.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Sir Frederick Carington is in command of the armed force, organised by him for the Chartered British South African Company, that accompanies the mining expedition of that company into Matabeleland; whether Sir Frederick Carington is now an officer in Her Majesty's Service; what is the object of the armed force, and against whom is it intended to protect the mining expedition; whether Lobengula has expressed his assent to this inroad of an armed force into his territories; and whether, in the event of this assent not having been given, Her Majesty's Government will direct the armed force to withdraw, so as to prevent a collision between it and the forces of Lobengula?

BARON H. DE WORMS: My answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question is, No. Sir F. Carington remains in the Bechuanaland Protectorate. The answer to the second paragraph is in the affirmative. The object of the armed force of the Company, which, as I have before stated, is not commanded by Sir F. Carington, is to keep up communications between the Protectorate and the Company's settlements, and to guard Matabeleland against encroachments. Lobengula has assented to the entry of the Company's expedition into his country, and, therefore, the contingency contemplated in the last paragraph of the question has not arisen.

EGYPTIAN DECREE AGAINST BRIGANDAGE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has seen the Egyptian Official Gazette, of 16th June, in which it is reported that a Decree against brigandage has been submitted by the Khedival Government to the Legislative Council, in which the following punishments against brigands are decreed, in conformity, "as set forth in the Preamble of the Decree," with the dispositions of the sacred law (rite Hanapte) in vogue in all countries depending on the Ottoman Empire: amputation of the right hand and left foot followed by capital punishment; amputation and crucifixion; amputation, capital punishment, and crucifixion; capital punishment and crucifixion; crucifixion alone; capital punishment alone; and that the penalty of crucifixion is thus defined in the Decree—

"Two parallel and transversal bars are attached to a post at some distance from each other. The post thus furnished is fixed perpendicularly in the ground. The arms of the victim are then stretched out on the upper bar and the feet on the lower bar. Thus attached, his left breast is pierced with a lance, which is worked round in the wound until death takes place;"

and whether Her Majesty's Government will use its influence with the Khedival

Mr. Labouchere

Government to prevent the infliction of such punishments?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Decree proposed by the Khedival Government contained no such provisions, but the majority of the elected Members of the Legislative Council voted for an Amendment declaring that the law of the Koran prescribed them as the proper penalties for brigandage. This vote does not bind the Egyptian Government, and there is not the slightest chance of their adopting such measures.

EXCISE DUTIES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I desire to know what steps have been taken by the Government in order to ascertain the views of hon. Members from Ireland with reference to the allocation in Ireland of the money released by the dropping of the licensing clauses of the Local Taxation Bill. Does the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury intend to take any step calculated to ensure a general assent to the proposals of the Government?

MR. W. H. SMITH: When our proposals are made I trust they will be such as will meet with general consent. I cannot at the present moment say more than this.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): But we desire to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to ascertain the opinions of the Irish Members on this matter.

MR. W. H. SMITH: A good many suggestions have already been made from the Benches opposite.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Do the Government intend to make their proposals without any previous consultation with the Representatives of the Irish people?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not in a position to give an answer to the question at present. I may say, however, that I will endeavour, as far as possible, to learn the views of hon. Members.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what facilities he is prepared to give for making progress with the measure relating to Water Companies' charges?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Member must know that in the present state of business it is impossible for me to offer facilities for any Bill.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask what Vote will be taken in Supply after the Constabulary Vote?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Vote for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary, and after that the other Votes in their order. If, however, hon. Members below the Gangway have different views, I shall be glad to hear them.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, in respect of the Police Bill, the following Fifteen Members, namely: Mr. Baumann, Mr. Bolitho, Mr. Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Causton, Mr. Coddington, Mr. Samuel T. Evans, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Mr. Hoyle, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Storey, Mr. Howard Vincent, Mr. Wharton, and Mr. Whitley.

IRISH SOCIETY AND LONDON COMPANIES (IRISH ESTATES).

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Irish Society and London Companies (Irish Estates) have leave to hear Counsel (to such extent as they shall think fit) upon the matters referred to them.—(Mr. John Morley.)

HELIGOLAND.

Address for "Copy of Articles of Capitalation of Heligoland in 1807."—(Mr. Summers.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Working Classes Dwellings Bill, without Amendment; that they have passed a Bill, intitled "An Act to declare and amend the Law of Partnership." [Partnership Bill [Lords.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(6.16.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, W.): Sir, this is the first occasion for many years that the Vote for the Irish Police has been taken at a reasonable period of the Session. The usual course for past years has been to postpone them to a very late period of the Session, when Members of this House were jaded, and when only the Irish Members were present to take part in the Debates. I think the change which has been made is a necessary one, especially as the Vote on the present occasion must give rise to many and serious questions relating to the police. I think it is impossible for anyone who has followed the course of the police in those districts of Ireland where disputes exist between landlords and tenants, not to perceive that their action during the last two years has become more arbitrary, more violent, and more insolent. I will not blame the Force itself for that. I believe it is in the main due to the impulse which it receives from head quarters. The Force is formed of the most splendid material that is to be found in Ireland. When years ago the Force was re-organised by Sir Thomas Drummond, it was converted into a highly organised and sensitive body. It was the boast of Sir Thomas Drummond that it was a most delicate instrument, which responded at once to the slightest impulse which he gave to it. But at that time he brought it into harmony with public opinion in Ireland, and made it an impartial arbiter between the different interests of that country. If its condition is changed, as at the present time, it is due to the impulse which has been given to it during the last three or four years by the present Government, and the present Chief Secretary. So far from being now in harmony with public opinion in Ireland, it is distinctly not in harmony with public opinion in that country. Instead of being impartial it is of a partisan character, and is generally to be found, is always to be found, ranged on one side of the social disputes which exist in that country. I say that the change is due to the policy of the Chief Secretary, and due to his violent speeches in this House. Such a speech as we listened to from him last night produces the very worst effect in Ireland on the action of the police in every part of that country. Sir, I think the change in the attitude of the Irish Police is due to the policy and tone of the Chief Secretary. Take as an illustration what recently occurred in the town of Tipperary, where at meetings, alleged to be illegal by the Government, a vast number of people were cruelly batoned by the police. The reasonable and proper course, if these meetings were illegal, would have been to allow the meetings to take place, and to arrest the leaders of the Party who were engaged in promoting and speaking at them. A few months ago the course taken by the Government would, undoubtedly, have been to arrest the hon. Members for Mayo and North-East Cork, to prosecute them, and obtain their conviction, and to treat them after the manner of criminals. But the Chief Secretary has ascertained by experience that that kind of policy does not commend itself to the English constituencies. As a result, there can be little doubt that the word has been given to the police in Ireland not to arrest men of this class at such meetings, but to endeavour to put down meetings by force, and by brutally batoning the people. I say this is an illustration of the kind of way in which the police are now encouraged in their violence, and also of the change of policy which has taken place. Then we come to the case of "shadowing," to which so much attention has been given already in this Debate. After the speech of the Chief Secretary it cannot be for a moment doubted that the system of shadowing is due to the Chief Secretary himself, and is imposed by him upon the police. It may be that in the past, under Lord

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Spencer, there was a certain watching of murderous criminals or persons suspected of murder—watching from a distance, which was not likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and which, for my part, I cannot doubt must be necessary under any circumstances of society. But the shadowing which has been taking place of late has been of a totally different character, different in type, and devoted to a different class of persons. We learn now, from numerous answers given by the Chief Secretary on this subject, that shadowing is of two kinds. There is, first, shadowing carried on in the shape of dogging the steps of Members of Parliament and others at some distance; but still near enough to show that they are pursued by the police. And, secondly, there is the process which may be called the heel and toe shadowing, in which an officer is at the side of the person shadowed, while another is close behind. This last system of shadowing is of a monstrous character. The Chief Secretary endeavoured to explain that English Members and visitors from England have never been shadowed in Ireland during the last few months. He said it was an hallucination on their part. What he said did take place was this. Visitors went over to Ireland and found themselves in bad company, and, being in bad company, found themselves under the same shadow as their friends. And, with his usual sneer at the hon. Member for Leicester, he asserted that no instructions had ever been given to shadow these visitors, and that it was a mistake on their part to suppose that they had been shadowed. For my part, I utterly dispute the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I believe it to be absolutely unfounded. It is merely an afterthought to escape from an ignominious position. I can say, from my own experience, and from information I have received from the best quarters, namely, from the police themselves, that it is not true. I do not wish again to intrude my own experience in this contemptible matter before the House; but I may say that on two occasions in Ireland I was closely watched by the police, who dogged my steps. They came within a short distance of me, and listened to what I was saying to the people by the side of the road. I challenged the police on the subject, and on both occasions they told me that they had directions to pursue me and dog me in this manner. My experience has been that of numbers of Members of this House, of three ladies—Lady Sandhurst and others—and of numerous people connected with various Liberal Associations, and of the gentlemen who were sent over as representatives of the Somersetshire Association by my hon. Friend the Member for one of the divisions of that county. Occasionally, most ludicrous mistakes are made. I gave letters of introduction not long ago to a young friend of mine who happened to be a Tory candidate for a Tory constituency at the next General Election. He took over to Ireland with him another friend, who is candidate for another Tory constituency. They delivered one of my letters to Father Keller, and he tells me that they were both of them shadowed in the closest manner during the whole time they were in that district. I say these things are ridiculous and contemptible, and they ought to be put an end to. One of the best evidences that this shadowing is by the direction of the Government is this. When there was a deputation from the Home Rule Union to Ireland, orders were given by the Government that these particular people, connected with the deputation, were not to be shadowed, and, in point of fact, they were not shadowed, and a distinction was made between them and other persons of the same kind. With reference to the other kind of shadowing which has been alluded to in the course of the Debate, and which the Chief Secretary referred to, the heel and toe shadowing, it is of a much closer and more irritating character than that to which I have been adverting. With regard to it, the Chief Secretary endeavoured to show that it had only been carried out in the case of men who were themselves shadowing others, for the purpose of preventing them selling their cattle and sheep at various fairs and markets throughout Ireland. I frankly admit that if persons are engaged in shadowing others at fairs and markets, with a view to prevent them selling their cattle and sheep, it is a highly illegal proceeding, and the Government would be justified in prosecuting. I ask, why do they not prosecute them instead of adopting the illegal course of shadowing these men in their turn? But, without pursuing that matter further, I may say that the cases are by no means confined to this class. There are numerous other cases which have occurred, in which men have been shadowed in this most abominable manner, who are not in any way connected with intimidation, or men in respect of whom there is not the slightest pretence for saying that they are engaged in practices of this kind. For instance, Father Kennedy has been shadowed in this close manner. Against Father Kennedy the only thing that can be said is that he attended two suppressed meetings of the National League. There are many other cases of priests in different parts of Ireland who have been shadowed in the same way. There are Father Humphreys and the three priests of Carrick-ma-cross, and numerous others. Among other cases of shadowing of this kind, we have had at Loughrea the Tenants Defence Association collecting evidence for the purpose of that Association. The men who were collecting the evidence, together with Father Meagher, a respected priest of the district, were shadowed by two policemen in this close manner, and the police insisted upon following these men into the houses when they were asking for collections, and in taking notes of the conversation which passed. I believe I am right in saying that this kind of shadowing took place in many parts of Ireland where the Tenants' Defence Association were collecting evidence. Well, I say that the whole of this process is unprecedented, un-Constitutional, and, I believe, illegal as tending to create a breach of the peace. A very interesting and curious case of shadowing at Fermoy is reported in to-day's newspapers. The man who was shadowed at the market immediately took to shadowing the Chief Inspector of Police, and so the three men went about, the one shadowing the other in this close manner. The Inspector told the man who was shadowing him that if he did not desist he would be prosecuted. Whereupon the man said that if he was prosecuted, the man who was prosecuting him in turn should be prosecuted. So that it leads to an indefinite possibility of shadowing. You could have a string of men, one shadowing the other. It is really ridiculous. One of the strongest arguments against the whole process is its utter inutility and utter failure in achieving the purpose for which it is intended. It is absolutely certain that this process has not produced the smallest good result. I challenge the Chief Secretary to produce any case in which shadowing has been of the slightest benefit for the main object he has in view. It may have resulted in one or two cases in prosecutions and convictions, but it has had no bearing whatever in putting an end to disputes between landlord and tenants, or in putting an end to their combinations, which is the chief object of their policy. The shadowing of Canon Keller has not had the slightest effect upon the dispute between the Ponsonby tenants and their landlord. The shadowing of the Tipperary tenants has not had the slightest effect in stopping the boycotting of Tipperary shopkeepers. What strikes me most is the gross stupidity of the whole affair. The Chief Secretary may be very clever in this House, but much of his administration in Ireland is infected by a stupidity which is as far removed as possible from statesmanship. This shadowing is calculated to annoy, but produces no good result. It reminds me of the naughty boy in "Alice in Wonderland," of whom the refrain says:—

He only does it to annoy,
Because he knows it teases.

In Ireland it is a policy of annoyance and teasing, but has no other result. Let me quote on this point a letter I have recently received from a gentleman who has been closely shadowed for a year past. Last year I brought before the House the case of a Mr. Fitzgibbon, who had been cruelly and shamefully persecuted by the authorities. He is a leading tradesman of Castlereagh. He has advocated the cause of the tenants, and has acted the part of John Burns in advocating combination. But he is also a man of great moderation, and has been instrumental in effecting arrangements in all the disputes in his district. This man was marked out by the police, and was three times sent to gaol, with the grossest injustice and with the greatest indignity. A few days ago I received a letter from Mr. Fitzgibbon, describing his shadowing. The letter ran—

"Sir, since my release from prison in July, 1889, I have been constantly shadowed by the police. Whether going to church with my family, or going from it, the police have been constantly at my heels. Police are posted opposite my shop, and watch every person who visits my establishment. When driving out my family on Sundays I am closely followed by a car with two policemen. Their vigilance in watching me was, I have reason to believe, just to prevent my attending meetings of our suppressed branch of the League; and, secondly, as a source of annoyance. Up to the present they have not succeeded, in a single instance, in preventing a meeting. On one occasion I found myself so closely watched that nothing remained for me but to start for the place of meeting, and see if my horse could get away from that of the police, and which was purchased specially for the object of running me down. I had no sooner got on my car than the police got on theirs, as they had the horse harnessed ready to start at any moment. There was rarely seen in this part of the country such a chase. Perhaps both of the parties should have been punished for cruelty to animals; both horses were abused. At all events, I got away, and was soon completely out of sight, and the meeting was held, the largest since the suppression of the branch."

This is a fair illustration of what takes place. I say that the whole thing is tomfoolery. If the Chief Secretary would take one-tenth part of the trouble which he expends in carrying out coercion and in devising and defending shadowing in endeavouring to remove the causes of dispute and effecting settlements, he would easily get rid of these disputes, and dispense altogether with coercion and all its attending nonsense. But, Sir, shadowing is but a small part of the abuses of the police. No one who has not been in the districts, where these disputes exist, can have the least idea how completely the police are masters, and yet how powerless they are. Under coercion, and in the absence of juries, they are quite irresponsible, irresponsible to public opinion, to law, to this House. They can practically send to prison any person they think fit. If the authorities choose to assume that a public meeting is illegal, and it is held in spite, it rests with the police to arrest any persons they think fit, or to baton anyone they choose; if it is a case of boycotting, they can select for prosecution anyone they like. If there is a conflict of evidence before the Resident Magistrates, the Magistrates invariably believe the evidence of the police against any number of other witnesses. They take their cue in this respect from the Chief Secretary. Some of them avow this openly. This is what one of these gentlemen said in a recent case when there was direct conflict between the evidence of a policeman and an independent witness in a prosecution before him :—

"The majesty of the law must, at all hazards, be upheld. He had no doubt that either the policeman or the witness for the defendant had committed gross perjury. Judge Gibson had stated in a recent case that a policeman's evidence is more reliable than the evidence of any civilian, and he quite agreed with Judge Gibson."

He proceeded to convict the defendant. This represents the prevailing views of the Resident Magistrates; and when the case goes on appeal the County Court Judges often act on the same plan, refuse to interfere with the discretion of the Magistrates. The Magistrates only follow the example of the Chief Secretary. It was said in the Debates on the Coercion Act that there would be an appeal against its admission to this House, but the Chief Secretary has nullified that appeal by his course of action. He invariably accepts the statements of the police as gospel without inquiry or without stint. In the thousands of cases which have come before the House he has never once admitted that the police were in the wrong, never once made independent inquiry, never once apologised, or suggested a different line of conduct. He suggests sometimes a civil action against the police; but this is impossible, because identification cannot be made, and the authorities lend no assistance. If by chance the policeman can be identified and an action is brought, the whole array of Crown Counsel appear for the police, and all the machinery of the law is used to prevent a remedy. The result is, that the police are upheld in every case and become more and more reckless. It is evident that the Chief Secretary acts on principle. He knows that the police are his only support in a great part of Ireland, and that if he threw them over even when wrong he would risk losing their support and be left alone. Things go in a vicious circle. The police, finding themselves always supported or encouraged in their course of violence and insolence, go from bad to worse, the Chief Secretary eventually being led on to defend action which he, in the first instance, without doubt would repudiate and discredit. The only remedy for this state of things is a complete change in the system of the administration of Ireland. The police, instead of being the masters of the people, should be made their servants. That is the only safe relation of the police to any self-governing people. It is because in Ireland they had been masters of the people and not their servants that the present state of things is so unsatisfactory. The only way out of this vicious circle and system of government is that Ireland should be self-governing and should have control over her own police. I venture to think that a change is now inevitable, and, in conclusion, I would advise the Chief Secretary to recognise the inevitable character of the change that is at hand, and to prepare for it, and to recognise that there is such a thing as public opinion in Ireland. The cardinal defect of the right hon. Gentleman's whole policy is that he does not recognise any responsibility whatever to public opinion in that country. That may be seen through the whole line of his policy, vitiating every part of it—destroying his best intentions, and preventing his remedial measures. One of the greatest philosophers once said that all Government—even the most despotic—rests on public opinion. In Ireland the despotism does not rest on Irish public opinion, but on the public opinion of the majority of England and Scotland, and it is because that public opinion for the moment justifies the Coercion Act and the action of the Chief Secretary that the present state of things has arisen. The action to which I have referred is the cause of innumerable scandals and outraged public opinion in Ireland. Its only good effect is that it is bringing about a change of feeling even in England. The time cannot be far off when there will be such a complete change of public opinion in England and Scotland as will altogether overwhelm the policy of the right hon. Gentleman.

(6.55.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The Committee listened last night to a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary which might be described as having been in his best old manner. It was a speech which, in my humble judgment, if I had had no previous experience of the right hon. Gentleman, would have been sufficient to prove to everyone listening to it the right hon. Gentleman's utter incapacity to rule the Irish people, because it was a speech which, from the beginning to the close, exhibited a spirit of fight, of uncompromising and unbending hostility to the great mass of the people of Ireland. I am bound to say that I have too high an opinion of the intelligence of the right hon. Gentleman to suppose that he cannot now have arrived at the conclusion that his task is an utterly hopeless one, and that the task of Sisyphus was not more hopeless than that he has undertaken in Ireland. What was the upshot of the right hon. Gentleman's speech? Why, after four years, during which he has had a free hand in Ireland and has governed that country according to his own ideas, we are informed that one of the essential duties of the Irish Executive is to watch—and to watch in a way hitherto unparalleled, so far as I know, in the history of all civilised communities—the incomings and outgoings, and every movement of a great host of individuals in Ireland whom the right hon. Gentleman thinks it a smart thing in this House to describe as “criminals,” but whom the people of Ireland do not consider to be criminals. We have the deplorable picture presented to the public of this country—who were looking with hope to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman—that at the end of four years those of the Irish people whom the right hon. Gentleman's Government most characterise as criminals, and who are regarded as so dangerous that they must have their every steps dogged, are precisely the men who are selected by the Irish people for all positions of honour. I ask the Committee and the country whether a more hopeless case of failure in an Executive Government has ever been exhibited to the public gaze? Turning to the immediate question before the Committee, I am bound to say that this Debate takes a somewhat wide range, and extends over a very considerable field, though I think the last man in the House who has a right to complain of such a result is the right hon. Gentleman himself, because he delivered a speech not at all confined to the mere question of the duties and character of the Irish Constabulary. He traversed the whole field of Irish politics, and in the course of that considerable oration he made some very personal attacks on the Members of my Party, though at a later period he said that such was not his intention. I will deal, first, with a subject which I believe to be of the greatest possible importance—a subject which is manifestly of the greatest importance not only to us in Ireland, but to the Conservative Government in this country, and that is the subject of shadowing by the police in Ireland. I notice this fact—and no one who listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman last night can for a moment deny that it is the fact—that he passed over deliberately the multitudinous charges that were brought against the police in Ireland, and brought in great detail, and confined his speech absolutely to the question of shadowing, as if no other charge had been brought against the Irish Police. I watched that very closely and noted it with a certain amount of satisfaction, because I saw clearly from the tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman, and the great length at which he dwelt on the question of shadowing, that this charge had struck home to the mind of the people of England, and that he knew that in Barrow and at other elections this phase of police espionage in Ireland is injuring the Government and injuring his cause. The right hon. Gentleman said it was a curious thing that shadowing had risen to such prominence of late, because it existed in times past to as great an extent as now. He declared that the invention of this as a new subject of agitation was due to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who followed him in the Debate the other day, and the Chief Secretary made a very violent personal attack on the right hon. Gentleman. I venture to say to the right hon. Gentleman that he is not serving the interests of his Party nor of his own reputation by the sneering and impudent manner which he adopts towards the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. It is idle to pretend that 19-20ths of the people of this country, whether Conservatives or Liberals, have not got a certain reverence for that statesman—for his experience and his age—and for the Chief Secretary to adopt the insolent tone he does towards him is, in my judgment, not even in his own interest. But let me examine this statement. He says it is curious that this topic should have arisen into such great prominence, because shadowing existed to a greater extent under previous Administrations. I deny that absolutely and in toto. If the practice of shadowing ever existed in Ireland before, I ask who ought to have known of it better than myself and the Members who sit on these Benches—the leading “criminals” of Ireland? If this shadowing existed before, then all I say is that none of the Nationalists were shadowed. It must have been the gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel Saunderson) and his followers who were subjected to that treatment. But, in sober earnest, I say I know Ireland as thoroughly as any man, and am able to declare that that is a false statement, and that this shadowing is an invention of the present Government and never was practised in Ireland before 1888. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that this new topic was an invention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Nothing could possibly be further from the truth. This topic was introduced to the notice of the House by myself in detail for the first time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian listened to my statement, and did what the right hon. Gentleman opposite apparently was not prepared to do, namely, believed my word as against that of the police, and his observations were made under those circumstances, I having given to the House for the first time a description of what the practice of shadowing as now carried on in Ireland is. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian waited until the Minister, who is responsible for Ireland, spoke to see if he would deny or traverse my description of the shadowing. The Chief Secretary got up, but did nothing of the kind. He accepted my description of the shadowing and defended it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian heard that atrocious practice described for the first time in the House—I challenge anyone to deny it—he waited for the Chief Secretary to repudiate it if he chose to do so; but as he did not, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian stood up and denounced it in language which will ring throughout the length and breadth of England in spite of the sneers of the Chief Secretary. The Chief Secretary then made an absurd charge against the Executive Governments which had preceded him in Ireland. He said these proceedings as charged by me, and which are now going on in different parts of Ireland, were practised under previous Administrations. He was challenged on that statement. He was told that that statement was absolutely untrue, without a shred of foundation, and that the only justification for it was the case of a certain Mr. Grant, who was watched in the days of the Administration of Lord Spencer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridge-ton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan). Well, this man Grant was watched because he was suspected of taking part in a murderous conspiracy. But was he shadowed? Nothing of the sort. When I rose and asked the right hon. Gentleman at what distance this man was followed by the police, he replied that he did not know. He was asked whether the police who watched the man were in uniform, and again he said he did not know—and these were two most essential points. The point we complain of is not that individuals are watched. We have all been watched in Ireland—all who have taken part in national politics, for the last 10 years. We should not complain of that; but we complain that by a new and unheard-of system, a policeman who is engaged in watching an individual marked out, walks by his side, keeping step with him and touching him, whilst another constable walks at his heels so closely that, if he stops, the constable comes into collision with him. If the shadowed person meets a friend and enters into conversation with him, every syllable that he utters is overheard by the police. We said that this is an absolutely new departure. It is a practice novel to all Executive Governments; an atrocity, a system of persecution of such an exasperating character as to be most likely, in the case of men of a hot temperament, to excite to a breach of the peace. Then the Chief Secretary had the audacity to come forward and tell the country—though the country will not believe him—that the system we now denounce was a system in force before he became connected with the Government of Ireland. I say it was not, and it is idle and preposterous for him to attempt to confound in the minds of the Members of this House and the public the old system of watching which we have often protested against with the new and a thousandfold more abominable system of shadowing—a new, detestible and odious system of persecution. It is idle to compare it with watching. Everyone familiar with Irish life during the past 10 years, knows that all gentlemen or all individuals in that country who are prominent in any active agitation against the Executive Government, have been closely watched. I myself for years have been watched by policemen in plain clothes and by policemen in uniform, but I have never been shadowed. I do not know what fate may yet have in store for me; but I say deliberately that, in my judgment, if the man who in Ireland is shadowed can get a fair opportunity, and can knock down and beat the police, he is not breaking the law, because I believe that the system amounts to a constructive assault, and that the man is justified in resistance. I say we have been watched in Ireland. I deplore that system. I protest against it, believing it is the strongest sign when you are obliged to watch and dog the steps of political opponents that the Government of the country is unhealthy and wrong. I consider it to be one of the most essential differences between a free Government and a rough and tyrannical Government that, under a free Government it is never needful to dog the steps of political opponents; whilst under a tyrannical Government you are obliged to have recourse to the practice. I have been watched and have met men far away, even in Australia, who have been engaged in the operation of watching me. On one occasion in an hotel in Australia, a man informed me that he had been one of "Fletcher's boys," as they were called, and that it had been his duty to watch me, to follow me to every house I called at, to see how long I stopped, and to watch my every movement from morning to night. That is not shadowing. It is an evil, a cruel, and a horrible excrescence, which springs from the denial of popular rights; but I say that the system of shadowing, as now in force in Ireland, is without parallel in the whole history of tyrannical Government, even in Ireland. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to search the annals of these secret police of the Continent, since the days of Napoleon, and, to produce a single case in which a shadowing system, such as that of which we complain in Ireland, has been pursued. I believe that the time is fast approaching when the people of this country will insist upon having this stain—this disgrace—upon their character removed, and when they will say that if Ireland cannot be governed without it, Ireland shall be allowed to govern itself. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the people are engaged themselves in shadowing the police. Does not the House know that if any man in Ireland attempted to shadow as the police shadow he would at once be arrested? The right hon. Gentleman says that I was directly responsible for the appointment of certain men, who were called by the name of "vigilance men." That is absolutely false. What grounds had the right hon. Gentleman for saying so?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I do not suppose the hon. Member has sufficient local knowledge to say whether A, B, or C have been appointed to the Vigilance Committee, but I say he was responsible for a system which led to the appointment of Vigilance Committees, by which the system of boycotting is carried on.

MR. DILLON: As to any moderate charge—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not a moderate charge.

MR. DILLON: No one in Ireland will deny, least of all myself, that I have for 10 years preached the practice of boycotting on certain lines which I have carefully laid down. So far as that goes I am responsible, I suppose in a secondary degree, for all the steps which have been taken for boycotting. Why I draw a distinction is this: that though I preach a certain policy to the people, I have carefully guarded that policy by certain fixed lines and rules, which I have repeatedly stated to the people from public platforms. It is a monstrous stretch of that responsibility to say that I am personally responsible for the acts of every man who chooses to call himself a vigilance man. It is perfectly preposterous. You might as well say that every publican was responsible for every man whose head was broken at a compensation meeting. I am undoubtedly responsible for the general policy adopted by the people in this regard; and I must say that when these people observe those lines of policy which I have recommended to them over and over again, I think they are doing a service to their own class and the country; but I utterly decline to be responsible for everything that they may say or do. But that is a matter of minor importance. What is a matter of the gravest importance is the grossly inaccurate statement which the right hon. Gentleman gave of the proceedings of the vigilance men. I want to draw attention to a practice which the right hon. Gentleman has followed from the first day of his administration, and which it is very hard to see how he can get out of now. He comes to this House and gives, with the utmost confidence, descriptions of places in Ireland and proceedings in Ireland, and generally of the machinery of Irish social life. He might as well give a description of Chinese life, for all he knows about it. For all those descriptions he has absolutely no source of information except his own police, who have now come to regard him as a convenient channel for any absurd stories they may concoct. From the attitude adopted by the right hon. Gentleman, they have come to the conclusion that the more outrageous and violent their stories are the more charmed he is to retail them to the House of Commons. He says the vigilance men go to the fairs and carry on a system of shadowing which is a great deal worse than any system adopted by the police. He says this has not been denied; but the reason that it has not been denied is because the assertion was never made until he made it in his speech. Knowing what we do of the courage of the right hon. Gentleman, we yet hardly suppose he would go so far as to make an assertion of that kind. So far as my information goes, vigilance men go to the fairs to warn people and to point out to them the stock that belongs to boycotted farms and to the Property Defence Association. People are told not to buy them, and in fact, the action of the vigilance men is exactly that of the pickets of the London Trades' Unions. When the dock men were on strike in London they had 4,000 men round the gates of the docks to warn off new hands, and to explain to the men their reasons for so doing. That is just what the vigilance men do. They cannot use any violence. The police are by, and, indeed, it would be directly in the teeth of the policy which we frequently recommend if they did use violence. That is what they do, and what they will do in spite of the right hon. Gentleman. It does not differ in the slightest degree from what the dock men do in London, and it is absurd to say it does. At the time of the dock strike repeated appeals were made to the Home Secretary from the owners of the docks to denounce the conduct of their pickets, which, it was said, was monstrous and unjustifiable. It was said it was intolerable that the freedom of men who wanted to work should be protected from intimidation at the hands of John Burns and his gang. What was the action of the Home Secretary? He took no action. The difference is, that in one case the picket was in London, and in the other he was in Waterford or Tipperary. In the latter case the right hon. Gentleman weeps showers of crocodile tears over a system which he allows to exist in London. I have heard the right hon. Gentleman in this House, amidst the thunderous cheers of the Tory Party, appeal to the country as to whether human liberty is to be so interfered with. He did it amid the cheers of the gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel Saunderson), who does not now appear in such excellent spirits as he does sometimes. I suppose the shadow of coming fate is darkening his spirit. The Chief Secretary asked, "Are men not to do as they have a right to do?" Well, if so, why did you allow the dock men to intimidate others? Why did you allow men, during the recent gas strike, to physically obstruct the entrance of men who wanted to work? You know it is the grossest hypocrisy to talk like that. The fact is, we do not have the same sort of law and justice in Ireland that you have in England. I know that if we in Ireland had done the same sort of thing that was done by the gas stokers of Leeds, with the utmost impunity, our people would have been cut to pieces by cavalry or shot down by the Royal Irish Constabulary. It is utterly idle for the right hon. Gentleman to get up in a fine frenzy and talk about every man doing what he has a right to do. I say if our people are to better their condition they must be ready to make some sacrifices, and if they have not the right to combine under rules which are enforced by strong penalties, what is the liberty given them? Liberty to starve, liberty to work for starvation wages, and to be the bond slaves and the toilers of unrelenting capitalists. I say the working people of this country are beginning to see that their brothers in Ireland, under this system, which has been dubbed boycotting, and held up to execration, are doing nothing more than following in the steps of the Trades' Unions of this country, and are determined to assert the same right to inflict the same sort of penalties on people who betray their class in Ireland as are inflicted in England on those who work against the Trades' Union combinations. It is not true—it is false to say that we have organised a system of shadowing in Ireland. It is not only false, it is preposterous, because every one knows that such shadowing would not be allowed for a single hour in Ireland. I say the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's case against me falls to the ground. The Chief Secretary's system of shadowing is carried on not because of any shadowing on our part, but because the right hon. Gentleman thinks he has discovered a new and ingenious weapon by which he can torture his political opponents in Ireland. I object to this system of shadowing on several grounds. I object to it because it is a novelty, even in the bad traditions of Irish Governments. I object to it because it is an almost intolerable persecution of persons whom the underlings of the right hon. Gentleman choose to think are going to act against the law. I object to it because it is a punishment of the most horrible character, against which there is no appeal, because it is inflicted on the suspicion of any Magistrate or any police official in Ireland, and because the victim can have no hope of justice. I suppose if we were to admit, for the sake of argument, that boycotting is an offence against the law, the right hon. Gentleman would not admit that his officials are absolutely infallible. The right hon. Gentleman does not contend that the shadowing is confined to those who are engaged in boycotting. I object to the system because it is a direct incitement to a breach of the peace. I say in the case of many individuals who are of a hot temper it is absolutely impossible to expect that they will submit to it peacefully. I believe it is illegal. I believe the constables in this respect have no more right to pursue and shadow anyone, to the actual incommoding of these persons in the streets, than has any individual citizen. Supposing I was to bring over two of what the right hon. Gentleman would call my "shadows," and set them to watch and follow the right hon. Gentleman, night and day, so that he could not talk to his friends without being overheard, what would he say? I say we have just as much right to dog him through the streets of London as his men have to dog us in Ireland. On these matters I have yet to learn that police constables have any more right than ordinary citizens. The law does not prescribe this as part of their duty, and they have no right beyond. I have as much right to set agents to dog the steps of the Chief Secretary as he has to treat me in the same manner in Tipperary, only the consequence would probably be that the men would be arrested immediately, perhaps shot. We have a right to complain then if you pursue this practice upon our men. I want to know from the Attorney General for Ireland, and we are entitled to know, what are the legal grounds for this shadowing, and I say that the practice, if pursued, must inevitably lead to a breach of the peace. What legal right, I ask, have you to obstruct, annoy, persecute, a passenger in the street against whom no offence is alleged? I go further, and say that it has been the recognised practice of all Governments, even in Ireland, to watch criminals suspected of crimes, but never in such a fashion. Watch them by all means, by detectives in plain clothes, who keep at a reasonable distance. But if the Attorney General can give me any precedent of any criminal charged with any crime, no matter how foul, being subjected to such a system, I should like to hear it, and I think the Committee would too. There is another point even stronger in regard to this "shadowing." The right hon. Gentleman has leaned very strongly on the argument which he has given the House again and again. Which is the more damnable thing, to shadow a man suspected of being a criminal, or to allow a crime to be committed? This met with a thundering cheer from the right hon. Gentleman's supporters. But the right hon. Gentleman little saw the pitfall he was dropping into. If this is a system pursued for the prevention of crime, why did he not shadow the moonlighters of Kerry and Clare? No; the right hon. Gentleman confines this shadowing to his political opponents, men against whom he has never been able to bring home a single moral crime; while the moonlighters of Kerry and Clare range about freely and commit crimes and escape. You may think this is an extreme statement, you may say how do we know—

An hon. MEMBER: They are masked.

MR. DILLON: Does the hon. Member undertake to say that because a man is masked he cannot be shadowed? Does the mask make them invisible? Really, it is delightful to get these sidelights on Irish life. They are masked! I hope some serious effort will be made to deal with this question in a proper spirit. It may be said the police do not know who the moonlighters are. Well, I know that in the days of Mr. Forster he told us the police did know, though I do not think they did, and that the police deceived him; but Mr. Forster told the House that if he could imprison them without trial he could have every moonlighter in prison in a month. Well, in the result he was not quite so successful as he predicted. But I would bring under notice a case which shows how the police acted in regard to moonlighting outrages, and I refer to the well-known case in County Clare, in which Cullhane, a spy of the police, was engaged in organising a moonlighting attack, for which he was paid by the police. All facts were revealed at the subsequent trial. The names of the men engaged were known and the men were known. Did the police shadow these men? Not a bit of it. They supplied Cullhane with money to carry out the crime and knowing all the men did not attempt to shadow them. What did they do then? They knew the crime was intended, they connived at it, they took no steps to prevent its commission, but they went out to meet and give battle to the moonlighters. Well, we all know the lamentable consequences. But, to use the strong language of an hon. Gentleman opposite, can any course be more damnable than that adopted, the more so that the police encouraged the moonlighters, and incited to the commission of crime. For my part, I think that no police in the world are justified in inciting to the commission of crime, even though to secure the capture of criminals. I think it is utterly foreign to the principle of police, and you never know how innocent men may be drawn into the net by your skilful tempter. It is an atrocious system, discreditable to the country, and ought to meet with the condemnation of every just man. But here we have the fact that, while the Government seek to justify this miserable system of shadowing by the necessity of preventing a breach of the peace and detecting crime, they deliberately avoid using the system against boycotting. But, Sir, when we come to examine the effect upon the system of boycotting, we find that of all utterly futile plans adopted by any Government this the most futile. It has had absolutely no effect whatever on boycotting, absolutely none. If you doubt my word, and care for information, just go down to Tipperary, or write to any of the people there and ask if this elaborate system of shadowing has had the smallest iota of effect on the present system of boycotting. No, the absurdity of the suggestion is so manifest that we cannot, for a moment, suppose that the Chief Secretary adopted the system with any hope or expectation of preventing boycotting. No, Sir; it is pursued as a punishment for political opponents, because it is a means of inflicting suffering and annoyance upon political opponents. Against boycotting the system is futile, it has had no effect, but in the other object shadowing has been successful to a considerable extent, the right hon. Gentleman has inflicted a good deal of annoyance and suffering upon his opponents. But, Sir, it is not calculated in the long run to serve the ultimate purpose and interest of the Government, and it is totally unworthy of any Minister who intends to govern in a constitutional manner. I have already drawn attention to the fact that right hon. Gentleman yesterday confined the whole of his speech to this question of shadowing, but the Debate has not been confined to such cases, many cases being brought to notice in which the police have acted with gross and wanton violence. They have burst into houses without warrant or the slightest justification, and in various oppressive forms they have been guilty of illegal action. We have had the case of Father Kennedy mentioned, and there the police, in the very teeth of a well known law, broke into the rev. gentleman's house, hustled him about, ill-treated the occupants of the house, and acted with the grossest insolence. We are often advised that in such cases, where persons have a grievance against the police, there is a legal remedy. Well, Father Kennedy took this legal means of enforcing remedy in a Court of Law. He brought an action against the police, who were defended by all the Crown lawyers. Father Kennedy succeeded in obtaining from a special jury a verdict and damages £100. But immediately the authorities moved for a new trial, and this rev. gentleman, who had already been put to enormous expense and great loss of time, had every obstacle thrown in his way in seeking that remedy the right hon. Gentleman has recommended. Up to this hour Father Kennedy has had no redress whatever; although the Judge laid down the law, and showed that the police acted with the greatest illegality, and the jury gave damages on the facts, there has not been one word of condemnation from the Chief Secretary of their conduct, and their defence, I suppose, is paid for out of public funds. It is a significant fact that at the trial that Government legal hack whom the Attorney General is trying to force on the acceptance of Trinity College, Mr. Carson, who defended the police, when he found the case was going against him turned to the jury and said, in the hope of appealing to some political prejudice among them, "Do not make a point against the Government by giving a verdict against their police!" That is the way the people of Ireland are met if they seek their legal remedy, and I ask the Committee is it fair, is it just, is it anything but a mockery to tell the poor peasant of Ireland that if he suffers wrong at the hands of the police there is a legal remedy by going into the Higher Courts. You might as well tell him to go to the Grand Llama of Thibet. If he asks justice at the Local Courts he comes face to face with the Local Magistrate, who is the accomplice of the police, and we shall probably find him sent to prison for having the audacity to complain. In face of those facts, I say, it is idle and an outrage on the people of Ireland to refer them for their remedy against repeated acts of oppression and of cruelty on the part of the police to the Law Courts, when the Executive ought to be their remedy. The conduct of the Irish police during the last two years has been exceedingly bad. We have had frequent cause to complain of it. The fountain head of the evil is largely to be found on the Treasury Bench. The answers, the demeanour, the tone of the Chief Secretary, when we do make complaints to him, are of such a character as to incite the Irish police to fresh acts of violence. What have we seen? During the last three years we have seen that the Irish police have murdered four or five people. There have been four Coroners' Juries' verdicts of wilful murder against them. They have dispersed meetings, they have bludgeoned and batoned hundreds of perfectly peaceful and unresisting people, and yet in no single instance, from beginning to end, have they been punished or reprovved. On the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman reads out the first lie the police like to send him, and refuses absolutely to grant any inquiry. The result is that the police have now come to several conclusions, the first of which is that they can do whatever they like with most absolute impunity and safety; secondly, that the more offensive, the more insulting, and the more outrageous their conduct is, provided alone it is against the Nationalists, the better chance they have of promotion. The consequence is that we have in the ranks of the Irish police the demoralisation and the disorganisation which has already been described at considerable length in this House, and which, I must say, threatens that Force with the most evil consequences. That I consider a very great evil in Ireland, and, I regret to say, it is a growing evil. That demoralisation has shown itself in a great variety of ways.

No one can visit the country without seeing it. In the districts where subsistence and extra allowances are made on a large scale they are spent on drink. The police there, owing to their long hours of duty, as well as to the intense unpleasantness of the duty, indulge in great quantities of liquor, and the consequence is that it has become quite a common thing for constables to be found half drunk and in a state of incapacity. A number of cases have been brought before this House. A case occurred the other day in Tipperary, which the right hon. Gentleman says is now under investigation. It was on St. John's Eve, in Tipperary, at nine o'clock, when a policeman left barrack and walked some distance out of the town. On his way he came to a bonfire, around which some girls were dancing. He went in amongst the girls, struck two or three of them, using the foulest language. He then went on, and the first house he came to he wrecked the windows. Then he went on to another house, and also smashed the windows. Then he went on to another house, and also smashed the windows, and made several efforts to burst the door. After completely breaking every window in the front, he proceeded to the back, where he also destroyed the windows. Having wrecked Mr. Corbett's humble dwelling, he proceeded to the house of Mr. John Tring, but here his fortunes were much less favoured. After breaking five panes of glass, the owner of the house was aroused, and rushing out of bed, he pursued the constable in his nightdress, and, with the assistance of a dog, succeeded in capturing him, and taking him to the barracks. That is a performance recently achieved by one of these guardians of law and order in Tipperary. The right hon. Gentleman has drawn the most lurid pictures of the wrecking of houses in Tipperary, when they were never wrecked at all, when only the glass was broken, but here was a case where a policeman wrecked a whole house off his own bat.

An hon. MEMBER: By moonlight?

MR. DILLON: Yes, by moonlight, and yet we never heard a word about it from the Chief Secretary. I think that constable is entitled to honourable mention by the right hon. Gentleman. It has been said, and said quite truly, that the Irish police are becoming daily more oppressive, more cruel, and more disorderly. Now, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the other day the mob marched through the streets of Tipperary, wrecking the houses of their political opponents, and throwing explosive machines about. What I should like to know is, if this be the case, where were the police? If they allowed these houses to be wrecked where they had a garrison of 130 armed policemen for a population of 7,000, inhabitants, I ask has human experience ever heard of such a thing? I say that they ought all of them to be stripped of their clothes to-morrow, as an utterly worthless and absurd Force, if they are unable to prevent the wrecking of the houses of the inhabitants of Tipperary. The whole system is absolutely and utterly at fault, and when the right hon. Gentleman gets up to defend it in this House, he is bound to contradict himself in every second sentence. The right hon. Gentleman himself incites the police to acts of violence and cruelty by his answers and speeches in this House. He has also incited the Magistrates and all the officials in Ireland to act in an un-constitutional way by the repeated and reckless inaccuracy of his answers and statements. Only yesterday he described a most dreadful case of boycotting, which he said was a typical case in the County of Waterford, where a poor man was prevented from selling his pigs. The man Power who prevented him, he said, was now lying in gaol for shadowing this man. The man Power was arrested it is true, but he was released on appeal by County Court Judge Waters. He has not been in gaol for the last four months. That is a sample of the way in which the right hon. Gentleman goes on. He does not take the trouble to inform himself on Irish affairs, and where he has not got a policeman's story ready, he tosses out whatever first comes to hand. Our complaints in these matters are complaints about the administration of the law in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman sought to ride off on the great and oppressive powers which were taken by the Government of Mr. Forster and Lord Spencer when they were responsible for the Government of Ireland.

But these powers were conferred upon them by the House of Commons, and cruel and oppressive and wrong as they were—they undoubtedly were wrong—every Member of the House of Commons was equally responsible for them with Lord Spencer, and Mr. Trevelyan and Mr. Forster. These Gentlemen, when they ruled Ireland—although I contend that by these powers they ruled cruelly—ruled under the law, bad as the law was. But our complaint against the right hon. Gentleman is this, that many of the greatest evils of his are evils of administration of the law, and not of the law itself. One of the most acute and the most common-sense observers who ever wrote on political matters was Arthur Young, and when he came to Ireland and wrote that delightful and remarkable book on Travels in Ireland, he used an expression which has often been quoted, and which cannot be quoted too often. He says:—

“To discover what the liberty of a people is we must live amongst them, and not look for it in the statutes of the realm. The language of the written law may be the language of liberty. The situation of the poor may speak nothing but the language of slavery.”

Those words apply just as much to Ireland now as when Arthur Young wrote them in 1777. The language of the law in Ireland to-day is not the language of liberty. I am sorry to say it is often the very reverse, but when we come to the language of its administration we find that, in the words of Arthur Young, it speaks nothing but the language of slavery. Another complaint that we have to make against the police in Ireland is that they are not used for the purpose of preserving the peace, and that they are not used mainly for the purpose of protecting the citizens, but that they are used for the selfish purpose of one small class of the community. I will give one most curious and amusing instance illustrative of this fact. I have here the notebook of a plain-clothes constable of the Royal Irish Constabulary, which has come into my possession. No doubt the constable indulged too freely in stout, and lost it. At any rate it is very interesting. It appears that this constable is at present engaged, at the expense of the British taxpayer, in watching the stock which the hon. Member for South Tyrone has lent to the plantation tenants of the Brooke estate, for fear that the tenants should steal their own stock. Did ever anyone hear of such a thing? He has to count this stock every week lest these precious tenants should steal it. Here are entries made by the constable in reference to the clipping of sheep, and comments on various agricultural matters. Finding his duties light the constable, being of a poetical turn of mind, breaks out into poetry. So we now find that amongst the various duties of the Royal Irish Constabulary is that of contributing to the poetical literature of the land. Here is the original poem, as yet unpublished. I am prepared now to sell it for the benefit of the Plan of Campaign.

“’Tis said in merry spring
That love is strongest on the wing,
That Cupid wheels through flowery May
His airy flight, his golden way
To die in bleak December day.
’Tis said that when the merles sing
And cowslips in the meadows spring,
And daisies on the lea are seen,
And woods resume their summer green,
And wanton lambs begin to play,
And larks at daybreak tune their lay.”

Well, these are, I daresay, very beautiful songs, and I have no objection to a constable cultivating his poetic taste, only I think the poet ought to earn his own living. Here is another specimen on which the poet takes an amatory turn—“Cause why your mother knows, my love,

My little flower of the May,
That often, often did I rove
By this same woodland way,
To woo your eldest sister, Kate,
When we were young together.
But Kate is waxing old, my pet,
So do not tell your mother.”

Of course I have no objection to the constable writing poetry, but I do object to these men being lent for the purpose of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, unless he pays for them with his own money. The police in Ireland have attained their inflated condition simply in order that they may be the servants of the Irish landlords; and if it were not for this, coupled with the maladministration of the law in Ireland, one third of the Force would be able to do the whole of the work. I say this is an outrage on the taxpayers of this country, and still more upon the poor people of Ireland, who are thus deprived of money which might be spent for some useful purpose. Primary education is starved. University education is starved. Every important department is starved, and yet we have imposed upon us the most gigantic, the most overpaid, and the most useless Police Force the world has ever seen. It is for these reasons that we oppose this Vote, and we say that the time has come when the whole matter ought to be looked into. The Police Force of Ireland ought to be reduced to the level of that of England. The people are peaceable and crimeless, if they are fairly governed, and if the Irish landlords require 10,000 armed men they had better levy the money for their pay from off their own estates.

(8.5.) MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I think the speech we have just heard is a sufficient answer to what the Chief Secretary has said in regard to the practice of shadowing. The right hon. Gentleman gave us several instances, by way of defence, to show that a similar system had been pursued by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, but he did not take the trouble to get up his facts, and did not know those facts that are essential to make good his case. Whilst the right hon. Gentleman was giving us these, as he thought, parallel cases, he was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo "At what distance did the policeman follow?" And his answer was, "I cannot say." Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian asked, "Was the policeman in uniform?" Again the right hon. Gentleman replied, "I cannot answer that." I am sure the Committee will recognise that the answers to these two questions are absolutely essential, and upon them depend the value of the parallel drawn. We do not complain of ordinary watching, we do not complain of detective duty enforced everywhere; what we complain of is this new system of dogging the footsteps of innocent men persistently by policemen in uniform, an annoyance that the detective system has never caused. I hope answers to these questions will be forthcoming. Then there is another point. The Chief Secretary has stated times and times again in this House, when told that English visitors to Ireland had been subjected to this shadowing process, that this was not so. Time after time he has declared this deliberately, and has gone so far as to say that, if a person was thus shadowed, it was not on account of his formidable appearance, but because of his being in company with people suspected of having committed or being about to commit crime. The only people shadowed, he said, were those to whom suspicion attached. Now, in regard to that, the noble Lord the Member for Somerset got up yesterday and told the right hon. Gentleman that three of his friends visiting Ireland had been shadowed from the time they landed to the time they left. Thereupon the right hon. Gentleman thought it a proper answer to make that he did not know much about such cases, but if the three friends of the noble Lord were shadowed it must have been because they were very suspicious-looking characters. How he can reconcile that with his previous remarks upon shadowing I cannot understand. I suppose he thought it made a telling retort in debate, but I cannot reconcile it with the statement that shadowing is for the prevention of boycotting and intimidation. Well, Sir, there is one point upon which I should like to say a few words with regard to this Police Vote, and it is a point which, in my humble opinion, appears to go to the root of the whole system of government in Ireland—the unreliability of police evidence. All the statements the right hon. Gentleman makes in the House in answer to questions, all the speeches he and his followers make in the House or in the country, are made on the strength of evidence supplied by the police in Ireland, and it is on the strength of information thus supplied he asks Members of this House to support his policy. Now we know, everybody in this House knows, that time and time again there have been conflicts of evidence here, time and time again my hon. Friends have contradicted police reports and challenged statements made by the Chief Secretary on the strength of these reports, and time and time again we have asked for inquiry to test whether we are right in our facts or the Chief Secretary in his information, and invariably the right hon. Gentleman has refused such inquiry. Under these circumstances we are justified in insisting upon the truth of our own version. Just one instance I will give from my own experience to show what I mean. A few days ago I asked the Chief Secretary whether the police on eviction duty at Falcarragh had marched home from the scene singing "Glory, Alleluia!" The Chief Secretary in a flippant manner said so far as he knew it was rather a good humoured song and he did not see very much harm in it if they did. He farther went on to say that "The police did not sing except to beguile the weary time marching home, and not at the scene of the evictions."

Now, upon that fact I have received a letter from a gentleman who has given me permission to use his name. Unlike the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, when we quote a letter we can afford to give the name of the writer to show the bona fides of the information. The Rev. Father Kelly, parish priest of Dunfanaghy, writes—

"It is an audacious falsehood to say that the police do not sing at the scene of evictions."

He goes on to say that the "Savage yelling of the police is evidently intended for no other purpose than to irritate and insult the evicted persons and their friends."

It is a point that may or may not be of importance in itself, but, at any rate, it serves to show the untrustworthy nature of official information. Now we remember the debate upon the prohibited meetings of Cashel and Tipperary. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo gave a long description of the occurrences, and in the whole speech I do not think he mentioned a single incident to which he was not himself an eye-witness. Upon that occasion, as he is reported on June 10, the Chief Secretary said my hon. Friend had given an interesting account of the events, but that it was at variance with the official accounts furnished. Well, Sir, I do not know in what other way it could be shown that the official information was unreliable, for we who know my hon. Friend, and I think the great majority of people in the country and Members in the House, will prefer to believe what my hon. Friend says upon the evidence of his own eyes rather than the information supplied to the right hon. Gentleman. These two instances are sufficient to show my point, and I say the Chief Secretary has time and time again shown in this House that the information upon which he makes his statements and his speeches, which are so loudly cheered on the other side, is altogether false. Nevertheless, though there may be this direct conflict of testimony, inquiry into the truth is refused. In the only cases where it has been possible to test the accuracy of statements, in those cases where the right hon. Gentleman has been forced to submit to inquiry by Coroners' Inquests on the bodies of victims of police violence, such as the inquest upon O'Hanlon, at Youghal, the Mitchelstown victims, and the boy Heffernan, our versions given here in contradiction to police accounts have been shown, on the evidence of unimpeachable witnesses, to have been correct. That being so, then I say that so far as tests have been applied they show that we can reasonably claim that in any divergence of statement the balance of probability is against the truth of the police reports. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman has to rely on official information, and, as arising out of the conditions under which Ireland is governed, and the relations that exist between the people and the police, we know that the officials who supply him with information will take care that it is compiled with due regard to their own interests and the necessities of their case. For many of these officials the only reason for existence is a continuance of the present state of things. Change the existing relations and these men would probably lose their positions. Pay and promotion depend upon the case they can make out, and under the circumstances it is not surprising that the information supplied to the Chief Secretary is concocted with due regard to the safety of their position. It is an evil that, of course, must last as long as the present state of things. The only possible remedy is to put the officials in Ireland in the same position as similar officials occupy in this country—to make them the servants of the people, instead of, as they now consider themselves in Ireland, the masters of the people, responsible to nobody, and having no other thought than how they best may make a lucrative position more secure.

*(8.20.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): There is, I think, no subject in connection with administration in Ireland that can be more profitably discussed than this Police Vote. Nothing, I contend, more contributes to separate and keep apart the people of Ireland from the people of England than the maintenance of the Irish Constabulary on its present lines. The people of England who have not visited Ireland have no conception of what it is, the existence among the people of this armed and irresponsible Force in every town and village, an incubus upon all civil life with no effective control over it. It is a Force which, though nominally Irish, is not Irish in feeling or tradition or any of its connections. It is among us, but not of us. It is not a civil Force to protect us and our property in our daily lives, and to prevent and detect crime among us, for, having no sympathy with the people, its functions fail in this respect. Every means is taken to separate the Force from the people: a man is not allowed to serve in the county where he is known, and if he marries a woman from another county then there are two counties from which, as a constable, he is excluded. We do not desire anything unreasonable, and we recognise that a policeman must not be so connected with a district as to hamper him in his duties for the prevention and detection of crime, but here is a body of men set apart and beyond the feelings and opinions of all the people around them, a military Force separated from all sympathy with civil life. It is an extraordinary spectacle presented in Ireland, in many respects one of the most crimeless countries in the West of Europe—an enormous Police Force kept up at an extravagant expenditure, large sums are taken from the taxpayers, from the wages of the country, to keep up this system. It is the fact, I believe, that the Irish Constabulary are paid more than the national teachers in Ireland. Unless, indeed, you pay the men highly you cannot get them to do the work required of them, and to occupy a position hateful to the great majority of their countrymen. A great many instances of the ill effects of the present system have been brought before the Committee; but there are one or two matters to which I should like to refer. Members of the Force have no distinguishing mark upon their uniform by which they can be identified and corrected when they go wrong or exceed their duty. What possible objection can there be to this arrangement, which obtains in this country and also in Dublin? We have a further development of the same in the practice of removing the marks from the uniforms of men who are sent from town to do duty in the country. There can be no object in this except to prevent people having the means of any redress whenever a policeman does wrong. Hence it is the police have not that sense of responsibility which ought to attach to men in their position. Then we have these policemen taking upon themselves in the small towns of Ireland to order people to move on whenever a man or woman stops to exchange a word with friend or neighbour. Why, men can stop and talk in the streets of the great towns in this country and no one dreams of calling it obstruction of the thoroughfare. It takes an extraordinary amount of ingenuity to manufacture a crime out of the act of two citizens talking in the street. The truth is, there is more obstruction of thoroughfare in a few yards of the Mile End Road on a Saturday night than in the whole of Ireland in the course of a year. On every possible occasion the police take it upon themselves to interfere with the rights and liberties of the people. It is not so long ago that we drew attention here to the action of the police toward public collections, made on behalf of the defence of our leaders from false charges publicly brought against them. I was honorary secretary or treasurer to a section of this fund, and it came to my knowledge that the police had interfered to prevent in country villages the people from subscribing of their own free will. Well, we did not want to discourage collections in other places, for we know the people are practically at the mercy of the police, and so we made no stir in the matter; but, as a matter of fact, the police interfered even to prevent collections being made in front of churches on Sundays. Many instances might be given from the experience of men who have knowledge of life in Ireland of the irresponsible Bashi-Bazouk action of the police in Ireland, and the dread in which they are held by the peaceable and law-abiding population. I was visiting at the house of a friend in County Wicklow, and there I was taken ill, and suffered much at night from the incessant howling of a dog near the house. I asked if anything could be done to stop the nuisance, and I was told "no," because the animal belonged to the Police Inspector, and the case must be very extreme that should necessitate any complaint being made of him. Now this was not the case of a poor man. My friend was a member of the Society of Friends, and of good position, and yet so reluctant was he to have any possible disagreement with a Police Inspector that he would not interfere to stop the barking of a dog. This being so, what is to be done in the case of the poor people who have no backing, and are left consequently to the mercy of the police? It is very difficult, indeed, for Englishmen to conceive the position in which the Irish towns and districts are placed under a Government like this. I do not say that these men are naturally wicked beyond other men, but the position in which they are placed is enough to corrupt and demoralise them, and I have observed that corruption and demoralisation have been going on more and more during the period of office of the present Administration. Beyond this we have to complain that we are compelled to provide more money than we ought in order to keep up the wretched system of espionage that goes on in Ireland. It is not so very long ago that I attended a meeting in South Tipperary, a meeting which was in itself of so little importance that it was not even noticed in the Irish papers. It was held at a time when the ground was covered with snow, and the weather was exceedingly hard and cold, and when I reached the place I saw what seemed to be a small brigade of men drawn up on the snow with an officer in front of them as if he were commanding a body of men in the field in the face of an enemy. I ask this Committee, is it not probable that under circumstances of this kind men placed in such a position would be very likely, if the opportunity arose, to pay it off upon the people? I noticed that they had two sets of police cars and three notetakers ready, so that if the meeting had been broken up into three divisions, to follow each division. On other occasions I have seen and heard of things on the part of the police which have stirred my blood. We have heard within the last few days of the police singing "Glory, Halleluia!" when coming home from evictions, and I ask the Chief Secretary whether he thinks that if there were the slightest amount of chivalry on the part of the Irish Government those things would not be put down and prevented. However, what they are doing in this way is only damaging their own cause. So far as we, the Representatives of the National Party are concerned, their conduct is all the better for us, because in acting in this manner the Government are only hastening their own downfall. I cannot imagine anything worse than the toleration they give to the expressions of joy and hilarity on the part of the police when returning from scenes in which they have assisted in evicting poor tenants and turning them out on the roadside. Evictions, of course, may in certain cases be necessary, although I do not think they are in the large majority of the cases that have come before us; but, I ask, is it necessary that the police who are called upon to assist in these evictions should be encouraged to such a state of mind in the performance of their duties? But beyond this we constantly have cases of the interference of the police with the natural rejoicings of the people on occasions when those rejoicings can have no sinister aspect. There was not very long ago the occasion of the marriage of Mr. William O'Brien, a man who holds a position in Ireland which, amongst the Irish people, is far above that of any person in this country. The Irish people know and feel that there is no one who has done more than he has done on their behalf. There are, I think, few men upon whom the English people look upon with so much affection and devotion as are accorded to the hon. Gentleman to whom I have referred. The people, with a view of showing their estimation of the hon. Member, lit a few bonfires, and the police were actually employed for the purpose of putting out those bonfires, although they had practically no political significance, and were merely expressive of the popular rejoicing on a peaceable occasion. In addition to this, we have had other cases brought before us, like that which was mentioned last night, where police were convicted by Irish Juries of murder, and yet those very police were singled out for advancement. But we are told in Ireland that if we only adopt peaceable means everything will be right, and yet, when we do adopt peaceable means, in cases where we have to defend our rights, our action is rendered absolutely worthless by the way in which we are met by the Governmental system. With regard to the police, I think it is a shame that the promotion attainable by the men should depend on the extent to which they can procure convictions. This is clearly an encouragement to them in bringing, perhaps, false charges against the people. There was the Crossmaglen case, in which several men were sentenced to from seven to 10 years' penal servitude, and most of us who looked into the matter believed those men to be absolutely innocent, and I think I may say that the late Lord Carnarvon was of the same opinion. The police after their conviction were promoted. In point of fact, the police are leagued against our people, whatever is said in this House on their behalf, although it may only be upon the evidence of a single individual, he is always believed, even as against the assertions made by the Members sitting on these Benches. I ask who is it that has the greatest incentive to tell an untruth? I say that in the case of Ireland it may be the policeman, and we ought to consider the fact that the graver the charges, and the more they detract from the character of our countrymen, the more sure are the Irish police to obtain advancement, as long as they stick to their guns. From our point of view, this is a most insensate policy. We are, however, always told that we have the remedy of the Courts, but we know exactly what that remedy means for Ireland. We know that, however strong may be our case, and however much money we may collect for the purpose of prosecuting it, the authorities invariably manage to wriggle out, no matter under what Administration. It used to be said that if Irishmen would only come more frequently over to England, that if there were a sort of bridge between the two countries by which communication could be made more easy, the Irish people would see that the English method of governing was right. But the fact is the direct contrary. The more we come here and the more we see, the more determined we are never to submit to the continuance of the existing system. At a late meeting in Hyde Park I was particularly struck with the account which appeared in the papers of an attack made upon an hon. Member of this House (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan). The people tried to pull him off his horse. The man who had thrown stones at him was pointed out to the police, and yet the English police refused to arrest him, because they were not absolutely certain of his identity. If a similar proceeding had occurred at a meeting in Ireland there would perhaps have been a dozen men shot down. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary invariably shelters himself under the miserable tu quoque argument, which is no argument at all. I think that the highest glory attaching to the statesmanship of the men who are championing the Irish cause in England is that they have changed their minds, and find that the old policy of Irish Government will no longer do. There is no doubt that in the days of previous Governments things were very weak and bad, but at the same time there was in those days the plea that the Government had no positive proof as to the opinions of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people. They had always on their side the argument that it was not proved to them what the majority of the people thought. If, however, we wait a year or two we shall have the majority on our side. Last night the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) treated us to a very stirring lesson as to how the action of the present Government in Ireland was the result of our conduct. In answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman I would say this, that no matter what he says we still feel that he is an Irishman, and we may still hope that he will arrive at a different opinion in regard to this matter. Since I have been in this House the worst things I have heard said in it of the Irish Representatives have not been said by hon. Members born in Ireland, but by men who have gone to Ireland and made their living there, and have used the position they have thus obtained to defame and deride the country in which they have been placed. We can well bear being told of the "mean and contemptible" position taken up by Members on this side of the House, for we know that the really mean and contemptible position taken up long ago by those Irish Representatives who, instead of listening to the voice of their countrymen, endeavoured to forward their own position and that of their friends and relatives. Whatever the present condition of Ireland is, is undoubtedly the result of long centuries of misgovernment, through which the people had been unable to express their wishes and desires. This state of things never would have existed if we had always had the same voice in the conduct of affairs as we have now in the British Parliament. The hon. and gallant Gentleman made the extraordinary proposition that if three-fourths of the people of London were against the law, as they are in Ireland, a very much larger Police Force would be necessary. No; the law would then be changed. That is very much like saying that the people of Ireland are different to those in England, or any other country. In a properly constituted country it is the people that make and sustain the law. We are constantly being told of the effects of boycotting, but it is my belief that but for the boycotting which has taken place of late years, we in Ireland should have gone back to an older and much worse system. But for some such means we would have had no hope of redress. To condemn exclusive dealing under all circumstances is unjust and absurd. Because there is a disposition to resist and rebel against what is called the law in Ireland, is certain proof that the law is wrong as it exists. Now, Mr. Courtney, we are protesting against the Police Force, but anyone who knows what our desires and intentions are well know that we have no objection to a proper Police Force. I believe a proper Police Force will always, unfortunately, be necessary in any country which is to be governed. We want such a Force as you have in England, a Force under the control of the people themselves; and we believe that in Ireland, as in every other country, the Irish people will select the best men to control the police and administer every other institution of their country. We want a strong and honest Police Force, not a Police Force such as the present, which is maintained against the protests of the people, which in Ireland tends to confusion, misery, and breaches of the law, and which tends to separation and alienation between the two countries. (8.48.)

*(9.18.) MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I would ask to be allowed to say a few words in regard to my own experience—and I am sorry I am not able to give the result of that experience in the presence of more Members. The first matter I would bring under the notice of the House is the conduct of the police in the county of Monaghan. It is pretty well known that for some time, and until quite recently, there was a serious dispute going on in the town of Carrickmacross between the people of that town and the Great Northern of Ireland Railway Company. The people had a right to expect that in any dispute of this kind they should be left to themselves; but, as a matter of fact, the police were brought in, and were used on the side of the Railway Company to harass the people. One of the excuses most generally given by the Chief Secretary, in his most pathetic tones, is that the police are only used for the protection of the poor and the helpless. He generally draws some harrowing picture of some poor boycotted person whose treatment at the hands of his neighbours is cruel in the extreme, and he says that on these occasions the police protect the weak against the strong.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. P. O'BRIEN: The history of the dispute to which I refer is this. About Christmas, 1886, a landlord, named Shirley, evicted 12 families from their homes. A gentleman named Phelan, residing in the town of Carrickmacross, who was also a tenant of this particular landlord—a respectable man and a Justice of the Peace—visited the evicted tenants after their eviction, at a time when the place was covered with snow, in his capacity of Chairman of the Board of Guardians. His desire was to see if any, and if so, how many wanted shelter and relief. This not unnaturally displeased the landlord, and he took measures to convey his displeasure.

He wrote several letters to Mr. Phelan, asking him why he interfered with the tenantry. In the March following Mr. Shirley evicted 21 families—altogether 100 souls. For the purpose of getting rid of these people—who were applying to the Land Court to have a fair rent fixed—150 police were called into requisition. As a means of averting this state of things, Mr. Phelan assisted these people to fill up applications to enable them to go into the Land Court. They used his house for the purpose, and for this unpardonable offence Mr. Phelan was called on by Mr. Shirley to surrender his house, which was one of the best in the town. It was not a question of non-payment of rent. Mr. Phelan owed no rent, in fact he was, I am glad to say, then, as now, in a much better financial position than his landlord. But this was a vindictive attempt on the part of Mr. Shirley to punish Mr. Phelan. Soon after Mr. Phelan was evicted the station master of the Great Northern Railway in the town married a servant of Mr. Shirley, and forthwith he was installed in the house of this evicted Justice of the Peace. The people resented this, and they called on the Railway Company to provide another house for their servant, who was grabbing this gentleman's house. The Railway Company, who feel so warmly with Mr. Shirley and the evicting going all over Ireland, declined to do this, and the people took steps to make them surrender. They practically boycotted the company. They withdrew their trade from the company, and established a carrying system of their own, by horses, to take their goods down to Dundalk—as I think it will be admitted they had a right to do, either in Ireland or any other country. But what was the result? The Government came to the help of the landlord and the Railway Company. They lent the use of the police to harass the people. The police took the names of people who were carrying goods and sending them, and they did everything they could to annoy and, if possible, to drive the people into committing some breach of the law—which, I am glad to say, they failed in. That was all done at the instigation of Mr. Shirley, at whose house the police put up, and at whose house the officers constantly dined. The railway Directors began to feel that the pressure was too much for them, they began to feel that some day they would have to face the shareholders, and account to them for a decrease in the dividend. They not unnaturally thought that they should come to terms rather than quarrel about this man's house. Just as they were about to remove the man from the place, Divisional Commissioner Cameron came up from Belfast, and then and there began to use his influence to prevent the Railway Company surrendering the house. And so the fight went on for six months more, the people in the meantime being harassed. Every man of any prominence in the town, whether clergyman or merchant, was shadowed wherever he went, but in the end—as always happens in these cases—the Railway Company were beaten. They gave up the house, and when they had done so they got back their trade. I think we have a right to complain of this employment of the police in carrying on such useless and unnecessary work. Plainly, the Directors of this company were used by the Government for the purpose of suppressing and beating down the people, and the police were placed at their backs. Since this fight ended we might naturally have expected that the police would have kept to police duty. It has, however, been my duty to put questions repeatedly in this House to the Chief Secretary asking him to explain why the priests of Carriackmacross have since been perpetually shadowed. The Rev. Father Callan, the Rev. Father O'Doherty, and other priests are persistently dogged from the town of Carriackmacross on Sundays to the outlying chapels, where they have to say Mass, and they are watched when they leave the chapels. It is well known that when a priest goes to an outlying chapel he has afterwards to attend to the sick calls of the district. The police are in waiting; they follow the priests up to the very doors of the people they have to attend. Some of the sick people have been so frightened by the gathering of the police around their doors that they have been almost in danger of their lives. As to shadowing in other parts of Ireland, I have been able to give some object lessons in it to the British public, which I hope will not be without effect. The description of the system drew from an hon. and gallant Gentleman on the other side of the House the very pithy, and, I think, true, expression of opinion that the thing was simply damnable. He referred, however, to only one instance. The thing is going on in numbers of places in Ireland. If I go to my own constituency, and attend my place of worship, I am shadowed not only up to the church but into the church. This is done to prevent me from addressing meetings, but there it fails, because if I mean to address a meeting I always do it. On a recent occasion I had to go to Clongorey, in the county of Kildare. I passed through the town, which was full of police. They did not happen to know me, and I was able to go out to a place within sight of their barracks and hold a very large meeting. The shadowing system in the county of Monaghan is quite uncalled for. It is not alleged that there is any estate there—and I am sorry to say it—in which the Plan of Campaign has been adopted. To be sure the Chief Secretary says the National League is suppressed in that county. It is suppressed in the sense in which it is suppressed in other counties—that is to say, the meetings go on regularly every week, and the League was never in such a flourishing condition as it is to day. And yet the Chief Secretary deludes himself with the idea that he has suppressed the National League. Another way in which the police are used, is to give assistance in the work of Jury-packing. It will be in the recollection of some members of the Committee that, six or eight months ago, trials in connection with the death of Inspector Martin, in Donegal, took place in Queen's County. The Lord Chief Packer of Ireland, who is now Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, was there, and he packed the jury so well that I suppose that was the principal reason why he was able to step into the second highest judicial position in the land. The police were used to assist him in packing the Jury. District Inspector Warburton prepared the way for the redoubtable packer by calling on the police in the districts from which the panel was to be made up, to tick off the names, the religions, the politics, and so on, and to state whether, in their opinion, they thought each man could be relied on to give a verdict for the

Mr. P. O'Brien

Crown, and against Father M'Fadden and the peasants, who had been brought all the way from Donegal for this farce of a trial. I challenge the Chief Secretary, or the right hon. and learned Attorney General, to deny that the District Inspector acted as I have stated. I ask where, in the civilised world, would the police be used—at all events where trial by Jury is the rule—for such an evil purpose, as the marking off in advance, for the Crown lawyers, of the politics and the religion of the men who are sent to give a fair and impartial trial to men who are labouring under such a serious charge. It has been stated in this House that the police were in the habit of singing on their way to and from the infamous work of eviction. The Chief Secretary has denied it. I happen to have had direct personal experience of the fact, and the police not only sing as they go to evictions, but sing as they leave them. The Chief Secretary said, in apology for the police, that it was the usual thing for the military to sing while on the march. Well, I was present at the evictions in Donegal in the year 1889. The military were there, and I saw a troop of the gallant Scots Greys engaged in taking off, as prisoners of war, half-a-dozen little girls, one of whom was nine years old, and the eldest of whom was, I think, not more than 15 years of age. I thought if I had had the good fortune to have had my camera with me what an interesting object lesson would have been conveyed to the British people by the picture of these fine, brave men, who I am sure were ashamed of their work, and who, I think, would reflect honour and credit on the country if they were engaged with some equal foe, instead of being employed in turning out of their homes unfortunate people who had done them no wrong, and whose only fault was that they had endeavoured to keep the shelter of their houses over them until this House came to their assistance, as, of course, it will eventually have to do. If it is not done by the present Government it will be done by their successors, and we can see the near approach of those successors now. Well, the military did not sing either going to or coming from those evictions, but the quasi-military force, the police, when they had demolished the homes of the people and were marching away with District Inspector Cameron and the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Hayes Fisher) at their head, did sing, and the song they deliberately selected for the purpose of wounding the feelings of the people was, "Who killed Cock Robin?" Tipperary has lately been pretty often before the House, and I think hon. Members have not heard the last of it yet. Well, then the police are used not for the purpose of maintaining law and order, but with the deliberate intent of forcing the people into breaches of the law, so that the police may have the opportunity of breaking their heads, and providing some apology for the hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) with regard to the state of things into which he has brought the town. I remember the police being brought up to Cashel from Waterford, and the numbers were taken off their collars so that they might the more freely indulge in their blood-letting propensities and there might be more difficulty in detecting them. It has been a matter of complaint on both sides of the House, from time to time, that the police are not generally numbered in Ireland, and yet, in this instance, when they were numbered the numbers were taken off, in order that the men might be free to batter the people as they pleased without running much risk of detection. When these questions are brought forward the right hon. Gentleman says we have our remedy at law, and yet he takes every precaution he can to prevent the identification of these men. I am reluctant to refer to my own case, but I am bound to do so on this Vote. I want to repeat to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary the challenge I gave him some 12 months back about my treatment by the police in the City of Cork. There, too, the police have numbers on their collars, but on the particular occasion when they thought well to baton me nearly unto death, the men who had numbers were kept off the streets, and the strangers without numbers, and who could not be identified, were set to do the bloody work. The result was that I was nearly batoned to death with their rifle-butts. The Chief Secretary coolly told me then that I had my remedy in law. I challenged him then, and I challenge him now, to use the power at his command to get me the names of the four men who struck me, and I will try if there is to be any satisfaction to be got at law. I am afraid it is useless to appeal to him on the point, because he is more interested in hiding the police than in exposing them. But occasionally we are able to identify these men, and when they are brought before the Law Courts every ingenuity of the Crown lawyer is used to screen them, and if they are convicted, and a penalty is imposed upon them, it is very probable that the Crown not only pays the penalty imposed, but all the expenses of the trial as well. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will say to-night that he will take means to ascertain the names of the men who bludgeoned me in Cork. I do not propose to occupy the Committee longer. I have only to add that if he has not learnt something from the Barrow election, as I daresay he has, and he allows this state of things to go on, he may sometime tempt the people a bit too much, and perhaps an occasion may arise, when he has not his forces in large numbers, in which the people will seriously revolt. I hope he will take precautions in time, and simply use the police in their proper duties, and not any longer lend them to the landlords, for the purpose of batoning people whose only offence is that they have been unable to pay their rent, people who do not desire any quarrel with the police, or anybody else, but are quite content to await the return of the Liberal Government to power, when they know they will go back to their homes.

*(9.42.) SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I have not the least intention to detain the Committee at any length; I simply wish to bring to the notice of the people of this country the state of things in North Wexford, my own part of that county. I have never taken any particular opportunity of attacking the Royal Irish Constabulary, because I always hoped that the men might perhaps remember that they are Irishmen, and that they have Irish hearts under their British livery; that some of them might occasionally be led to act with some kind of decency towards the people from whom they sprung. It seems to me it is owing to the instructions and encouragement they have received, from the Government Bench that they have forgotten themselves, that they have been behaving themselves in a manner which is a disgrace to their nationality, and, to my mind, certainly a disgrace to their manhood. Now, as to the northern part of Wexford, it was only the other day I had occasion to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland a question about a police constable, named Quigley. The answer the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave me was one which led everybody to suppose that my direct charge was an utterly bogus one. The question I asked was whether a certain police constable, named Quigley, of Courtown, County Wexford, had boycotted a Nationalist tailor. The constable ordered a suit of clothes from the Nationalist tailor, but subsequently withdrew his order upon the instructions of the Head Constable. I was told in this House that it was not a fact that the constable had countermanded his order, and that my charge of boycotting, which was indirectly against the superior officer, was an utterly bogus charge. Since then I have received a letter from the tailor who was boycotted. He writes—

"Sub-constable Quigley, of Courtown, called at my house for some clothes. I measured him, and took note of his peculiar taste, and named a day he should have the clothes done. He went away, and in about 10 or 20 minutes he returned, and asked me to give him back the clothes, saying, 'Give me back the clothes: Mr. Bulger, the Head Constable, has ordered me to take them away from you.'"

Then he goes on to say that the sub-constable took the clothes away, but after three days he secretly sent them back by a man he chanced to meet. This Head Constable is at the present moment a ruler in the north of County Wexford. I believe he was originally a stable-boy in the employment of the late Earl of Granard. Since then he has risen in the world, and is now a full-blown Head Constable. He is one of the prime movers in the prosecution of the Nationalist farmers in North Wexford. I should like to bring under the notice of the Committee another case of boycotting, in which this very same constable was implicated. This is the case of a butcher, named Michael Redmond. Redmond was suspected of Nationalist proclivities. He had previously supplied the police barracks in that part of the county with meat, but the Head Constable went to him and told him he would rather take poison than taste his meat in future, and he would do what he could to take the police custom away from him, which he did with very great success. Several of the police barracks which used to deal with the man Redmond withdrew their custom at the instigation of the same Head Constable. If that is not boycotting I should like to know what is. The Head Constable has been instrumental in bringing charges against the shopkeepers, for instance, against Mr. James Redmond, butcher, against the same Mr. Michael Redmond, butcher, and against Mr. John Grey. These men were threatened with prosecution because they refused to supply certain emergency men with goods. The case against these shopkeepers was this:—Two policemen went round to the different shops of the town of Gorey, with an emergency man called Johnson, who asked to be supplied with goods. They went in the first place to Michael Redmond, who was boycotted by the Head Constable, and Johnson asked Redmond for meat. Redmond had never supplied Johnson with meat before, and told him to go to his own butcher. He had no knowledge of the man, and knew nothing of his means to pay for what he received. The same tactics were followed in the cases of James Redmond and John Grey, and the result is that the men are now threatened with prosecution by the police for boycotting. I have another complaint to bring against another police official in County Wexford, namely, Sergeant Ferris, of Gorey. I asked a question of the Attorney General for Ireland, and the answer I received was to the effect that this sergeant, against whom a report had been made as to drunkenness by a superior officer, had been placed in a sort of Supernumerary List. In January last, this man was seen in the public streets of Gorey in a hopeless condition of drunkenness, and I believe a complaint was made against him by his superior officer. A short time after that five Nationalist farmers were, on the evidence of Ferris, sent to gaol for boycotting. In the course of his evidence against these men, Ferris swore he had never been drunk, although he had been reported to the authorities and had been carried through the streets in a drunken condition. The depositions which the sergeant made at the time, and on which the farmers were sent to gaol, were signed by the local District Inspector, who had previously made complaints against Ferris for drunkenness. This man, who swore he was never drunk, and upon whose evidence these farmers were sent to gaol, was drunk to the knowledge of the superior officer who signed his depositions. I think we have a right to ask that this Crown witness should be prosecuted for perjury, and that the men who were sent to gaol upon his evidence should be released, or that, at all events, an inquiry should be held. We have a number of good specimens of the Royal Irish Constabulary in Gorey. There is, for example, a constable called Harper. On Friday, the 20th of June, Mr. James Redmond, whom I have already mentioned, and who is particularly obnoxious to the Constabulary, proceeded to the railway station. As he was going down he met a number of policemen, who were escorting a Plan of Campaign prisoner to the Wexford Gaol. Redmond interfered in no wise, but Constable Harper ran on before him, and, just as he was going into the railway station, knocked him down without any provocation or excuse whatsoever. Redmond, who is not a strong man, was rather seriously injured, so much so that he was not able to attend to his business for the next few days. Constable Harper was beforehand with Redmond. Although he himself had done all the maltreating, he served a writ upon Redmond for assault. Nothing has been yet done to the constable. What I want to know is, whether it conduces to law and order in Ireland that members of the Police Force, individuals who are paid for the preservation of order in Ireland, are allowed to assault peaceable and well-behaved citizens, proceeding about their ordinary duties, simply at their will and pleasure, and without any punishment or any attempt at censure from those responsible for law and order. The fact is that, under the administration of affairs by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary, the police in Ireland seem to think that they can do what they like with everybody. They seem to think they are lords and masters of the country, and that no one can get up in the morning or go to bed at night without their consent. I do not know that I should be justified in detaining the Committee any longer. I will only suggest, with all due deference to the present governors of Ireland, the desirability of maintaining real law and order, and of endeavouring to instil some small modicum of respect for law into the heads of those whom they charge with the administration of the law.

(9.59.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to move the reduction of which I have given notice. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo referred to the extra duties the Constabulary are called upon to perform in Ireland at present. I propose to add to the list he gave. I have to call attention to that most important fact that last winter when the friends of the tenants' cause throughout Ireland determined to raise funds for the sustenance of evicted tenants, all the efforts of the Constabulary were directed to defeating the collection. There was scarcely a county in Ireland in which collections were not made, and there was scarcely a county in Ireland in which the collections were not obstructed by the police, who even took up positions at chapel doors, taking down the names of those subscribing, and otherwise intimidating them. I read, in the course of the winter, a speech made by the Chief Secretary, in which he alleged that the collections were made by the people by means of intimidation. The intimidation was all on the other side, and that there was no intimidation on our side is proved by the fact that not a single prosecution resulted from the making of these collections. Sir, I consider this a most iniquitous use of the Constabulary, and I consider all the men employed in this way might be dispensed with, to the greater peace and prosperity of the country. Another curious employment of the Constabulary is in the distribution of Unionist pamphlets. The Government apparently have not quite given up the idea that in the Recess they might still continue, with hope of success, to try to convert the people of Ireland to Unionist principles, and last winter these efforts took the form of circulation of Unionist literature. The pamphlet I refer to is entitled—

"The present position of the Irish farmer under the Land Act and the advantages accruing to the tenant for the acquisition of his holding in the most favourable way possible."

I contend that this employment of the police is illegal, and an abuse of the public money voted for police purposes in Ireland. The Government have agents enough in Ireland, voluntary agents, in the shape of various Unionist organisations for the circulation of Party literature, but they are not justified in spending a penny of the public money, or a day of a policeman's time, in the distribution of Unionist literature. The pamphlet, in the present instance, was printed without name of author or printer, and parenthetically I may remark that it is a characteristic of Unionist literature that it is published anonymously, the writers in many cases being ashamed to give their names. But a new feature has been developed in last winter's campaign of the Government, and I say that every penny of expenditure in this circulation of literature is a violation of the conditions under which the money was voted by this House. Well, Sir, the police have been turned not only into "shadowers" and distributors of anonymous literature, but they have acted as toll collectors. Last winter they collected Mr. Smith-Barry's tolls in Tipperary. On one occasion, October of last year, after the dispute between Mr. Smith-Barry and his tenants had reached an acute stage, five or six policemen, with loaded rifles and revolvers, stood at the usual Customs gaps where Mr. Smith-Barry's collectors demand toll upon stock. When the collectors were met with a refusal, the police came to the rescue of the collectors and threatened that, unless the objectors at once paid the demands, they should be arrested and carried off to the barrack, and, as a matter of fact, under the system of intimidation exercised, no less than 30 men, women, and children were arrested and placed in the lock-up of the town of Tipperary. Then, have we not heard the Chief Secretary and his predecessors repeatedly declare that police were employed at evictions simply to protect from violence the Sheriff in carrying out his official functions, and, I suppose, it will be said that the police were placed in the Customs gaps of Tipperary to protect Mr. Smith-Barry's men in the collection of tolls. But observe that there is proof that the police went much further than that; they actually themselves became toll collectors, and, in carrying out that occupation, they arrested 30 persons in a single day. I say, again, this is a new departure, an illegitimate use of the Constabulary, and that this requires defence or explanation in this House. We arraign the Constabulary system in Ireland as a system of violence and corruption. I think the Committee will have expected that some answer should have been given to the speeches of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. H. Gladstone) and my hon. Friend the Member for North East Cork in reference to the Charleville affair. Last year, the Committee may remember, the defence of the Chief Secretary for this assault upon the people was that the firing was a necessity, and that their lives were threatened. This was the police statement, and the right hon. Gentleman at once adopted it, and has adhered to it ever since. But, Sir, if there is any pretence that has been exploded in the Courts of Ireland it is this defence for the police on this particular occasion. The facts have been before two tribunals, before two Judges and two special juries of the City of Dublin, and in each case two points were left to the jury: Was a person in the crowd hit by a bullet; and, secondly, supposing he was hit by a police bullet, were the police justified in firing at all? Upon the first of these points the juries failed to agree, and, indeed, it was a matter upon which they might have some doubt; that is, whether the injury to the plaintiff was actually caused by a bullet or not, and, therefore, it was not necessary for them to consider the second question. But the charges of both the learned Judges, and the known opinion of the jury in the second action, leave no doubt that if the juries had been at liberty to give a finding upon the second question, they would unhesitatingly have condemned the firing of the police as an act of murderous folly. The opinion of Mr. Justice Murphy, no sympathiser with the Nationalist Party, and of Chief Baron Palles, universally recognised as an impartial Judge—and I had the good fortune to listen to one of them—was that the police fired without any justification whatever, and that if any person had been killed by the discharge of their revolvers, then that would unquestionably have been a case of murder. I should like to know, Are these expressions of judicial opinion to go for nothing; are they to be treated with as much contempt as the speeches of Irish

Members? Are these murderers—for so in intent they were—to go scot-free, and the House of Commons to vote their salaries? Perhaps they will have promotion. I think it is our duty to put these facts clearly before the people of this country. I will now draw attention to a very flagrant and a fatal case of police violence; happily, the Charleville case was not fatal. The case of the lad Heffernan told by the police has been referred to, but with nothing like the fulness it deserves, and I may briefly remind the Committee of the facts. This case has been before a judicial tribunal—before the Coroner's Court in Tipperary—and lest to-night the Chief Secretary may indulge in one of his sneers at the Coroner for Tipperary who presided at the inquiry, I may mention at once that at the conclusion of the investigation, each of the three parties represented by the mouths of their legal advocates, declared that the Coroner had discharged his duty in a perfectly unexceptional manner. The well-known Mr. George Bolton, Crown prosecutor, and notorious hack of the worst description—a man who ought to have been dismissed by the late Liberal Government; Mr. George Bolton, who appeared for the Government—and I mention this because it may add force to the terms in which I have referred to the Coroner's inquiry—said, offering no opinion on the verdict, that in the course of a long experience “he had never known an investigation conducted with greater ability, fairness, or impartiality.” Mr. Redmond, who represented the next-of-kin, testified also to the fairness of the inquiry, and in this Mr. Pinfell, who represented the constables, joined. I hope that in the face of these expressions of opinion, and from such an impartial quarter as Mr. George Bolton, we shall not hear any sneers at the verdict of the Coroner's Court. Now, what was done on that occasion? The boy was murdered, and, I take it, the taking of human life is the greatest crime known to the law. What are the facts of the case? The life of a perfectly innocent boy was taken away in the public street, where it is the right of every citizen to walk without harm, and that life was taken by those whose duty it is to protect the people. Certain facts were admitted, no attempt being made at denial. First, there was a disturbance in Tipperary, and Constable Tuohy was ordered by District Inspector Carter to fire a shot; secondly, that shot was fired, and killed a boy named Heffernan. Some disturbance took place, and it is said that stones were thrown, but surely that is no justification for the taking of human life. The crowd on this occasion, according to the police, consisted of only 40 or 50 persons, but the people state that the number was under 20. But, taking the estimate of the police, there were brought against this small body of 50 people, the majority of whom were proved to be boys, 20 fully-armed constables; and in the utter absence of anything like provocation or justification for such an extreme act, the order was given to the police to fire on them, and the boy was killed. Because some stones were thrown, it is alleged that these 20 fully-armed men, who had 15 of their comrades suitably armed near at hand, were in danger of their lives from an unarmed crowd of 50 persons. Was there ever a more preposterous invention to gull the British public? Of the arrests made on the occasion, three out of the four were boys. The stone-throwing was described by the police at the inquest in the most exaggerated language, the use of metaphor being freely indulged in; but, strange to say, in spite of it all, not a policeman was seriously hurt; not one had to be medically treated, or left his work for half an hour. There is no mark of stone-throwing. I have since stood at the corner where the police were standing, and where they were said to have been assailed; there is a large window there which must have been smashed had the stone-throwing been anything like the description given. I daresay, if a reply is made, the use of explosives by the crowd will be relied on as the police defence; but, Sir, the evidence, when examined, shows this is a bogus story, this of the use of explosives. District Inspector Carter swore to hearing explosives in Henry Street—that was where the mob were not near the police—and he said he did not consider these explosives endangered the lives of his men. Constable Stacey also produced the only explosive found, and swore he heard a number of explosions in Church Street, where the people were. So it appears these explosives were used in the midst of the people and not against the police at all. The lead pipe explosive would not, according to the police evidence, be likely to do much harm. The explosive theory is a bogus story, and the police never defended it. It is remarkable that, on this occasion, no baton charge was ordered, no Riot Act was read, no order was given to the people to disperse—the Police Regulations were altogether ignored. These regulations require a District Inspector, when he apprehends a disturbance, to go to the Magistrate of the district or his superior officers and take advice. The truth is, that this fatal shot was fired with the most utter and wanton disregard of the Police Regulations and of all principles of humanity. In these circumstances, it was impossible for the Coroner's Jury to come to any other conclusion than they did by their verdict that the police were guilty of wilful murder. And, then, how did the Government act? For very shame's sake they were obliged to prosecute those men, but they did so in a way to shield the police and to screen the murderer in defiance of the plainest rules of justice. George Bolton was directed to prosecute, he who had so often defended the violence of the police. It was a bogus trial; a transparent humbug. Out of 120 Magistrates in Tipperary, the Government sent the case before one of their Removables, Colonel Caddell, the superior officer of Inspector Carter, the person charged. In all the annals of Irish administration there is scarcely a parallel to the scandalous abuse of the forms of justice this trial afforded. Justice has been denied, and it will be a hard matter for the right hon. Gentleman to explain how, Sir, the whole position—the very policy of the Government—is summed up in the evidence of Constable Power, of Bantry, last winter:—

"The people were quiet. We dispersed them with our batons, and, after that, stones were thrown by the people."

This is a compendium of the Balfourian method of government; to force a riot, create crime, provide occupation for the police and employment for the coercion machinery. As bearing upon the character of the police, let me read a letter which was picked up in the streets of Cork, written by a police officer to a friend, who had sent him an invitation to dinner:—

Mr. Clancy

"2, York Street, Sunday Morning.

My Dear —, This beast O'Brien came into Cork last night, and, of course, there is no knowing what villainy he may be at to-day. I have to be over at Union Quay to watch lest anything should turn up. Will you, therefore, excuse my absence?

"Yours, &c.

"HENRY J. BOUCHIER."

This is the expression used by a representative of the right hon. Gentleman in a letter to a private friend, and the very man who wrote that letter and gave an indication of his inner spirit was the very man who was placed in charge of the escort which conveyed the Member for North-East Cork to gaol. Will the Chief Secretary disclaim connection with Henry J. Bouchier? It would be interesting to see what equivalent in the English language he would devise for the word "beast." I am afraid he has not even said one word in deprecation of the action of District Inspector Bouchier nor of any of the other villains whom he employs in Ireland. I do not care to dwell upon every incident in the campaign of the right hon. Gentleman; but I am tempted to refer to the case of Father Kennedy, to which public attention in England ought to be specially directed. In this case I hope we shall have no sneers from the right hon. Gentleman. The case, first of all, came before Judge Gibson, the Tory ex-Attorney General. The jury which tried the case was a special jury of the City of Dublin; composed of persons of all creeds and all politics. We are always told that we have a legal remedy when any outrage is perpetrated upon us. Well, Father Kennedy took the Chief Secretary at his word, and instituted an action for damages against the police. But the very first step taken by the Government was to lend the whole Crown Bar in Ireland for their defence. The Crown Solicitor defended them, the Solicitor General elect defended them, and three other Crown lawyers in Ireland took up the case. The very first thing done was to put Father Kennedy to the expense of resisting a motion to take the case before the Recorder of Cork. Father Kennedy on the 9th of February, after Mass, asked a few of his friends to meet him at his private house for the purpose of organising a collection in aid of the Tenants' Defence Association. He and his friends were followed by three policemen, who—and this is a significant fact—stopped on the road in order to get their rifles so as to be prepared for any amount of shooting. First, they endeavoured to enter Father Kennedy's private grounds, and I should like to know what right they had to insist on doing that. They had no more right to enter those grounds than they have to pick my pocket. On arriving at the house, Sergeant Hyde, who was in command of this body of police, addressed Father Kennedy in terms of wanton insult. He said that he had seen a number of ex-criminals and persons who had been in gaol for attending meetings of suppressed branches of the National League, including persons whom the Recorder of Cork had, at the very time he was confirming their sentences, actually expressed his regret at finding in such a position, and had declared that they were the most respectable in the whole County of Cork. This Sergeant Hyde, addressing Father Kennedy, said he had seen a number of ex-criminals entering his grounds, and he told him that his own house would not shelter him from the Criminal Law, but that he intended to follow him, and if necessary would go into his very bedroom. Imagine any policeman in England saying that to a clergyman of the Established Church! Imagine a policeman following a Non-conformist Minister into his private grounds and into his house, telling him he had seen a number of criminals with him, and saying that not even his own house would protect him from the Criminal Law, but that he would follow him into his very bedroom! I have not the least doubt that not a single policeman would dare to do such a thing, and that if any policeman attempted to do it in the presence of the congregation of any clergyman in England, that policeman would get very short shrift. But we live in Ireland and not in England, and this outrage was not resented or resisted, as I think it might justifiably have been by the expulsion of the policemen from the grounds. The sergeant went in and interrogated Father Kennedy as to the object of the meeting in his house. The idea of asking any respectable man—any clergyman—what he was about to do in his private house in inviting a certain number of his friends to meet him! Surely it is a most monstrous and intolerable idea, an idea which can only be conceived under a system in which despotism enters as an essential factor. Father Kennedy, with becoming dignity, refused to answer the question. He told the sergeant that he was in his own house, and that he had a right to do what he liked there. What happened then? Why, actually, this ruffianly policeman with his followers broke in the door and forced their way into the room in which Father Kennedy and his friends were assembled. The meeting was dispersed, of course. The three policemen with their rifles would no doubt have discharged them on the spot if it had not been dispersed. At all events, Father Kennedy thought it high time to tell them to go home. Now, an action was brought against the police as I have already stated. What was the defence? It was that they were the mildest-mannered men who ever broke a skull, and, according to them, their conversation with Father Kennedy was formed on the basis of the letters of Lord Chesterfield. But they could not deny certain facts. They could not deny that they entered the private grounds and the private house of this gentleman. They could not deny that they entered them against his will. They could not deny that they entered them on the mere suspicion that Father Kennedy was going to hold an illegal meeting. They could not deny that they shadowed him after he left Mass. They could not deny that he went to make a sick call; that when he entered the room of a dying woman they put their faces into the room while he was administering the last Sacraments of the Church, because, forsooth, they thought a meeting of a suppressed branch of the National League was being held. And notwithstanding the defence and explanations of the police— notwithstanding that Mr. Carson, the Crown prosecutor, urged the supporters of the Government on the jury not to score a mark against the Government by bringing in a verdict against the police—this mixed jury, composed of Catholics and Protestants, Tories, Unionists, and Nationalists, all men in the higher walks of life—condemned this act as one of illegality, and brought in a verdict with £100 damages against the police. Here is a case from which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary cannot escape. I want to know, is he going to pay the expenses and the damages? We will not let him escape from the case. Here is an instance in which by the law of the land it has been declared that the police have been guilty of a scandalous act of illegality. We want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will stand by that act, and we are going to ask him to-night—I hope if anyone speaks from the Front Opposition Bench he will ask the question—is he going to pay the damages and costs awarded against the police in this case of Father Kennedy? Who, I should like to know, is paying the costs which have been incurred, and which will be incurred, in carrying the case into another Court? Is not the Government money being used for this purpose? It is ridiculous to suppose that the costs are being paid by the policemen, whose paltry savings for the last 20 or 30 years could not possibly cover the expenses of instructing three or four of the leading counsel of the Irish Bar, as has been done in this case. The Government money must have been advanced, and it must have been advanced before the jury declared that this was an act of violence and of illegality. I invite the Committee to say that the Government must not pay these damages and costs; and I assert that the House, by declaring that they shall not, will be condemning a system of violence and illegality which it is desirable should be put an end to. There is only one thing to be said, in my opinion, in defence of all this. If it is necessary that you should have your shadowings, your batonings, your firings, and your illegalities, then the only explanation is that you are carrying on a detestable tyranny which makes it requisite that you should resort to these detestable means. I can only add that the necessity for these things is not proved, and that a hundred elections like the Barrow election, if they were allowed to take place, would soon prove the declaration of our views to be correct.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That Item C, of £874,725, for Pay of Constabulary, be reduced by £200,000.”
 —(Mr. Clancy.)

* (10.45.) Mr. H. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I must confess that it is with considerable reluctance, in view of my short experience of the manners of this

Mr. Clancy

House, that I rise to address the Committee. But representing as I do the County of Tipperary, a county which has always been to the forefront of the fight in Ireland, and which is one of the counties primarily affected by the present system of police administration in Ireland, I feel that I should be failing in my duty to my constituents, who have done me the honour to elect me—almost unknown—to represent them, if I did not stand up to-night and give voice to their feelings in this matter, to enter a protest against the present régime in Ireland, and to give the lie in most emphatic terms, once and for all, to the absurd story sometimes circulated by supporters of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, that in Ireland there exists any section of the population outside the immediate neighbourhood of Belfast who regard the policy and the administration of affairs in Ireland with anything other than extreme aversion. I do not propose to enter into matters of detail at any great length; it will be sufficient to state the grounds on which I support the reduction of this Vote. They are that I regard the present administration in Ireland as absolutely, radically, and fundamentally bad from beginning to end—from the right hon. Gentleman the head of the Irish Department down to the lowest and humblest constable in his employment. Its results are bad—and I do not believe there is any hon. Member on either side of the House disposed to deny it—though it may be urged that, under the circumstances, they may be palliated. The best they can say is that it is a choice of evils. That his methods are bad, and in many cases nothing short of scandalous instances have been quoted in the course of this Debate, to show they may be multiplied almost indefinitely. But they are quite sufficient to show the spirit in which the policy of the right hon. Gentleman is conceived and carried out. It is so tyrannical and so reactionary as to be entirely repugnant to the whole spirit of the British Constitution, of which in Ireland we are supposed to enjoy the benefit, a spirit not only repugnant to the British Constitution, but as we know from our experience, obnoxious to the great bulk of the electors of this country. It is a policy against which we protest and intend to protest; against which it is our duty to live in a state of continual protest. But we are not now discussing so much the policy of the right hon. Gentleman as the methods by which that policy is carried out. When we come to consider the methods by which that policy is carried out, we are sometimes amazed at the clumsiness and lack of ingenuity displayed; but we presume that when an attempt is made to carry out a tyrannous system under constitutional forms of Government, it is necessary that these forms should be openly and indecently violated in many cases in order to carry out the policy. The methods which we find employed are peculiar. We find that those discretionary powers—those initiatory powers which are usually and rightly entrusted to the head of any great Executive Department—are decentralised and delegated to every incompetent and uneducated underling in the service of the right hon. Gentleman. We find that the right hon. Gentleman gives carte blanche and a free hand to every one of his servants—to the Removable Magistrates and to the police in Ireland—with the result that he himself is left in the becoming and dignified position of having to follow the lead given him by the caprice of every Removable Magistrate in Ireland, or by the truculence of every police officer. He has to follow the lead of these people; he has to adopt their actions and endorse them, and by his conduct in this House to endeavour, as far as possible, to render it impossible for us to bring home the responsibility to the proper persons for these acts. The principle upon which his underling acts in Ireland is simply this: that no supporter of the Government can do any wrong; that no opponent of the Government can do any right. In carrying out this principle we find at every turn the law strained and the administration of justice tampered with and prostituted as has been abundantly clear from the speeches of hon. Members, in order to inflict the maximum hardship and annoyance on the political opponents of the right hon. Gentleman and to shield his officers and subordinates from the just consequences and just punishment to which in many cases their acts render them liable. I confess I regret it; but the one point on which Irishmen can be taunted to-day is that there is a force numbering between 12,000 and 13,000 Irishmen to be found to do the duties which the Irish Police are called upon to discharge. I repeat that I regret it, and it is not one of the least among our complaints; these men are Irishmen, and for that reason I was glad when last night the hon. Member for Leeds said he had not the least wish to say anything against the Royal Irish Constabulary as a body. We do our best to believe in them. It is not, however, the men who are bad, so much as the system which has made them what they are. Enlisted under promises of profuse pay, promotion, and pension, every influence is brought to bear, after they are attached to the Service, to estrange them from any sympathy with those from whom they are sprung and whom they ought to support. They are allowed to drink as much and as often as they like, and are taught to believe that perjury is a part of their profession. Brutality in the execution of their duty may be discouraged in public for the sake of decency; but in private it is a matter of congratulation, and experience shows that in many cases it is at least a sure step to promotion. They are taught that drunkenness even when on duty in the streets with deadly weapons in their hands, dealing with defenceless crowds, is simply a venial act of self-indulgence which will be overlooked so long as they are not so far overcome by liquor as to be incapable of standing up or of speaking civilly to their officers. Hon. Members may laugh, but I am not talking at random, I am talking of matters which have come under my own personal knowledge. I have seen—I have myself heard deliberate perjury on the part of the police, which I was perfectly prepared to prove to the satisfaction of reasonably-minded men. I have seen the police under the influence of drink on many occasions. I have seen them with deadly weapons in their hands in the streets of Tipperary so drunk that they could not stand up straight, and I have seen them on many occasions acting with brutality to crowds of unarmed men, women, and children. And now with reference to shadowing. The statement that shadowing is only put into practice against those who are guilty of, or known to be connected with, crime is on a level, as regards accuracy, with many which have emanated from the same quarter. I myself, when in Donegal a year ago, when the right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to arrest me, was shadowed the whole time I was on my trial, but then I might have been suspected of being connected with crime; but even after I had been acquitted, after the Removable Magistrate had said there was no evidence to suggest that I was connected with crime of any kind, I did not find that, as I was walking about the streets of Falcarragh, I was released from the torture; I still found, when talking to my friends on the road, that I had always a third or even a fourth person intervening. There was not only a detective in plain clothes, as well as a constable in uniform, behind me. As for my criminality, we have heard the charges made against the hon. Member for East Mayo by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh. Let me remind the hon. Member that there are different kinds of crime as well as of gallantry. There is crime arising from sordid motives and crime arising from noble motives. There is gallantry which means facing danger when there is danger to be faced. But there is a different kind of gallantry, which consists of esconcing oneself in a safe position and giving vent to torrents of braggadocio. I can only say that I prefer being a criminal with the hon. Member for East Mayo to being a gallant Member with the hon. Member for North Armagh. That part of the methods of the right hon. Gentleman which forms the crowning piece and necessary consummation of the whole process, can be more or less summed up by saying—"let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." In the carrying out of that precept, the House and the country has been accustomed, for the past four years or so, to an organised attempt to suppress the truth and to misrepresent the actual state of affairs in Ireland. Day by day the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has come down to this House and given versions of events which have occurred in Ireland, which, to those who know, are wholly irreconcilable with the true facts of the case. The right hon. Gentleman has said, in my hearing in this House, that he only wished hon. Members to go over to Ireland to see the facts for themselves. I wish they would. We would welcome them with open arms, and we should welcome still more the right hon. Gentleman himself if he would only follow his own advice, and on coming to Ireland, instead of lurking in the purlieus of Dublin Castle, come down to the country and see affairs for himself, instead of confining himself to the Reports of officials, Irremovable Magistrates, and police officers. We know in Ireland, from experience and some acquaintance with Irish affairs what these official reports are worth. We know they are tainted with the source from which they spring; we know they are contaminated by the channels through which they eventually reach this House, and we know they are still further darkened and clouded by the dialectical gifts of the right hon. Gentleman who floods the House with them. I am certain that the country will forgive us if we absolutely and entirely refuse once for all to accept these official statements as in any way representing the true facts of the case. It is necessary, perhaps, to have methods of this kind in order that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman shall be carried out. But it really is carrying the matter a little too far when a Minister in his responsible position, with his responsibility to the Crown, his responsibility to this House, and, still more, his responsibility to Ireland, to those whose welfare is trusted to his care, should come down to this House and make himself the mere tool and mere mouthpiece for conveying to this House the ex parte statements of incriminated persons in Ireland. We have been told by some of those people who are so peculiarly, not to say abnormally, constituted as to combine a rational habit of mind with an enthusiastic support of the right hon. Gentleman's policy, that it is necessary where you delegate authority and certain powers to subordinates, to repose confidence in the same quarter, or that a mutual lack of confidence will spring up between leaders and subordinates, and that in consequence the whole Public Service would be disorganised. That principle, it is quite true, is a good one in the main, but that it should be carried out to the extent to which it is carried out in Ireland; and that it should be considered by the right hon. Gentleman that his subordinates can do no wrong, and that without inquiry of any kind, without taking any trouble to find out the facts of the case he should back the subordinates up through thick and thin, whatever they do and whatever they say, is a doctrine which, with all deference to this House, is absolutely subversive of the efficiency of the Public Service in every way, and is bound to lead to most deplorable results of all kinds. So much for the methods of the Irish government in Ireland. As to its results I have not much to say. The results are, of course, deplorable; and to those who see them everyday, who see the suffering inflicted on the helpless in Ireland by the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, it is well nigh maddening; but it is not of that I wish to complain. The Irish people have not gone through five centuries of oppression to be beaten down now. We do not complain so much of the harshness of the law; but what we do complain of is the way in which the law is administered in Ireland, so that when the people of Ireland have adopted, as they have adopted with the most conspicuous success, methods of constitutional and legal agitation for the ventilation of their grievances, the administration of justice should be so polluted and prostituted as to undermine the whole of their confidence in the possibility of having a pure administration of justice, and in the efficacy of constitutional agitation, thus creating a distrust so great that I venture to say that it may take years of firm and good government in our Home Rule Parliament, when we get it, to establish amongst them that respect for, and that confidence and trust in, the law which are necessary in every well-governed country.

(11:10.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Courtney, I am very unwilling to give to the few remarks which I shall make at this stage of our proceedings anything of an unduly controversial tone. I have already spoken at some length on this Vote, and the observations I have now to make in answer to what has been said during the later portion of the Debate shall be put into as brief compass as possible. If I were disposed to criticise with severity any of the speakers who have preceded me in this Debate, certainly it would not be the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I listened with great interest to his first speech in this House in advocacy of a cause of which he has shown himself eminently qualified to become an ornament, and to which he is so recent a convert. If he spoke with some of the intemperance of youth, at all events he spoke with great ardour in support of convictions which I am sure he holds with all sincerity. But I would say, before he complains of the character of the information which I have to give to the House every day at question time, that he should reflect that the Secretary for Ireland, as I have had occasion to point out to the House before, necessarily has to rely in his official answers upon the information which he has received. I understand that hon. Gentlemen do not like the information which they receive. ["No!"] There is a very simple method by which they can avoid receiving it. May I suggest, with all humility and respect, that if they cease to ask questions, they never will have their tempers ruffled by receiving information? Though it is the best I have to give them, it is not apparently sufficient to satisfy their desire for general instruction. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for East Mayo, who has made the most important speech which I think has been delivered so far in this Debate, accuses me, amongst other things, of not having dealt with the various questions raised, apart from the question of shadowing, on this Vote. Well, Sir, it is quite true that in the speech delivered yesterday, I confined myself principally to that single topic, and for this, among other reasons, that we were given to understand that it was the chief topic with hon. Gentlemen opposite, and also for the reason that the other questions which have been raised are those which have become familiar, I would almost say wearisome, to the House by constant iteration year after year, not under this Government alone, but under the Government preceding it. The criticism is identical with the criticism of former years. The answers I have given are identical with the answers given in former years, and I do not know that it is necessary at any great length to occupy the attention of the Committee with such general questions as the cost of the police, the numbers of the police, the numbering of the police, or the vague, the general accusation of police brutality, supported by official hard-heartedness, which I have heard brought forward by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and so often replied to by occupants of the post which I now have the honour, and possibly the misfortune, to fill. But, Sir, I will deal with very great brevity with one or two specific cases brought forward. The hon. Member for North Cavan, who spoke last, alluded particularly to two cases—the case of the boy Heffernan and the case of Father Kennedy. The case of Heffernan is simply this: There had been an attack by the roughs of Tipperary upon the houses of those tenants of the Member for North Hunts who had bought in their interest in 1889. A series of serious riots occurred at the time. On the occasion of one of these riots two separate mobs attacked a small body of police severely, and, after a lengthened provocation, one constable was ordered by the sergeant—I think it was the sergeant in charge of the Police Force—to fire, which he did, having a charge of buckshot in his rifle.

MR. CLANCY: It was the youngest member of the Force—an inexperienced constable.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He fired one charge, and I believe some of the buckshot struck the foot of Heffernan. Tetanus set in, and the boy died. As far as I can judge of the case, I do not put the chief blame on the police. The case went before the Coroner's Jury, and, after the Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of "wilful murder," the Superior Courts released the accused on bail. They were brought up in the ordinary course before the Magistrates, who refused the information, and the case did not proceed further. As far as I am able to judge of the case, the Magistrates decided absolutely in accordance with the evidence before them.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to state—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled to interpose unless the right hon. Gentleman gives way.

MR. CLANCY: Then, Sir, I ask leave to state that the legal representatives of the right hon. Gentleman took quite a very opposite view to that which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. I fail to see how the Government or the police were to blame in this matter, in which the ordinary procedure was adopted. As to the case of Father Kennedy, that rev. gentleman had been twice condemned by the Court for holding illegal assemblies. He had been the author and the chief promoter of the Plan of Campaign on the Leader estate, and he was directly responsible for all the sufferings that had resulted from it, and therefore, if the police suspected him of desiring to hold an illegal assembly, they certainly committed no serious outrage upon the character of the rev. gentleman. But this is not a matter on which it is competent to me to discuss the evidence at the trial, because, as the hon. Member must know, a new trial of the case has been ordered.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Crown, in order to humbug this House, has ordered a new trial to take place.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A new trial has been applied for, and as the case is pending, it is not proper that this House should discuss it.

MR. CLANCY: That is why it was done.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The next case raised is the case of District Inspector Considine. That case was raised by the hon. Member for Leeds and the hon. Member for North-East Cork. I have been told that I made many statements in regard to the character of the town and the nature of the assaults, which have been exploded by subsequent investigation. I made them on the best information I could obtain from the Nationalist Press of the day. It distinctly stated that a large, riotous, and excited mob were assembled at the station. Apparently, according to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, it was all lies, though it was a statement made by the reporters of the Nationalist Press, that a large and excited mob assembled at the station, and that they invited the hon. Member for North-East Cork to leave his carriage and to defy the police. I am told—I do not know whether it is true—that it is stated in the Irish Press that a third trial is to be called for, and, although this was denied last night, I have no ground for believing that the statement which appears in the Nationalist Press is otherwise than accurate. At all events, until we know more about that, it would be absurd for me to give any judgment upon the matter which was submitted to me, namely, what course the Government are going to pursue with regard to the costs the police are subjected to in the trial. These are the chief points, apart from the matter brought forward by the hon. Member for East Mayo in reference to shadowing, on which previous speeches render it necessary for me to trouble the Committee.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): What about the cases in which perjury was proved against the police when employed as note-takers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I recollect one case brought up last year, but I am not aware that any new case of the kind has been mentioned.

MR. W. REDMOND: Because you walked out of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry I should have been absent a short time, and it is a most unfortunate coincidence that the few minutes I was away were those in which the House was favoured with the observations of the hon. Member. I come now to the interesting and important speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo. One of the most important parts related to the case of Grant, which was before the Committee last night. I have attempted to investigate the case since last night, and the further knowledge I have been able to obtain entirely bears out the argument I advanced previously. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian asked me three questions which were on a paper he handed to me across the Table. Those questions were—first, whether the watching policeman was in plain clothes or in uniform; secondly, at what distance did the policeman stand from the person watched; and, thirdly, whether the policeman's presence was made known to the person watched. From the information I have received the answers to those questions are these: It is certain that the watching policeman was in uniform, and that he was distant from Grant about 10 yards when he was at work, and three or four yards at other times, and that the fact that Grant was watched was purposely made known to him, and that the shadowing was relaxed in the latter part of 1883 by order of the Inspector General. Thus in all three points the case was precisely on all fours with the recent cases. I am accused of relying upon police evidence alone. It is clear that, as Chief Secretary, when asked for details I must rely upon official sources; but when I was dealing with this question yesterday I was relying not upon official sources but upon Nationalist sources. I quoted Nationalist papers and Nationalist resolutions, or facts brought out on trials in Courts of Law. The accusation that my version was coloured by official prejudice is absolutely without foundation. Any man who has taken the trouble to make himself acquainted with what has been written in Nationalist papers, both for and against the system of shadowing and boycotting at fairs, must know that the account I gave of those transactions were not in the least degree exaggerated, but that it accurately represented the views of Nationalists themselves as to transactions for which they are wholly responsible. The hon. Member for East Mayo admitted that he was in a broad sense responsible.

MR. DILLON: I said I might be indirectly responsible for the adoption of boycotting, but that I could not be held to be responsible for all the acts of those men who were engaged in it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I agree; the hon. Gentleman is not responsible for the actions of all these men; he is responsible for the acts of those men which are undertaken in direct and perfect accord with the policy which he recommends. I do not bring forward the action of a single vigilance man which was not intended to carry out precisely the policy for which the hon. Gentleman owned himself to be responsible. What I called attention to was the following by these vigilance men of the farmers and occupants of evicted farms who attempted to bring to market the stock they raised on those farms. I showed that they were shadowed, interfered with in the execution of their lawful calling, ruined so far as it was possible thus to ruin them; and I asked the Committee whether it was not ten times more guilty and productive of ten times more misery and suffering than any shadowing for which the Government are responsible. I say I did not bring before the House cases of exceptional action on the part of these vigilance men. I brought before the House simply their action in accordance with the general policy for which the right hon. Gentleman is responsible. And I say that being, as he admits he is, responsible for that general policy, he cannot cast from himself the further responsibility with which I have endeavoured to saddle him. He says that these vigilance men, for whom he is, broadly speaking, responsible, were guilty of no violence. They were not guilty of violence, as far as I know; and, if they were, I acquit the hon. Member of having recommended the violence. I do not think he wishes that his policy should be supported by violence. But I say that boycotting is productive of more suffering than much violence, when a man, whose whole livelihood and that of his wife and children depends upon his selling the stock raised upon his farm, is prevented from selling that stock by the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Home Rule cries of, "Another man's farm."] The farm which he legally occupies. That man has more to complain of than if he were the victim of a dozen common assaults, and the hon. Gentleman knows it. If not he, some of his Colleagues have openly boasted in Ireland that the suffering inflicted by boycotting is more than the suffering inflicted by shooting, and therefore it is a thousandfold more severe than the kind of violence which the hon. Gentlemen does not recommend. The hon. Member attempted to demolish the case I made yesterday with regard to boycotting at fairs by telling us that the policy which he recommends in Ireland in no sense differs from the policy which the Trade Unions have legally and with impunity adopted in England. I traverse that statement absolutely. Pickets in England—at the dock strike, for example—are not allowed to intimidate those that are coming into work, and if they do they break the law. If they inflict any suffering, if they threaten or coerce men who desire to obtain occupation, they are subject to legal penalties. Now, I want to know what parallel there is between the procedure of these pickets who cannot threaten, who cannot coerce, and who cannot use violence, and the procedure of the shadowers at fairs who ruin their victims, and whose object is to ruin their victims? I say there is no parallel. The version of the English law which the hon. Gentleman has given is erroneous as regards Trade Unions, and absolutely erroneous as regards shadowers at fairs. We have had in England a legal case absolutely on all fours with these cases in Ireland. We have had a case of shadowing at fairs and of boycotting at fairs. [An hon. MEMBER: Where?] At Salford. It was tried before an English Judge and an English jury. There was no hesitation as to the law laid down by the Judge; there was no hesitation as to the verdict given by the jury; and the Judge and the jury alike agreed that the law—not the coercion law, but the common law of England and Ireland—was distinctly violated by these shadowers at fairs. Therefore, it is not open to the hon. Gentleman to pretend that in denouncing his subordinates as criminals in this matter we are in any way relying upon exceptional Irish legislation, or that we are not simply vindicating the law common to both countries. The hon. Gentleman told us that though we shadowed boycotters at fairs we did not shadow moonlighters. He is mistaken. We do shadow moonlighters, wherever there is any adequate suspicion or substantial ground for believing that men are likely to engage in that criminal practice.

MR. DILLON: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman; but will he just explain to the House why did not the police shadow those moonlighters in the Whelehan case, where it was known a fortnight beforehand who the men were, and what would be the place of attack?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman will see that the method adopted by the police for dealing with crime must necessarily depend upon the nature of the crime and the circumstances under which it is committed. Shadowing is, in England and Ireland, often the best way to prevent crime, but it is not always. It must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of the case what course those responsible for law and order will adopt. I have been told that this Government have specially invented for their own behoof this particular method of closely following those suspected of boycotting—that they have put the system of shadowing in force in a manner which was never practised by any previous Government, or by any other Government of the civilised world. In one sense I am not prepared, and I am not concerned, to deny that statement. Show me any civilised country in the world which has to deal with this question of boycotting.

An hon. MEMBER: They have all to deal with crime.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is crime. It has been declared to be crime by the Courts of England, as well as the Courts of Ireland. Show me the Government that has to deal with this particular form of crime, and when you have shown me such a country, and that it has adopted different and less severe methods for meeting it, then I admit that I stand upon my defence, and have to prove that we do not adopt an unduly severe method. But if the crime is this—a man goes to a fair and speaks to the auctioneer when the cattle of a boycotted farm are to be sold, and if he practically makes it impossible, by this and similar methods, that the cattle should be sold, then the shadowing must be a close shadowing to prevent such conversation, and it is not sufficient to follow the man at a distance of 20 or 30 yards. The character of the shadowing must depend upon the character of the crime; it is adopted to prevent crime; and I apprehend that every other Government which had to deal with a similar kind of crime would find itself driven to adopt similar methods of dealing with it. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) stated that the police were becoming demoralised. All the information which I have been able to obtain on that point directly contradicts the assertion of the hon. Member. I believe that the discipline of the Irish Constabulary was never better than it is now. I go further. I believe that for many years past, over the greater part of Ireland, the Irish Constabulary have never been in better relations with the people. I do not, of course, allude to those dark spots in Ireland where the hon. Member and his friends are specially carrying out their policy. There I admit that the police and the people are brought into constant conflict, and that the relations between the two are strained. But speaking of Ireland as a whole, I do not think that the relations between the police and the people have been better, and I am certain that there has not been a period in which the discipline of that admirable Force has been maintained at a higher level. I always regret to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite attack the Irish Constabulary, for every Irishman ought to be proud of that Force. It is composed entirely of Irishmen and principally of Roman Catholics, and every Irishman who values the credit of his country ought to make a point of doing full justice to a Force which under the greatest difficulties, and sometimes under the greatest temptations, has with great temper, tact, discretion, and courage carried out the duties entrusted to it.

(11.43.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I will not stand for many moments between the Committee and a Division. If I thought that what the right hon. Gentleman has last said were true, namely, that the relations between the Constabulary and the people were never better than they are to day, I confess that one very strong argument against the policy of the right hon. Gentleman would lose its force. But what I want to know is, who it is that tells him this? He began his speech by making a remarkable admission, although we knew it before, that he can only know of what goes on in Ireland from what is told him through official sources.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said was that my answers to questions about particular matters are, of course, drawn from official sources, and they would be worthless if they were not so drawn.

MR. J. MORLEY: But the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that he has no means of gathering what are the relations between the Constabulary and the people beyond the monthly Reports from officials, and perhaps the word of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh. I am glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman has done me justice in regard to one point. I have never during the last four years said one word in disparagement of the Royal Irish Constabulary. Therefore, I, at all events, am not open to the charge that he has thought fit to bring against this side of the House. I recognise as much as he does the enormous difficulties under which the Royal Irish Constabulary do their work, and it has, indeed, fallen to me to defend them from attacks made on them by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the right hon. Gentleman's own side of the House which were far more severe than any which have been made by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. If the Force is as good as it is, this is not due to the right hon. Gentleman. If that splendid Force could be demoralised it would be demoralised by the course which the right hon. Gentleman uniformly takes in two particulars. The first is that in this House he insists upon backing them up through thick and thin, whether they are right or wrong. During the three and a half years of the right hon. Gentleman's administration there has not been a single instance in which he has admitted the shadow of a fault on the part of any member of the Force. That may be a necessity—I think it is a necessity—of the policy with which he is so unfortunately identified. The knowledge in the minds of District Inspectors, Inspectors, and the men of the Force, that no matter what they do they will be defended through thick and thin in this House against the Irish Representatives, must have a very demoralising effect. But there is another practice of the right hon. Gentleman which is equally demoralising, namely, the practice of uniformly refusing to grant any inquiry into alleged misconduct on the part of the Constabulary. This is a most fatal course to pursue in the interests of the Royal Irish Constabulary themselves. I am not going again to refer to the Belfast case. I regard my action in reference to that with satisfaction. The moment I found that charges were made against the Constabulary, I requested the attendance of the Inspector General, and I said, "Here are certain charges made against the Constabulary, we believe that these charges are unfounded, but in order to satisfy the public and ourselves, in order to satisfy the House of Commons, let us have an inquiry; from such inquiry we have nothing to fear." That was the course that the right hon. Gentleman ought to have followed. He said some weeks ago that there are no precedents for such an inquiry. Well, I remember one which occurred some time before I entered the House, and the right hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, be able to identify it if he refers to the files in his Office. A certain traveller was seriously wounded by a constable in a street riot in one of the suburbs of Cork in February, 1881. It was a time of great excitement, the hon. Member for Cork having just been arrested, yet the

Mr. J. Morley

Chief Secretary of that day, Mr. Forster, granted an inquiry, and a sum, I think, of £300 was awarded to the injured man. If the right hon. Gentleman had then been in office he, no doubt, would have refused it. Now, with regard to the Salford case, the right hon. Gentleman has been inaccurately informed. The two men were indicted for conspiracy at common law, and also for the offence of picketing under the Conspiracy Act of 1875. The jury returned a general verdict. If the men had been found guilty at common law, as the right hon. Gentleman said just now, they could not have been sentenced to hard labour. But they did receive hard labour, and therefore they must have been convicted under the Statute. The right hon. Gentleman must now admit that he inadvertently misled the House on this matter. Sir, upon shadowing so much has been said that I am not going to add more than a word or two. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the Chief Secretary has given us the three required particulars in the case of Grant. It appears that the constable who followed him was in uniform, but followed him at a distance of ten yards—not as Father Humphreys was followed, with one constable at his shoulder and another at his heels. That makes all the difference. The case of Grant was a case in which the man was suspected of murder, and I, for one, admit at once the absurdity of supposing that in a country so disturbed as Ireland has been, and so rife with those dangerous elements which form themselves in bad times into secret societies, it is not the duty of the Executive Government to keep their eye on people who are believed to be bad characters. We do not deny that. What we do deny is that you have a right, that you have even a legal right, to inflict what is, in effect, a punishment on a man like Father Humphreys, on a man who has never been brought to trial, and whom you never intended to bring to trial, simply on the ground of criminal suspicion. That is a course which cannot possibly be defended, and those who are better skilled in the law than I am hold that such action on the part of the Government is a distinct breach of the law, and if it took place in any other country but Ireland, if there were in Ireland an administration in which the people could have the slightest confidence, I have no doubt it would be tested in law. What the right hon. Gentleman said upon the illegality of molestation by boycotters was entirely beside the point. It was an evasion of the true issue, and every argument he brought forward as to the illegality of molestation by boycotters was an argument against the legality of his own action. Well, Sir, it is very important that we should divide to-night on this part of the subject. We shall have an opportunity on other parts of the proceedings of going further into the subject, and I will only add that what the right hon. Gentleman began his speech with to-night is the strongest argument that can be adduced for the necessity of a change in the form of Government in Ireland. He began by asking hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway why, if they objected to official information, they took the trouble to ask him questions. He says the only answers he can give are official answers. Is not that the foundation of our case? Is not that system which the right hon. Gentleman says, and truly says, is inseparable from his position, a reduction of representative Government to a down-right farce? The right hon. Gentleman will hear much more of that frank admission with which he was good enough to begin his speech to-night. The right hon. Gentleman has commented on the speech to which we all listened with great interest from the hon. Member who has just been returned to this House—I mean the Member for Mid Tipperary. I wonder when the right hon. Gentleman talked about the relations between the Constabulary and the people being better than they ever were, and about the success of his administration in Ireland—I wonder he does not reflect when he sees one prisoner of his after another marching by—to-day from Tipperary, yesterday from Galway, to-morrow from somewhere else, and taking the oath at this Table. That is my test. That is the test of the right hon. Gentleman's administration that I regard. When he gets one single Member returned on his side from a National district in Ireland, then I will admit he may have made some mark on public opinion—then I will admit there may be some promise of the success of his administration; but he has not adduced one single argument, either in his violent speech last night or in his more temperate speech to-night, which shakes the conviction with which we began the Debate.

(11.55.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 219; Noes 291.—(Div. List, No. 177.)

(12.15.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move that the Original Question be now put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Original Question be now put."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

House cleared for a Division.

MR. T. M. HEALY (speaking seated, and with his hat on): Mr. Courtney, I desire to ask you, as a point of order, whether you had put any Question from the Chair with regard to which the right hon. Gentleman has moved the Closure?

THE CHAIRMAN (speaking seated): The Question had been already put from the Chair.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Question put from the Chair was the omission of Sub-head C, which was negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question had been put from the Chair.

Original Question put accordingly,

(12.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 290; Noes 202.—(Div. List, No. 179.)

It being after midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee to sit again to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Resolution be reported on Thursday."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask, in view of the sensational proceedings in Committee to-night, whether it is intended to take the Chief Secretary's Vote first on Thursday, and whether, with regard to the proposal now made for the first time, and which has not received even the approval of the Public Accounts Committee, of taking the Votes for the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant as one Vote, these two Votes will be included in one common closure, or whether we shall have the privilege we have hitherto enjoyed of a closure for each Vote? This is the first time, as I understand, that these Votes have been grouped as one. I do not know how the Chair intends to treat them; but for the sake of information I shall be glad to know what is intended, and also, in view of the number of Members who have been shut out from discussion by to-night's closure, whether the Report of this Vote will be taken first on Thursday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I think the first business on Thursday will be the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary Vote. I may point out that it is very difficult to distinguish between a Debate on the Police Vote and a Debate on the Chief Secretary's Vote, owing to the manner in which the Votes are treated by hon. Gentlemen opposite; therefore, I think that any speech which any hon. Member has been unfortunately prevented from delivering to-night will be quite in order on the Chief Secretary's Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There were two questions I asked, and perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury can give me an answer as to whether the Votes for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary will be taken separately, or will one common closure swallow the two?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am afraid I am not an authority upon the closure; but the salaries for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary will be taken as one Vote as they appear on the Estimates.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that I shall resist the two Votes being taken together.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Thursday.

Mr. T. M. Healy

TRUSTEES APPOINTMENT BILL

[LORDS]—(No. 364.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

PARTNERSHIP BILL [LORDS].

FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND.)

Order for appointment of Committee read, and objection taken.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): In reference to the proposed names for this Committee, may I ask is it not desirable that Scotch, Irish, and Welsh Conservative Members should be represented on a Committee of this character?

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I would observe also that the nominations do not include one Welsh Member.

*MR. JACKSON: I can only say that the names are selected according to a method with which hon. Members are familiar, and I am only responsible for a part of them.

Motion deferred to Thursday.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

On the Motion for adjournment:—

MR. F. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): May I ask the Home Secretary whether he can give the House any information as to the conduct of the Metropolitan Police?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am happy to inform my hon. Friend that the news I have received this evening from all parts of London is excellent. Not a single man has failed to go out on his duty to night, and the temper and spirit exhibited throughout the Metropolitan Police are admirable.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Has there been any collusion, any pre-arrangement with reference to this question?

House adjourned at five minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 9th July, 1890.

A House was not made until 12.30, after Mr. Caldwell (Glasgow, St. Rolox) had moved a Count.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS (AMENDMENT) (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 356.)

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): This is a Bill which contains clauses of a complicated and technical, but not of a contentious character, but as it was not opposed upon the Second Reading, and passed through Committee without Amendment, I hope that I may be allowed to take the Third Reading now.

Question, "That the Bill be now read the third time," put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—(No. 362.)

As amended, considered.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to move, after Clause 14, to insert the following clause:—

"There shall be repealed so much of Sub-section one of Section fifty-five of the principal Act as limits to a period of three months the time within which a Trustee may disclaim onerous property; but nothing under this section shall affect the provisions of Sub-section four of that section."

The object of the Amendment is to restore the law to the position in which it stood in 1869, by reducing the very great costs which are incurred in consequence of the numerous disclaimers which are almost inevitably made under the existing law.

A Clause (Disclaimer)—(Sir Albert Rollit,)—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

*(12.37.) MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I have now to move the clause which stands on the Paper in my name, namely,

"Section forty-two of the principal Act, relating to power of landlord to distrain for rent, shall be read and construed as if the words 'six months' rent' were substituted for the words 'one year's rent.'"

The law of distress was quite lately greatly modified, and whereas a landlord was able, some years ago, to distrain for two years' rent, he is now limited to one year. It is said that, in some measure, this is an attack upon the rights of the landlord. I am not concerned to answer that allegation, for I only ask the House to deal with the rights of landlords in the event of bankruptcy. It does seem to me that a landlord, at the present moment, enjoys very unfair rights as compared with those enjoyed by other creditors. I would ask the House to remember what the position of the landlord is, as distinguished from that of an ordinary creditor. What does the landlord part with and risk? He risks, in the shape of rent, simply the interest of his money. An ordinary creditor risks a portion of his capital, and under circumstances which are to the great advantage of the landlord, because if the landlord allows his tenant to get into arrear he can always pay himself his interest out of the capital of the unhappy creditor. In this clause I propose to provide that the landlord shall only have such rights as are reasonable. If he chooses to allow his rent to get into arrear for 12 months that is his business. There is not the smallest reason why he should allow his rent to get into arrear at all; on the contrary, he could adopt the system prevalent abroad by which rents are paid in advance. By this clause I provide that the landlord may get six months' rent, and if there is any balance of rent due to him then he will only come in for that with the other and by far the more important creditors. When this Bill was before the Standing Committee this Amendment was moved in a lengthy and, I am afraid, somewhat technical form by myself for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). No real attempt was then made to go into the merits of the question, and although acting for the hon. Member I thought it wiser to offer to abandon part of the clause in order to secure a moderate change in the law his proposal met with a very cool reception. Under these circumstances, and in order not to weary the House, I have placed a new clause on the Paper which will, I think, effectually carry out the real object of the longer clause drawn up by the hon. Member for Northampton. All I desire is that the unfair privileges which the landlord at present enjoys shall be restricted.

Clause (Amendment of s. 42 of the principal Act.)—(Mr. John Kelly)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

(12.41.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. Webster, Isle of Wight): I hope the House will not enter upon this question. I may remind my hon. and learned Friend that in Committee an attempt was made to extend the interest of the landlord by giving him his rent in full, even after proceedings in bankruptcy had been commenced. That proposal was resisted, and resisted successfully, and this is an attempt to cut down the right of the landlord to get his rent prior to bankruptcy. If we are to enter into the matter, it will undoubtedly raise other and very difficult questions as to what the rights of the landlord are, and will lead to a long discussion and Amendments, if not here, certainly in another place, and the result may be that other and more valuable provisions in the Bill will not be passed. It may be possible on some other occasion to deal with the question of what the landlords' rights are, and to see how far they ought to be altered; but I would respectfully submit that in regard to this particular question the cutting down of the right to recover rent from 12 to 6 months cannot be properly dealt with without taking counter proposals into consideration, and seeing whether in other respects the rights of the landlord ought not to be altered, and in some respects slightly improved. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade strongly resisted in Committee the proposition that the landlord should be put in a better position. He was successful, and I think it is not desirable that we should now place the landlord in a worse position.

Mr. J. Kelly

(12.45.) Mr. J. Chamberlain (Birmingham, W.): I am sorry that the Attorney General should oppose this Amendment, which appears to me to be an extremely reasonable one. The position is not exactly the same as it was when the Bill was before the Grand Committee. The Amendment is objected to on the ground of its complicated character, and the fact that it might raise a number of other questions which neither the Standing Committee nor the House have had time to consider. Now, the proposal is an extremely simple and intelligible one. It deals with the existing law, and it proposes to substitute six for 12 months. The Bankruptcy Bill of 1868 proposed to do away altogether with the preferential rights of the landlord, but in deference to the opinion then expressed, the present clause was inserted. The argument then was that the landlord was in a different position from all other creditors, because he was unable to refuse the credit which constituted his case. He could not turn out his tenant, and although he might become aware in the course of the term that the tenant was a bad tenant he was obliged to allow him to remain until, at all events, there was an arrear of rent. It is said that he ought always to proceed to collect. That is a valid argument, in regard to a certain amount of arrears; but the question is, what is the amount of arrears that should be taken into consideration in order to justify the landlord being placed in a different position from that of an ordinary creditor, and to entitle him to a preferential claim. I may remind the House that the law was altered in regard to the preferential claim of the landlord from two years to one, and the alterations which are now proposed certainly justify a further change from 12 to six months. I do not think that the acceptance of this Amendment would in any way prejudice the passing of the Bill in another place. If the House of Lords choose to throw out the clause, it will then be for this House to say whether they will insist upon it or not. I certainly think that the principle is a just and a sound one, and I do not think that the landlord ought to have any preferential claim which should extend beyond six months.

*(12.48.) SIR A. ROLLIT: I do not think anyone can doubt the last point of the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House, namely, that this question raises a matter of principle, and one that is well worthy of discussion. Under ordinary circumstances, I confess that my own leaning would be in that direction, but at the present moment we are only considering one part of a very wide and important question. When the matter came before the Standing Committee it formed part of a number of clauses which dealt effectually with the whole subject; but I think the present proposal is inferior to that which was submitted by the hon. Member for Northampton, who proposed to give to the landlord, not the right of distraint, but the substitution for it of a limited preferential payment. Now, I think that of the two modes the preferential payment is much the better. For the question is whether a man shall be allowed to be the judge in his own case, and it is perfectly well known that in the administration of the bankruptcy law some landlords may exercise their right of distraint in an arbitrary way by forcing an undesirable and hasty sale of the estate, and the like, and when the hon. Member for Northampton introduced his proposals I certainly thought that they were well worthy of consideration. But at the present moment there is only one part of those proposals left, and it is one which is likely to raise very debatable matter, not only here but elsewhere. It will certainly be seriously contested in the House of Lords, and, notwithstanding the view of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who has done so much to amend the bankruptcy law, I venture to hope that the proposal will not at the present moment be pressed. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Camberwell (Mr. J. Kelly) will be content with having raised the question again, and that, with the consent of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, he will now accept the decision of the Standing Committee.

(12.50.) MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I am altogether in favour of an Amendment in this direction, and I should be very glad to see a similar alteration made in the Irish Bankruptcy Law.

I believe that the rental rights of landlords are far too much considered in all matters of this kind. I do not think that a landlord ought to have a priority of claim over a general and ordinary creditor, and I entirely agree that instead of the right of distraint a preferential right would be more equitable. But, at the same time, I do not admit that a preferential right is a right that ought to be conceded to a landlord, because I think that his claim should be on all fours with that of all other creditors.

*(12.52.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): If there were any fear that the House of Lords would throw out this Bill in consequence of this clause I should feel inclined to take the same view as the Attorney General; but I am of opinion that the worst thing that could happen would be the rejection of the Amendment, and the House would have plenty of time when the Bill came back to consider whether they would insist upon it or not. The Amendment is certainly a good one, and I hope the House will adopt it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

*(12.55.) MR. J. KELLY: The next Amendment I have to move is the insertion of the following clause:—

"A deed of arrangement to which 'The Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887,' applies, and which has been, or is intended to be, duly registered under the Act, and has been, either before or after such registration, assented to by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors, as shown by the affidavit as to liabilities filed in accordance with section six, sub-section one, of the said Act, shall not be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy under the principal Act or this Act, and when registered under 'The Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887,' shall be binding on the minority in number and in value who have not signed or assented to the said deed.

Provided that, in estimating the majority in number, creditors for any amount less than ten pounds shall not be reckoned."

One of the great difficulties under the Bankruptcy Act in respect of deeds of arrangement has been to obtain the assent of all the creditors, owing to the rapacious and unscrupulous requirements of the smaller creditors. The power they have of extorting the payment in full of a debt by refusing to assent to an arrangement has been one of the greatest possible difficulties which commercial men in this country have had to deal with. I would ask the House seriously to consider the question. How is it possible that the large creditor can act in a manner prejudicial to the claims of the small creditor? The larger creditor wants to get as good a dividend as possible, and the more he gets the greater will be the dividend for the small creditor. All I ask is that the unscrupulous use which the small creditor has hitherto made of his power shall in future be confined within reasonable limits. The simple object of the clause is to protect the honest creditors against unscrupulous small creditors.

Clause (Deeds of arrangement binding on minorities.)—(Mr. John Kelly),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(12.57.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend is intended to deal with one of the most complicated matters that can be suggested, and the feeling of the Grand Committee was against any such attempt being made in the present Bill. It is a proposal whereby large creditors will be able to force an arrangement upon small creditors. According to a Return obtained at the instance of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) it appeared, if I remember right, that in 10 large County Court districts in the course of six months, out of 20,000 debts 14,000 were under £20 and 10,000 under £10. The hon. and learned Member proposes that a deed of arrangement, assented to by the larger creditors, shall be binding upon the small creditors. I am satisfied, in my own mind, that the clause now proposed would not work properly, and all who have had any experience of the working of the Bankruptcy Act will agree with me that in dealing with the question it will be necessary to protect the small creditor against the undue weight of larger creditors preventing the administration of the estate in bankruptcy.

*(12.59.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I am in favour of the clause with some modification of its details. The question is not so much whether a particular course is desired by large or small creditors, as whether the majority of the creditors consider that it is the most efficient way of winding up the estate. But as I understand the Attorney General to promise to consider the question in a separate Bill, I think my hon. and learned Friend would prejudice his case if he were to go to a Division. I would, therefore, suggest that he should content himself with having brought the matter before the House, and that he should accept the assurance of the Attorney General that the whole question will be dealt with subsequently.

(1.0.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I have had a great deal to do with creditors' meetings in various places; and, as I know the extreme interest that is taken in this subject, I will join with my hon. Friend in urging the withdrawal of this proposal—not because there is anything objectionable in the clause itself, but because it imports considerable controversial matter into a Bill which, whatever it was as originally introduced, has been very much improved in Committee. The commercial community would prefer that the question should be postponed until full justice can be done to it.

(1.2.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am very glad that this proposal is not likely to be pressed, and therefore it is unnecessary to discuss it at any length. At the same time, I do not like to let it pass out of the control of the House without expressing my opinion that the clause is bad in principle, and that the introduction of any such system into the bankruptcy proceedings of this country would be attended with all the abuses which the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 was passed to suppress. My hon. Friend behind me has said that the universal opinion of the commercial community is in favour of such a clause. I have no doubt that is right as far as the organisations which profess to represent the commercial body are concerned; but there is an immense body of men outside those organisations who do not share that opinion. The effect of the clause would be enormously to multiply deeds of arrangement and to limit the administration of insolvent estates under such official control and investigation, as I believe to be an absolute necessity if commercial morality is to be in any way preserved. I believe the result would be the same as obtained before the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, that is to say that the creditor, with the help of such professional assistance as he can always obtain, would go to one or two large creditors, and would make a proposal which might or might not be a satisfactory or an honest proposal; but which, when accepted by the one or two principal creditors, would be forced upon the great mass of the creditors. The Return for which I moved shows that nine-tenths of the creditors in these cases are creditors for amounts of under £50. Then I would point out that the large creditors are not always large commercial people. They are very often either bonâ fide or sham creditors who are friends of the bankrupt, and to whom he goes, very often collusively, to secure an arrangement which can afterwards be forced on the rest of the creditors. Certainly if this proposal is pressed, or if it comes up on any other Bill, I shall give it the most strenuous opposition, believing it, as I do, to be fatal to the Bankruptcy Act of 1883.

* (1.5.) SIR A. ROLLIT: The Amendment obviously refers to deeds of arrangement, and if an alteration is to be made in the law in that respect, I think it should be an amendment of that Act to which the hon. Member has referred in such complimentary terms. I venture on this subject to differ somewhat from the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. For my own part, I think that deeds of arrangement, under proper restrictions for the protection of the rights of dissentient minorities of creditors, and of the public interests in case of commercial offences, are an essential supplement of any good bankruptcy system. The difficulty is, that this clause does not propose to provide those safeguards and that machinery which are absolutely essential for the purpose of preventing the abuses that occurred under the former Acts, such as that of 1861. I sincerely hope that when the subject is again brought before the House the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us the benefit of his further consideration of the proposal.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*(1.7.) MR. KELLY: I do not know whether the hon. Member in charge of the Bill will accept the next clause I have put on the Paper: "Board of Trade not to refuse to confirm appointment of Trustee." We were told in the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that there was no power to refuse to confirm the appointment of a Trustee, and he no doubt is under the belief that such a thing is not done. Quite a recent case has, however, been brought to my notice. I cannot understand on what principle the creditors who have appointed the Trustee of a deed of assignment as Trustee of the same estate in bankruptcy are not to be allowed to maintain that appointment. I do not doubt for a moment that the hon. Member in charge of the Bill intends next year to amend the Act to which he has referred, but I doubt very much whether he will be successful in the ballot next year. We cannot, at all events, base any reasonable calculation upon it. I am not, perhaps, capable of that beautiful belief in the intention of others which I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the London University has shown on this occasion. He alluded to a sort of promise on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to take under his protecting wing some Bill, the provisions of which have never been explained, but which may possibly be introduced next Session by the hon. Gentleman who is in charge of this Bill. I think that is rather a shadowy ground on which to refuse to make any amendment, however necessary, in the present system. I do not want to labour the point, and I may say that if the clause I now propose is not looked upon as important by those who represent more particularly the commercial classes of this country I have no option but to at once withdraw it. I would, however, appeal to the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to consider whether it is not a proposal it would be well to accept.

Clause (Board of Trade not to refuse to confirm appointment of Trustee.)—

(Mr. J. Kelly,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(1.10.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. and learned Member has but one argument in favour of the clause, and that is that if any person is appointed Trustee of a deed of assignment he should subsequently be Trustee of the bankrupt estate.

MR. J. KELLY*: No; what I wished to urge was that the fact of a man having been appointed a Trustee of an abortive deed of assignment should not prevent his being subsequently appointed Trustee of the estate.

*(1.11.) SIR R. WEBSTER: My hon. and learned Friend has, I think, forgotten that it has been laid down by the Bankruptcy Court, and by Mr. Justice Cave, as a sound principle that where a person has become an accounting party to an estate by virtue of an abortive deed of assignment, he ought not to be afterwards appointed as the person who will pass the accounts. I submit that the Board of Trade ought not to be compelled to recognise the appointment of such a person as Trustee of the bankruptcy.

*(1.13.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I do not see why the Board of Trade should be able to prevent the appointment of a Trustee under a deed of assignment as Trustee of the bankruptcy if the creditors wish it. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. J. Kelly) attributed to me a good deal of trust in human nature; but I think we have had a distinct assurance from the Government that they will deal with the question of deeds of arrangement next year. I do not feel as strongly about the proposed new clause as the hon. Member who has brought it forward; but I do not see why the Board of Trade should interfere with the choice of the creditors, and, therefore, if the hon. and learned Member thinks it worth while to go to a Division, I shall certainly vote with him.

(1.22.) MR. COZENS-HARDY (Norfolk, N.): I beg to move the new clause of which I have given notice. Its object is to remove a hardship which has arisen under the Act of 1883.

Clause (Disclaimer of leasehold property. Amendment of 46 and 47 Vic. c. 52, s. 55, subs. (6).—(Mr. Cozens-Hardy,)—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

Amendment made.

*(1.24.) MR. J. KELLY: I desire to move the next Amendment which stands in my name, namely, in Clause 1, line 11, to leave out "fourteen," and insert "twenty-eight." The matter is one of some importance. This clause, for the first time, makes an act of seizure an act of bankruptcy. Originally the clause provided that if an act of seizure had lasted for seven days that was an act of bankruptcy, but the hon. Member in charge of the Bill made some concession. The Sheriff, as most Members know, does not get much, except out of his poundage, and, therefore, if there is any question of his losing the poundage, the Sheriff will take very good care to precipitate the sale. Now, who will lose if the sale be conducted with improper haste? The creditors, and the creditors only. Take the case of a man having property of the value of £3,000 or £4,000, and consisting to a considerable extent of china and pictures. To make out and print a catalogue is, I am told by several auctioneers, a matter of almost a week's work, and therefore it is impossible to suppose that a proper assemblage of purchasers can be got together in 14 days. The result of having the sale within 14 days will be to give enormous advantages to those who are known by the appropriate term of "knock-outers." The goods will not fetch much more than a fourth of their value, and the creditors will be the losers. Why should they lose? What is the advantage of the clause as it now stands? I quite agree with what the hon. Member in charge of the Bill said in the Standing Committee, that the way in which the Sheriff has been allowed week after week and month after month to remain in possession is a scandal, and that something ought to be done to prevent it. But what difference will it make to the estate whether the Sheriff remains in possession 14 or 28 days? The possession money amounts to only about 30s. a week, and the postponement of the sale for another fortnight may mean a gain to the creditors of hundreds of pounds. I have no personal interest in this matter, and I have not put the Amendment down at the instigation of any person connected directly or indirectly with the Sheriff. I admit that since my proposal was rejected by the Committee I have had several letters from those who are interested in the rights of the Sheriff begging me not to abandon the position I then took up, and pointing out that it was not so much to the interest of the Sheriff as of the creditors that the goods should not be mercilessly and ruthlessly sacrificed. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, to leave out the word "fourteen," and insert the words "twenty-eight."—(Mr. John Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'fourteen' stand part of the Bill."

*(1.30.) SIR A. ROLLIT: The hon. Member has no need to make any disclaimer of interested motives in making any proposal on this or any clause. I willingly acknowledge his assistance towards the improvement of the Bill. The present proposal raises a question of very considerable administrative importance. The mischief with which the clause proposes to deal is this: There are many cases in which the Sheriff is in possession for weeks or months, and, in consequence, there is a dissipation of the estate, which is especially serious if the estate be small; the debtor continues to live upon the assets, and the creditors are kept at bay while the expenses, only £3 a week, mount up to a considerable sum. I think the House will see this is a mischief to be limited, and in the existing system there is a long delay which should be curtailed. The hon. Member asks me to make a concession for which I am not prepared. In the Committee I undertook to accept 21 days, and since then the hon. Member for West Wicklow and the hon. Member (Mr. Kelly) have convinced me that there are points that deserve consideration. For instance, in the case of a sale of articles of vertu it may be that the services of a particular auctioneer may be required or desirable, and these, perhaps, may not be obtained in a short time. To meet such cases, which are, however, very exceptional, I will so far accede to the wishes of the hon. Member as to substitute 21 days for 14 if he will accept that.

*(1.32.) MR. KELLY: I am afraid I have no choice left me but to accept that, and I will amend my Motion in that sense.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'twenty-eight' be there inserted."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Words "twenty-one" inserted.

Other Amendments made.

*(1.38.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to suggest an alteration in Clause 8, line 38. This sub-section appears to me to be one of the most useful in the Bill, and it will meet what has undoubtedly been a great scandal in relation to the debtor's expenditure. I think the House will appreciate the difference my Amendment indicates between "expenditure" and "extravagance." The word used here is "extravagance," which does not appear to me to quite meet the case, and I propose to substitute the word "expenditure." Extravagance we may assume to be always unjustifiable, though there may be unjustifiable expenditure which yet may not be called extravagance. I think the word expenditure is preferable; I simply put the suggestion before the House.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 38, to leave out the word "extravagance," and insert the word "expenditure."—(Mr. Webb.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'extravagance' stand part of the Bill."

*(1.39.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I think there is no doubt "expenditure" is the better word to use. Extravagance is always culpable, and it is unnecessary to call it unjustifiable.

*(1.39.) SIR A. ROLLIT: That is very true, but extravagance is only condemnable except morally — when it comes within the purview of the Bankruptcy Act. Logically and legally the hon. Member may be right, but let me point out the valid reason for retaining the word. A legal and definite meaning has been attached to the words "unjustifiable extravagance" since they have been used in the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 adapted from previous Acts; they have been the subject of decisions, and recognised constructions have been placed upon the words. To alter the word now might, I apprehend, lead to controversy and confusion, and to the increase of cost in re-constructing the law.

*(1.39.) MR. KELLY: I would advise the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment. The words "unjustifiable expenditure" will lead to a good deal of litigation before the definition would be authoritatively settled.

*(1.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It would be a great mistake to change the word. The construction has to be settled, and the word "extravagance" gives the cue or indication of what is meant; "expenditure" is but a relative term; it may be large, yet not unjustifiable; extravagance is the point to which the sub-section is directed.

(1.40.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: When the Act of 1883 was under consideration, I preferred the word expenditure; but, on the other hand, we have had the opportunity of seeing the enormous opening that would be given to litigation by the alteration of the word, and I still think it is undesirable to alter it.

(1.41.) MR. P. McDONALD: Still, I think the word "expenditure" is also necessary; and I would suggest that both words should be used, "unjustifiable expenditure or extravagance."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

*(1.45.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): The Bill was so thoroughly discussed in Committee under the able Chairmanship of the hon. Member for East Donegal that I am unwilling to bring before the House any Amendment to the work of the Committee; but my two Amendments together involve a principle which I will shortly state. As the clause stands, though the Court is of opinion that the arrangement or the terms of composition are reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, the Court may disallow it, if the bankrupt has misconducted himself in certain ways, and must do so, unless 7s. 6d. in the £1 is to be paid. Now you are dealing with a case in which the Court is of opinion that the proposal for composition or scheme of arrangement is calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, and yet in the one case the Court may refuse to approve the proposal, and in the other cases shall refuse, unless there is a payment of 7s. 6d. in the £1. But here you are punishing the creditors for the bankrupt's fault. Let the bankrupt be punished if he breaks the law; but if he has only committed a fault, then, whether he ought to be punished or not, I hold that the creditors ought not to be punished. Although it is said that Bankruptcy Law is mixed up with moral considerations, I do not understand a moral consideration limited by 7s. 6d. in the £1. The effect of the clause will be to punish the creditors; but the bankrupt, if he has misbehaved himself, can purge himself of his offence, so to speak, by providing 7s. 6d. in the £1. It may be an advantage to the creditors to get less than 7s. 6d., but the assertion of the moral principle is made to depend upon that sum. When the bankrupt has broken the Criminal Law let him be punished as the Criminal Law provides; but if he has not broken the Criminal Law and has committed a fault, for which you think he ought to be punished, well and good, but do not make the punishment fall upon the creditors. On these grounds, and taking the two Amendments as hanging together, I move the first.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 20, to leave out from the word "creditors" to the words "the court," in line 21.—(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

*(1.48.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I admit the importance of this, but it is not possible to agree to the omission of the words. My hon. and learned Friend will observe that the President of the Board of Trade proposes, in conformity with the view he has previously expressed, to leave out the words "may in its discretion," in order to insert "shall," and it seems to be that that is a course that must be adopted. I would point out that in a very limited number of cases is the Court required to refuse discharge; the cases are when the bankrupt has committed a misdemeanour under Section 31 of the Act of 1883; that is to say, where an adjudged bankrupt obtains credit to an amount of more than £20, not informing the creditor that he is a discharged bankrupt, or where he has committed an offence or misdemeanour under the Debtors' Act of 1869, which has been previously treated or described as fraud. Now, it seems to me a serious thing to suggest that when the Court is going to decline to give a bankrupt his discharge on the ground that he has been guilty of a crime, that in that case the Court may indirectly give a discharge by approving of a composition or arrangement. It will be observed that the sub-sections proceed by steps. In the first the Court must refuse, and then, under the second sub-section, an option is given. I confess, knowing how my hon. and learned Friend is the champion of law—and order also—I am surprised he should commit himself to a suggestion that the Court, which must refuse a discharge on account of gross and criminal misconduct, should still indirectly promote a discharge by approving an arrangement. It is not really a case in which the creditors are involved, because, speaking as a general rule, and not of exceptional cases, if the bankrupt is guilty of such conduct, surely it is better to wind up his affairs in bankruptcy.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, lines 21 and 22, to leave out the words "may in its discretion," and insert the word "shall."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'may in its discretion,' stand part of the Bill."

*(153.) Mr. BARING (London): I desire to say that the decision of the Committee upon this point was arrived at by a considerable majority against the view of the Government representatives. That the Government were right in refusing the Amendment of my hon. Friend near me (Mr. Gedde) I have no doubt, but for the very same reason that he wished to leave out those words, I wish to retain the option given to the Court. I do not wish to punish the creditors for the fault of the debtor. I hope the House will maintain the decision arrived at in Committee upstairs by a considerable majority, even though the Government still stick to their view.

*(154.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Perhaps I may explain the circumstances that occurred in Committee. The issue was raised twice, first by the hon. Member for Camberwell, who moved to leave out the whole of the sub-section, leaving the action of the clause purely within the discretion of the Court, and this was negatived by a considerable majority; and then, without further discussion, the proposal of my hon. Friend behind me was accepted, substituting "may in its discretion," for "shall," practically giving what the Committee had already rejected. The reason for the present Amendment is obvious. My hon. Friend admits it is right with regard to the first two paragraphs, namely, if the conditions, in the opinion of the Court, are unreasonable or not calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, that the Court should be bound to refuse the proposal, because in that case it would be with the Court to decide whether the terms of the proposal are reasonable or not, or whether they are or are not for the benefit of the general body of creditors. Then my hon. Friend, taking up the point the hon. Member for Stockport unsuccessfully urged, desires to give the Court discretion to allow composition in cases in which, by Sub-section 8 of the previous clause, it would be bound to refuse the order of discharge of a bankrupt on the ground of dishonest conduct. I hope the House will not accept such a proposition, but will restore the clause to the position in which it stands in the existing law in Sub-section 6 of Section 18 of the Act of 1883. I cannot but think the Committee settled the clause as it now stands under a misapprehension.

*(157.) Sir J. LUBBOCK: With all deference to my right hon. Friend, I hardly think the Committee were under any misapprehension. The matter was decided by a large majority after a discussion on the Motion of the hon. Member for Uxbridge, who, if he were here, would no doubt support my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Baring). I admit there may be cases in which, in the interest of public morality, it might be necessary to impose pecuniary sacrifices on creditors; but it does not follow that this Amendment is necessary. If the House is not prepared to support the judgment of the Committee upstairs, still may they not trust the Court to deal with the matter wisely when it comes before them. I feel the greatest confidence that in cases suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Court would act aright, and the discretion may be safely left to it. I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to allow the clause to stand as it is.

*(1.58.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I venture to express a hope in the same direction.

(1.58.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I would strongly support the Amendment, and the opposite view seems to me to be most extraordinary. If a debtor has committed an offence of such magnitude as to require the Court to inflict on the bankrupt certain punishment, namely, the refusal of a discharge, Parliament has decided that the Court shall have no discretion at all so far as the bankrupt is concerned. The act of the bankrupt is of such a character that it is necessary to impose on the Court the duty of inflicting a severe punishment; but then the hon. Member opposite and others say, "No; although this House has thought it necessary to require without alternative that this punishment shall be inflicted on the bankrupt, the bankrupt shall be allowed to escape scot-free, he shall be relieved from punishment if the creditors can prove to the satisfaction of the Court that, in their opinion, their interests will suffer by the refusal of a composition;"—"No, no,"—do not be in a hurry; "if they can persuade the Court to adopt their view that the principles of morality and justice should be sacrificed to the pecuniary interests of the creditors." I think it is a monstrous proposition. If a bankrupt deserves punishment he ought to have it; and if in the course of that punishment some slight disadvantage is inflicted on the creditors, they ought to take the responsibility. After all, what is the damage done to creditors? Whereas the estate would be wound up under a composition in one case, in the other it would have to be wound up in bankruptcy. There are those who take the view that bankruptcy always leads to loss to creditors, and that it involves pecuniary sacrifice. I take a totally different view, and I feel certain the future will show that I am justified in that view. We have as yet had no opportunity of comparing the cost of private arrangements with that of bankruptcy. But in this Bill there is a proviso that Return shall be made to the Board of Trade of the costs of winding up under a deed of composition, and I think that when we get that we shall find that compositions and deeds of arrangement are, on the whole, not so economical as bankruptcy. After all, the sacrifice asked of creditors in order that public justice may be done is very small, and may probably prove no sacrifice at all.

Sir J. Lubbock

*(2.2.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: The right hon. Gentleman may be right in thinking that creditors will not suffer, but creditors hold a very different opinion. On the one hand, the right hon. Gentleman admits that he cannot prove his proposition, while on the other the creditors base their opinion on a good many years' experience. I should like to state a concrete case. A bankrupt had within two or three months preceding the date of the receiving order incurred an unjustifiable expense by bringing a frivolous and vexatious defence to an action in the County Court. Possibly, at the most, the expense so occurred did not exceed £5, yet the Court in such a case is to have no discretion.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That is exactly a case in which, under this Bill, there will be discretion in the Court.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: Well, if the hon. and learned Gentleman says that, I need not pursue the point further. There are cases in which the degree of blame attaching to the bankrupt varies very much, and I think some confidence should be reposed in the Courts. I cannot understand the right hon. Gentleman on this Bench asking us to show no confidence in Courts of Justice by giving them no discretion in these matters. I hope the Amendment will not be persisted in.

*(2.5.) SIR A. ROLLIT: I am sorry to criticise the work of a Committee which has done so much to improve this Bill. But I think this clause bears internal evidence that something has gone wrong with it. It is not at all logical as it now stands, though it was so in the Bill as drafted. For instance, the clause now says that in the most serious cases the Court may exercise a discretion as to granting or refusing a discharge; then, in less serious cases that it shall refuse, and that it shall allow the offences to be compounded; and, lastly, it repeats that in any other case it shall have a discretion. All this is illogical and inconsistent, and ought to be rectified by restoring the words originally in the Bill.

*(2.7.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): It is quite true the sub-section is illogical as compared with the following sub-section, and one or the other must be amended. The question is whether we are to accept the more elastic rule laid down at first or to make a hard-and-fast line for the Court, and oblige it, under all circumstances, and without exercising any discretion, to refuse to approve of arrangements come to by creditors under these circumstances. I hope the House will stick to the original words, because there may often be special and exceptional matters which should be left entirely for the Court to decide; otherwise, the Court may feel bound to refuse to sanction an arrangement which it considers would be for the benefit of the creditors. It is all very well and very right to punish fraudulent bankrupts, but it is very hard that the creditors should share in the punishment. I am one of those who have confidence in the Court, and wish it to have a reasonable discretion left to it.

*(2.9.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I should like to point out, in furtherance of the observation made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, that it is a mistake to suppose that this Amendment takes away any discretion from the Court, as in the Act of 1883 the words are that the Court "shall refuse to approve of the composition if it is of opinion that the terms of the composition" are not reasonable or best for the general body of the creditors. The proposed Amendment, therefore, does not extend the restrictions on the Court. During the last seven years we have had no experience to show that the present condition of affairs with regard to the discretion of the Court has worked hardship on creditors. I do not state that without authority. I have endeavoured to find out as far as I could what the real facts are, and I do not think a case has occurred in which creditors have substantially suffered through an estate being administered in bankruptcy instead of under a deed of arrangement. I assure the House that this Amendment does not introduce any new principle.

(2.12.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, W.): I shall support the Amendment. When the 1883 Act was under consideration in this House, there were prolonged and almost bitter disputes on this point. This is a retrospective clause. It says that after the passing of this Act no composition or deed of arrangement under Sections 125 and 126 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 shall be entered into or allowed without the sanction of the Court having jurisdiction in the matter, and that such sanction shall not be granted unless the composition or liquidation appears to be reasonable or calculated to benefit the general body of creditors. Under the Act of 1869 the Court had very wide discretion, and the experience of the exercise of it was so regrettable that in the Act of 1883 it was found necessary to insert a special section of a most unusual character and in a most unusual part of the Bill—in the interpretation clause—so as to prevent a continuance of the mischief. I think that the arguments which then prevailed are equally pertinent in the present case.

(2.15.) The House divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 122.—(Div. List, No. 181.)

Word "shall" inserted.

Other Amendments made.

*(2.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I now move, in Clause 23, to omit Sub-section 3 and insert the following:—

"A creditor may give a special proxy to any person to vote at any specified meeting or ad-journalment thereof on all or any of the following matters, namely:—(a) for or against any specific proposal for a composition or scheme of arrangement; (b) for or against the appointment, remuneration, or continuance in office of any specified person as trustee or member of the Committee of Inspection; (c) on all other questions arising at any specified meeting or adjournment thereof."

Perhaps I may be permitted to make a brief explanation. The House is aware that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London has taken great pains to put this question of proxies upon a proper footing, and I am sure my right hon. Friend is very much indebted to him for the labours he has bestowed upon the matter. At the same time he will recognise also that the President of the Board of Trade has endeavoured to meet him as far as possible, consistent with the prevention of certain evils, which we must endeavour to stop. I refer to the system of touting for proxies so as to obtain the control of bankruptcies; but the right hon. Gentleman will see that we have endeavoured to meet that evil by giving the delegate power to vote on various questions, while ensuring the good administration of the bankrupt's estate.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 27, to leave out sub-section (3) of Clause 11.—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That sub-section (3) of Clause 11 stand part of the Bill."

*(2.45.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I desire to acknowledge the courtesy of the Attorney General and the President of the Board of Trade. I should no doubt have preferred the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper. The objections against special proxies have, I think, been removed by the subsequent legislation; at the same time, I recognise that the Government have done much to meet the views of the London Chamber of Commerce, and, under these circumstances, I am ready to accept the words suggested by the Attorney General.

(2.48.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I confess the Amendment now proposed by the Government and accepted by my right hon. Friend behind me is not open to the objection that was taken to his original proposal, and I am prepared to accept it as a reasonable compromise. At the same time, I differ from my right hon.

Sir R. Webster

Friend. I cannot see why the difficulties of the case which he puts cannot be met by the provision of a general proxy which can be given to the clerk or person in the employment of the person giving the proxy. No doubt the object of many of those who support the alteration of the law is to avoid the old system under which there was a touting for proxies. A special proxy may of course be given to any person, and consequently to a professional firm. In the vast majority of cases, it will be admitted that to allow a professional firm to vote for the appointment of a Trustee or highly-remunerated official would undoubtedly lead to all those evils that the Act of 1883, in dealing with this question of proxies, was supposed to guard against. I must say that I prefer the law as it stands, and no real case has been made out for a change in the system of enabling a creditor to allow his proxy to act for him, as if he himself were present.

*(2.54.) MR. GROTRIAN (Hull): I do not intend to offer any objection to the compromise suggested, but I must say I view with some misgiving and alarm the enlargement of this general proxy system. I entirely concur in the view which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) has expressed on one or two occasions. Everyone acquainted with proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 is aware of the abuses which crept in under the proxy system. I am of opinion that these abuses have been entirely removed by subsequent legislation, namely, the Act of 1883. I therefore view with some misgiving the enlargement proposed. But, under the circumstances, as the proposition is certainly a considerable modification of the original proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, I am not disposed to offer it any serious opposition.

Question put, and negatived.

*(2.58.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I now move, in Clause 23, to omit Sub-section 3, and insert the following:—

"A creditor may give a special proxy to any person to vote at any specified meeting or adjournment thereof, on all or any of the following matters, namely: (a.) for or against any specific proposal for a composition or scheme of arrangement; (b.) for or against the appointment, remuneration, or continuance in office of any specified person as trustee or member of the Committee of inspection; (c.) on all other questions arising at any specified meeting or adjournment thereof."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 31, to leave out sub-section (4) of Clause 11.—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That sub-section (4) of Clause 11 stand part of the Bill."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACT AMENDMENT

BILL.—(No. 167.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 2.

(3.5.) BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin): The object of this clause is to provide that where the district for which the adoption of the Act is proposed contains a population of 5,000 or more the opinion of the voters shall be taken by voting papers alone, and that where the population is under 5,000 they may proceed either by voting papers or by public meeting. I have an Amendment to move, the effect of which, with consequential alterations, will be to abolish the procedure by public meeting in all cases. Up to the year 1877 the procedure was entirely by public meeting; but subsequent to that a change was made, and the Local Authorities had the alternative given them of proceeding either by voting paper or public meeting. The Preamble of the Act bringing about this change declared that it had been found in many cases that public meeting was an unsatisfactory mode of indicating the general opinion of the ratepayers, and that it was desirable to adopt a more efficacious method of ascertaining that public opinion. I cannot understand why the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill should make the distinction he does between populations of under and above 5,000. It is in the small places that the greatest difficulty arises. In a large place if there is an objection to the establishment of a library the objection will be well-known, and effect will be given to the objection; but in small places the matter will not be so well discussed; and if there should be a public meeting it may only be attended by a few persons, and the ratepayers at large may find themselves involved at the will of those few persons in a very heavy burden. Violent agitations frequently take place on subjects of this kind, and we cannot be too careful in our legislation. If the right hon. Baronet will strike out the 5,000 limit it will give great satisfaction. Personally, I am very much in favour of the adoption of the Library Act in all cases where it can be adopted, but I am averse to its being put into operation by the machinery proposed. My Amendments will affect Clauses 2 and 5.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 26, to leave out from the word "In" to the word "cases."—(Baron Dimsdale.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(3.11.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: Inasmuch as a poll is demanded in most cases where proceedings are taken by public meeting, I think it would be a saving of expense to proceed by voting paper in the first instance. I am as anxious as anyone in the House can be that the Public Libraries Act should be adopted generally throughout the country; but, at the same time, I have no desire that it should be adopted in any instance against the wish of the people concerned. I feel that if there is not a public desire for a Public Library, the establishment of such an institution will not be useful. The hon. Member thinks that, under the clause as it stands, Public Libraries would be decided on without sufficient consideration. I do not agree with him. I admit, however, that the holding of a public meeting may involve unnecessary expense and trouble to the ratepayers, and I am in the hands of the Committee in regard to the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 3.

*(3.17.) MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): The object of the Amendment I wish to move is to meet such cases as that of the borough of Leominster, which gives its name to the division I have the honour to represent. They have recently adopted the Libraries Act in that borough, but a difficulty has arisen owing to the fact that the borough consists of two portions—the one urban and the other rural. Naturally, the inhabitants of the rural portion of the borough feel somewhat grieved that they have to pay the same rate as the urban portion, though, of course, they will derive much less advantage from the library. Many of the rural portion of the inhabitants live a considerable distance from the town. It seems to me that the adoption of some such Amendment as that I propose would facilitate the adoption of the Library Act, as it would then be possible for places of unequal population and rateable value to join together for the purposes of the Act. At present when the rural parts of a district have to be rated to the same extent as the urban parts, they very often will not agree to putting the Act in operation. A number of county parishes surrounding a large village should not be called upon to pay at the same rate as the village, seeing that they would derive much less advantage from the library. I trust the Committee will see its way to the adoption of the Amendment, the effect of which will be to allow the rate to be levied in different proportions, on defined parts of a library district. So far as I can see, there is no objection to my proposal. Difficulties in the way of the working of the Act have arisen in the past, and may arise in the future, unless some such alteration as this is made. The right. hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill has no objection, I believe, to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after the word "district," to insert the words "or in any defined portion of the district" (Mr. Rankin.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(3.20.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I agree with nearly everything the hon. Member says, but I do not think his Amendment is necessary, because in Clause 8 it is laid down that the expression "library district" means any borough, &c., on any "parish or part of a parish." I do not know whether these words are sufficient to effect the hon. Member's purpose.

*(3.21.) MR. RANKIN: I think the hon. and learned Member has mistaken the object of that clause. It is that a library district may be composed of parts of parishes, but my proposal is that the various parts of a district may be differently rated.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(3.21.) BARON DIMSDALE: I have two Amendments on the Paper to this clause, the object of which is to make it clear that there shall be no additional burden thrown on the rates. In the Libraries Act of 1855 it was specified that the rate should not exceed 1d. in the £1, and I think the wording of this clause would imply that limitation can be removed altogether. This question was fought out very hard, and owing to the attitude of the then President of the Local Government Board the controversy was closed. I think it would be a great mistake to re-open it now.

*(3.22.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I am assured by the draftsman that the Amendment is unnecessary; but if, on further consideration, it should appear that there is any ambiguity, I will undertake to have an Amendment to make the matter clear inserted in another place. The object of the clause is to enable the 1d. rate to be exceeded where it is found that the cost has been under-estimated. I do not think there is anything in the clause which would enable the 1d. maximum to be exceeded.

(3.23.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I think the Amendment should be accepted, because it would be quite easy for the right hon. Baronet, if he desired it at a future stage, to re-model the clause. The clause as drawn seems somewhat ambiguous; and as the Amendment would simplify it, I trust it will be accepted. I think it is preferable that the words should be removed.

*(3.25.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I do not think there is any ambiguity. It is dangerous for a layman to speak too confidently as to the wording of an Act of Parliament, but the draftsman assured me there would be no ambiguity about the words. I hope the hon. Member will allow the words to stand; and if on consideration it is thought desirable to remove them, they can be struck out at a subsequent stage.

*(3.26.) MR. RANKIN: It seems to me that the last paragraph of the clause simply provides against the danger hon. Members have in view. It says—

“Provided always that nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorise the levying of any rate exceeding 1d. in the £1.”

SIR R. PAGET: If there is a proviso in one part of the clause and another proviso in another part there is obvious ambiguity. Had we not better get rid of the ambiguity?

(3.27.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): To listen to hon. Gentlemen one would think there is some terrible danger about to be incurred. What is it? That a given community may wish to spend more than 1d. in the £1 on a Free Library. I do not regard that as a very overwhelming danger. I can quite understand poor communities wishing to be limited in their expenditure, but I do not see why rich communities should not be allowed to spend 2d. in the £1 if they so desire. I think it is a great evil that the rate under the Public Libraries Act should have been confined to 1d. It is not in the least necessary that Parliament should legislate against the terrible danger that a community should spend what it thinks fit on so excellent an object as a Free Library.

(3.28.) BARON DIMSDALE: The right hon. Gentleman would apparently be very careless whether there is a heavy rate in a particular district or not.

*(3.29.) MR. KIMBER: I think the offer of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London very fair. I agree with him and the draftsman that there is no real ambiguity when the clause is read carefully.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 to 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to, with an Amendment.

Clauses 9 to 11 agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Baronet's new clauses (“Power to grant charity lands for library purposes,” and “Extension of 18 Vic. cap. 70, 3, 18, to the Metropolis”) appear to me to be outside the scope of the Bill.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: The clauses are intended to meet cases in which Ecclesiastical Bodies, and other charitable institutions are desirous of giving land for the purpose of Free Libraries, and I think it would be eminently desirable they should do so. I believe there is no opposition to the clauses, but of course I must, Sir, bow to your ruling.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Baronet must take another method of getting the clauses inserted.

Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report the Bill with Amendments to the House.”

*(3.40.) MR. KELLY: I do not know whether I should be in order if I allude at this point to the new clauses appearing on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Baronet, and which you, Sir, have ruled to be outside the scope of the Bill. The Dulwich Governors have expressed their willingness—their desire, in fact—to give a site for a Free Library there, and I believe the Charity Commissioners have expressed their desire to carry out the wishes of the Government. The Governors have no power at present to give the site, and, therefore, I appeal to the Government to afford the right hon. Baronet some facilities for amending the Bill in the way he suggests.

*(3.42.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I should be very glad, indeed, to see these clauses inserted, and I am sure no Member of the House wishes to put any impediment in the way of the adoption of the clauses. If my right hon. Friend brings the clauses within the scope of the Bill he might, on Report, move that the Bill be re-committed with a view to the insertion of the clauses.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: May I hope Her Majesty's Government will help me in getting the Third Reading. I should be sorry to run the risk of losing the Bill by trying to get these clauses inserted.

*MR. RITCHIE: If the right hon. Baronet means that the Government should give up any portion of their time, I am afraid I cannot promise him that we will give him facilities for the Third Reading. But I cannot conceive that any difficulty will arise in obtaining the Third Reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

SLANDER LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(No. 278.)

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

*(3.45.) MR. GULLY (Carlisle): Perhaps, as this Bill was read a second time after 12 o'clock at night, and without any discussion, it may be convenient, as this is the only clause which contains any operating part, that I should upon the clause say a few words in explanation of the object of the measure. As the law stands at present, any imputation, however gross and malicious, upon the chastity or virtue of a woman may be made with impunity, provided that it is made by word of mouth, and no direct pecuniary damage results to the woman. That has resulted in great hardship and injustice, and the state of the law in this respect was strongly denounced in the House of Lords 30 years ago both by Lord Campbell and Lord Brougham as unsatisfactory and barbarous. The object of the Bill is to put an end to this state of things. The only objection that I know of is that trivial actions may be brought if the Bill passes; but the existing law provides against that, because in cases in which it is shown that the words are used merely as vulgar abuse, the Judges always direct Juries that there is no ground of action. These are the grounds on which I have thought it necessary to bring in the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Milvain) who has the first Amendment down, is not present, but I accept the Amendment, which is an improvement in the drafting of the Bill, and will move it in his stead.

Sir J. Lubbock

Amendment proposed, in Clause 1, page 1, lines 6 and 7, leave out, "to an unmarried woman."—(Mr. Gully.)

*(3.50.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I am afraid that if this Bill is passed, where words are used which ought not to be used, and which, at the same time, ought not to be regarded as conveying a serious imputation, they will in many cases be made the ground of an action. It is well known that when temper gets the upper hand of a person, he or she very often uses words that ought not to be used, but which cannot be regarded as seriously imputing unchastity. Although there may be cases in which the Judge may direct the Jury that they ought to consider in what sense the words complained of were used, still there would be a number of cases in which hardships would be inflicted. Actions might be brought for words spoken rashly and hastily, and I cannot but think it is rather a dangerous thing to alter the law.

(3.52.) SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney): The speech of the Attorney General really goes against the Second Reading, which has already been accepted by the House. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Without discussion.] I am aware of that, but the objection taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to have been taken on the Second Reading. The point is this. At present if an imputation has been made upon a man or woman which involves pecuniary loss or damage, he or she has a right of action. The Bill proposes to give a right of action in cases where the most serious imputation which can be made, and which does not result in pecuniary loss, is made. There may possibly be some cases in which actions are brought for the use of some objectionable phrase, but I submit that the safeguard lies in the protection which the good sense of Judges and Juries gives.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, Clause 1, page 1, line 7, leave out "married."—(Mr. Gully.)

Question, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

(3.55.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I have put down this Amendment because I think it is a very dangerous thing that there should be on the Statute Book anything which recognises that that should be lawful which is said of one sex, while it is not if said of the other sex. I propose to leave out the word "woman" in line 7, and insert "person." Whatever we may think and know about the way in which offences of unchastity in the case of one sex are regarded, it is a very serious thing that it should be on the Statute Book that the law of England recognises that it is not an offence to charge one sex with unchastity.

Amendment proposed, Clause 1, page 1, line 7, leave out "woman" and insert "person."—(Captain Verney.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'woman' stand part of the Clause."

*(3.56.) MR. GULLY: I quite agree that logically there is something to be said for the view the hon. and gallant Member has laid before the Committee, but practically no mischief would result from the law being what I propose it should be. The fact is, that men do not suffer under the imputation to the same extent that women do. There is not the same practical hardship, or the same danger of an imputation against men being made maliciously. And, moreover, when imputations are made against men they are almost invariably made with a view of damaging the accused in their profession. In such case there is a right of action. The justification of the Bill is that women do not suffer the pecuniary loss to give them cause of action, but they suffer in their characters. While I fully appreciate the spirit in which my hon. and gallant Friend proposes the Amendment I trust he will not think it necessary to insist upon it, because his insistence might endanger the passing of the clause.

*(3.58.) MR. KELLY: I cannot admit that unchastity is the same thing in the case of a man as that of a woman. To impute unchastity in the case of a woman really means ruin to her; but in the case of a man the imputation is generally a trifling matter, relatively speaking, and indeed may be sometimes regarded as a compliment. At any rate, an imputation of unchastity does not affect a man's future chance in life, but it is a serious thing to a woman. I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not press his Amendment.

(3.59.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: The remarks of the hon. and learned Member amount to the very strongest argument in favour of the Amendment. If it is to be said gravely in the House of Commons that an imputation of unchastity is regarded as a compliment, I think the Amendment is absolutely necessary.

*MR. W. McLAREN (Crewe): The speech of the hon. and learned Member for Camberwell leads me to join the hon. and gallant Gentleman in the support of this Amendment, as I entirely approve of the principle which he has laid down. I do not specially advise my hon. and gallant Friend to divide the Committee, but if he goes to a Division I shall certainly follow him into the Lobby.

Question put, and negatived.

*(4.0.) MR. KELLY: I have every sympathy with the main object of the Bill. It is, undoubtedly, desirable that a woman should have every protection against a man who endeavours to defame her character. But it must be known to the House that there are no graver scandals in our Courts of Justice than the enormous number of trivial actions brought for libel and slander, especially slander. Although the person who defames the character of an honest and virtuous woman should be made to smart for his conduct in a sensible degree, I think we ought not to provide undue facilities for bringing actions for indiscreet or trivial expressions. Let me point out that unless we introduce some such proviso as this I now have to propose, there will be no sort of power in a defendant, however innocent of the charge he may be, to defend himself against it, except at very serious expense. Even should he prove his innocence of the charge, and the plaintiff is a married woman, he will, if the wife has no separate property, have no sort of remedy against the husband, and though successful in the action will have to pay his own heavy costs. I cannot see there is any injustice in making this limitation; it does not take away, it cannot take away, any right of the woman to vindicate her character in open Court. But, on the other hand, the Bill as it stands gives an advantage to a woman who, at the instigation of an unscrupulous attorney, may commence an action for slander upon trivial grounds, in the hope that a man will be unwilling to face the ordeal of the Court with the prospect of having, in any case, to pay costs, even though he may get a verdict. Such a proviso will prevent, in some degree, the Act being taken advantage of by those who make a living out of bringing frivolous and vexatious actions.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 1, page 1, line 8, after the word "damage," to add the words, "Provided that in any action brought by any married woman under this Act, the defendant shall be entitled, upon appearing to the writ, to an order for a stay of proceedings until the husband of such married woman shall have been found as a co-plaintiff. Provided also, that in any action brought under the provisions of this Act, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover any larger sum, by way of damages other than special damages, than £200."—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.5.) SIR C. RUSSELL: The hon. and learned Member has shown no reason why in this Bill, of which he pre-fesses himself to be in favour, we should make an exception to the general law. I cannot but think he has forgotten the "Married Women's Property Act," which provides that a married woman can sue and can be sued without joining her husband in an action of contract or tort. I do not find any reason why this particular form of action and means of redress should be taken out of the general rule. It seems to me there is strong reason in the other direction. Cases may possibly arise in which a woman is anxious to vindicate her character, but for reasons not creditable to himself, her husband is not willing to join in an action for the purpose; he may be a party even to the very offence. So far, the Amendment would destroy the usefulness of the Bill.

Mr. Kelly

*(4.6.) MR. KELLY: An Order will be made for good cause shown. I do claim that this is a different action to ordinary action, and particularly liable to abuse. If a person is injured in an ordinary action, the fact is provable, but I think the hon. and learned Gentleman, with his experience, must acknowledge that such actions as these are very liable to abuse. I think it cannot be an injustice to a wife to say her husband shall be joined with her as co-plaintiff. Such extraordinary cases as the hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned, of a husband conniving with a third party to destroy his wife's character, would be amply provided for by the addition of such words as "unless the Court for good cause shown should otherwise order," which I should be quite ready to add to the proposed proviso.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*(4.8.) MR. KIMBER: I hope the Attorney General will not consider it his duty to oppose the Bill further. As illustrating the necessity for such a measure, it is only necessary to point a case. A woman, keeping a shop, may be maligned as regards her business, and is entitled to recover damages without proving special damage, but if her personal character is assailed in the worst terms that can be applied to a woman, she cannot recover a verdict unless she can show she has sustained special pecuniary damage. Or contrast the position of two women living side by side, one in a private house, the other in a shop. The latter can recover for damages sustained in her business by reason of opprobrious epithets being applied to her, but she may have no such redress, because she cannot perhaps prove that pecuniary loss has resulted. It is, I think, a position that cannot be defended.

(4.10.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I would also ask the Attorney General not to offer opposition. Although I admit a certain amount of weight attaches to the objection that words thoughtlessly used may be made the subject of action for the benefit of solicitors of a certain class, that should not prevent the passing of a useful Bill. Words might very well be introduced, at a subsequent stage, so that it should be made clear that the intention of the speaker in using the language complained of was to impute unchastity or adultery. I shall certainly vote for the clause as it stands.

(4.11.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I was speaking my own private opinion, but it is not my intention to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(4.11.) MR. GULLY: In moving a new clause that the Bill shall not extend to Scotland, I do not mean that Scotland shall not have the advantages of the Bill, but I am informed by those who are skilled in Scotch law that the application of the Bill to Scotland is unnecessary, inasmuch as the law in Scotland in regard to slander is already substantially the same as is here contemplated.

New Clause ("This Act shall not apply to Scotland.")—(Mr. Gully,)—read a first and second time, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 290.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*(4.15.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: In principle, I think the Amendment I propose has the approval of the promoters of the Bill. I believe the promoters would be glad to see the whole of the Bill extended to the whole country, but that is not proposed, and, probably, would not be found practicable. Then the question arises, how much of the general provisions should be applied when Sanitary Authorities desire there should be the application. As the Bill stands, it is proposed that part 1 shall be extended to England and Wales in any case, whereas the provisions in parts 2, 3, 4, and 5 only extend to those districts in which they are adopted. The object of my Amendment is to make the two clauses relating to public meetings of universal application throughout the country. I think the Committee will agree with me that it is very desirable that when a public meeting is called within the area of an urban or Rural Sanitary Authority, the Sanitary Authority should take steps for the protection of the public. I think every hon. Member will have had within his experience public meetings held under circumstances in which life has been in the greatest danger. I know it has happened to me on several occasions. I have attended meetings in a room at the top of a building, gaslights glaring, and crowded with people, sometimes all of one way of thinking, sometimes of opposing opinions, and access to the place of meeting being up a small, spiral staircase, and the lives of all these have been in considerable danger. Now, Clauses 37 and 38 deal only with this subject, and I think they ought not to be contentious, and that every Member will agree they ought to have universal application. Clause 37, which deals with the means of ingress and egress, should be of application everywhere. Clause 38 refers to the safety of platforms erected, or used on public occasions. I think we must admit that the platforms, on which we are asked to take our stand, are not always very safe, and I think there is every reason why, by a few words in an Act, we should obtain security in this respect.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 2, page 1, line 15, after the word "London" to insert the words "Sections thirty-seven and thirty-eight, Part three, shall also extend to England and Wales."—(Captain Verney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.19.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): The plan of the Bill is a simple one. It is necessary to make this part of the Bill imperative to give effect to the Bill, but the whole of the rest is permissive, and I feel sure that the best way to insure the whole being carried into operation, in fact and not in form only, is to leave option to the authorities.

(4.20.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I hope the hon. and gallant Member will not press this. I do not know if he is aware of the circumstances under which this Bill comes before us. At the commencement of the Session two Bills were introduced, one by myself at the request of certain Municipal Authorities, and one by my hon. Friend, who has had constant experience on the "Police and Sanitary Committee" of the complaints of Local Authorities of the expense of coming to Parliament to get certain powers not conferred upon them by the general law. I sat on that Committee some years ago, and we recommended the desirability of passing a general Act dealing with all these matters. Although I agree with my hon. and gallant Friend that it would be a good thing if we could find time to provide for general legislation in this direction, in legislation, as in other matters, we have often to stop short of perfection and be content with second best. The two Bills were referred to a strong Select Committee, presided over by the Secretary of the Local Government Board, and the Committee came to the unanimous conclusion that it is desirable to leave the Bill permissive, leaving to the Local Authorities to say if they will or will not adopt its provisions. I have little doubt that we shall in time find it in universal application. I may, without assuming knowledge I do not possess, premise that this is probably the last Wednesday we shall have at our disposal for other than Government business, and I would urge that our only chance of carrying through a piece of useful legislation is to adhere to the permissive character of the Bill. I think we may have sufficient confidence in County Councils and Town Councils to leave them to say "aye" or "no" to the adoption of the Act.

*(4.24.) MR. RITCHIE: I hope that the Committee will accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fowler.) The object of the Bill is to enable Local Authorities to take advantage of existing legislation for the benefit of those they represent, and I confidently believe it will be taken advantage of throughout the country just as if its operation were made imperative. Such has been our experience of the Notification of Diseases Act. There is the advantage that we enlist the local sympathy and co-operation of Local Authorities, when by more drastic regulation we might excite opposition.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

(4.25.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Last year I held an opinion strongly in favour of the proposal in my hon. and gallant Friend's Amendment, but I have been converted by what I have heard from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) and greatly encouraged by the reception his last great measure has received throughout the country. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Fowler) said a few months ago that he, at the beginning of the Session, represented the views of a number of Municipal Corporations. Now Municipal Corporations are always enabled to make their wishes felt in the House, but it is somewhat different in regard to Rural Sanitary Authorities, and on their behalf I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Ritchie). They do not always receive at the hands of his Department so much consideration as I think they are entitled to, the reason being, I suppose, that the officials being but human yield to the strongest. Now, the principles of public health are exactly the same in rural districts as in towns, and the causes of consumption are alike in each. I have in mind an instance in regard to a district in Cheshire where the Rural Sanitary Authorities were not able to obtain urban powers, with the result that consumption has prevailed to a terrible degree. If we could obtain general assent I could strongly wish that the whole of the Public Health Act should apply to rural districts as in towns. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will, when he receives application from Rural Authorities for urban powers, give such applications his most favourable consideration.

*(4.28.) MR. RITCHIE: I am not sure that these observations come within the scope of the Amendment, but the hon. Gentleman has made a charge against the Department over which I have the honour to preside, that we do not give sufficient attention to the representations of Rural Authorities. In that I can assure him he is entirely mistaken. On the contrary, the authorities we find most difficult to persuade to take action in these matters are in the rural districts. I can assure the hon. Member that in reference to sanitary matters it often requires our most strenuous endeavours to put sanitary precautions into force. The real truth is, the Sanitary Authorities are not always constituted in the manner we would desire.

4.29.) MR. BRUNNER: I may explain that the difficulty I spoke of arose before the right hon. Gentleman occupied office.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16.

*MR. KELLY: It is difficult to understand how it is that this clause appears in the Bill. No doubt the measure is a very useful one, but I doubt if this clause is workable. It provides that if any person turns into any drain pipe leading to any sewer water of a higher temperature than 110 deg. Fah., so as to be likely to cause a nuisance, or to be injurious to health, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10. Now, I do not think there is any Member of this House who would not every day come under that clause, when he is in the lavatory, for if the water in the basin is too hot he naturally turns it out. I do not know how one is to send hot water into a drain without causing a nuisance. What I would suggest is, that the clause should stipulate that the nuisance should be injurious to health. How can anyone send hot water into a drain without causing a nuisance? All I ask for is that it shall be provided that the nuisance shall be injurious to health. In the neighbourhood in which I reside there are some soap works, and frequently we have to shut our windows on account of the nuisance, which is not, however, injurious to health. We do not claim any right to interfere with the soap-boiler. If we choose to buy him up that is our own matter, but we cannot interfere with his business so long as it is not injurious to health. I will give another case in which this clause would work most inconveniently. A manufacturer has to have his boilers scaled every three months, and unless he is to throw his employés out of work for a day or two, he has to turn the hot water direct into the drains. I contend that the alteration I suggest, which would provide that the nuisance must be injurious to health, would cover all these difficulties. There have been three Bills passed which practically cover this point. There is the Stockton Act, the Scarborough Act, and the Dublin Act. I want to know why the people of London should not be treated in the same way as the people of Dublin in this matter, and only be made liable for nuisances injurious to health. It must be remembered that the general public are not in a position to know when these special provisions are inserted in Local Bills. The question is, is anyone to come under this penal clause simply because he causes a nuisance, although it may not be injurious to health? Of course, if the House does not choose to interfere, it is not for me to continue the discussion; but I do think this is a matter deserving attention, and I, therefore, beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Clause 16."—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 16 stand part of the Bill."

*(4.37.) MR. F. S. POWELL: The hon. Member is entirely inaccurate in his reading of the Bill. The words of the Dublin Bill appear in this Bill, and are found in the Public Health Act.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 26.

*(4.38.) MR. KELLY: In connection with this clause I wish to draw attention to a point arising under the Scarborough Act. It may surprise hon. Members to hear that Scarborough is filled with courts which are not swept or kept clean. This clause provides that in such cases the Urban Authority shall cause the courts to be swept and kept clean, and shall apportion the expense between the occupiers of the buildings situated in the courts or at the back of which the passage leads in such share as may be determined by the Surveyor of the Urban Authority, or in case of dispute by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and such appointment may be recovered summarily from the occupier. But is this the sort of clause which Local Bodies should be asked to adopt? Surely it is hard on the unhappy occupier, who has no control over the court or passage, to render him liable to be dragged before a Magistrate for his portion of his trifling expense—amounting, in all probability, to a few pence—of sweeping out a court in which he may be living only quite temporarily. I beg to move the omission of the clause.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Clause 26."—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 26 stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 42.

MR. KELLY: Under the Public Health Act of 1875 it is not in the power of any Local Authority to take over any private road until it has been channelled, sewered, paved, flagged, lighted, &c. It is incumbent on the Local Authorities to see that every one of these things is done before the road is declared to be repairable by the inhabitants at large. Now, the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, said, in a case which came before him, that it was important to bear in mind that the expense of future repairs to a road would be much greater if it were not properly made in the first place, and that the interest of the public ought not to be sacrificed to those of the speculative builder or owner of land. With that I think we shall all agree. But, unfortunately, there are cases in which Local Bodies are swayed by questionable motives in taking over roads, and surely there should be some power to say that the works required to be carried out under Section 152 of the Public Health Act of 1875, should be properly done before the liability is thrown on the ratepayers of repairing these roads. I think the House should be careful not to make any alteration in the law which is calculated to throw further burdens on the ratepayers. I beg to move the omission of this clause.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Clause 42."—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 42 stand part of the Bill."

MR. F. S. POWELL: I think it would be extremely unjust to the whole community if this clause were omitted, as great inconvenience arises from want of the power which it would confer.

(4.49.) MR. M'LAREN: It seems to me that instead of omitting the entire clause we ought to omit the words on page 17, line 40, "or any of them." That would then make it incumbent upon an owner to do all these works, and it would enable the Local Authority to take over a road in a complete state. It is not, I venture to think, the cost of repairing roads which has to be considered. It is the cost of making them. When a builder has laid out a piece of land for building purposes he is bound, under the existing law, to make a complete road. It is desirable in the interests of the ratepayers that this should be done; but if the clause is passed in its present form a Local Authority will be able to take over a new street or road, which is not lighted, or channelled, or paved. They will be able to take it over if only one of these things is done. It seems to me that we should lay down the principle that when an owner of land makes a new road he should properly complete it before the Local Authority can take it over. The remainder of the clause is right enough. I beg to move the omission of the words in page 17, line 40, "or any of them."

(4.51.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order! The Question has already been put, "That this Clause stand part of the Bill." It is not competent, therefore, for the hon. Member to move this Amendment.

(4.52.) MR. RITCHIE: No doubt there ought to be severe obligations entailed in the taking over of private roads. But this clause practically leaves the matter in the hands of Local Authorities, and if they think the cases are such as to require that the whole of these things shall be done they can insist on it, or they may limit themselves to certain of them. It is a matter which rests entirely with them whether or not they will take over the road. In a Bill which has already passed, the House has practically assented to these very words.

Question put, and agreed to.

(4.55.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I beg to move the insertion in this Bill of the provision that Sections 171 and 172 of the Public Health Act shall be hereby re-enacted. The object of putting that in will be to give additional powers to the Rural Sanitary Authorities. These clauses give power to regulate the charges for the hiring of carriages and boats. Of course, Urban Authorities already possess the powers to make bye-laws, but Rural Sanitary Authorities have them not. I have a particular case in my mind, which illustrates the necessity for this clause. Thousands of visitors every summer pour into the Menai Bridge Station. If they turn to the right they enter the precincts of the city of Bangor, and should they hire a carriage or a boat there is a defined tariff, so that the carriages or the boat may not be overloaded. But if they turn to the left they are outside the limits of the city, and they may be swindled right and left to any extent by the driver. The boatman may be a person incapable of managing a boat. The carriages may be overloaded, and the people may be charged more than a reasonable price. Well, if the words I suggest are inserted powers will be given to Rural, as well as to Urban Sanitary Authorities, to make these bye laws. I hope the House will admit that this is a reasonable proposition. I can see no reason why this power should not be given to Rural Sanitary Authorities, and, therefore, I move that these words be re-enacted in this Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, after Clause 42, to insert the following clause:—

"Clauses one hundred and seventy-one and one hundred and seventy-two of 'The Public Health Act, 1875,' are hereby re-enacted."—(Captain Verney.)

Question proposed, "That this clause be read a second time."

*(458.) MR. RITCHIE: I think the Amendment is altogether unnecessary, because any Rural Authority may get permission, on application, to exercise these powers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(459.) MR. RITCHIE: I wish to express my obligations to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and to the hon. Member for Wigan for the assistance they have given in the passing of this most valuable measure. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and the Member for Wigan had Bills on the subject, and they most readily accepted the suggestion that all three Bills should be referred to a Select Committee. The result has been in every way satisfactory, and very important improvements have been made in the law in regard to these matters.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

TREES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 70.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, after the word "planted," to insert the words "and registered."—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and registered' be there inserted."

(5.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think this is altogether needless. Naturally the Government will take the side of the landlords on this question. Ireland stands badly in need of trees, but the only way of encouraging the planting of them is by the simplification of the procedure under this Act.

*(5.6.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am in entire sympathy with the Bill so far as it encourages the planting of trees, and with that view I desire to facilitate the passing of the Bill. I think that the provisions of the law as to registration ought to be embodied in this Bill, but I believe them to be capable of improvement, and if the Amendment is accepted I will submit a simpler and more workable scheme early in the course of next Session.

(5.8.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think that that is a reasonable suggestion, and I trust that it will be acted upon.

(5.9.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: I think it would be most unreasonable for the Government to call on the tenant to register every tree he plants. If they intend to bring in a Bill next Session dealing with this matter, surely it is scarcely worth while to pass this Bill in its present unsatisfactory form. The hon. Member for Cork who is in charge of this Bill, has over and over again objected to this proposal.

(5.12.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 140.—(Div. List, No. 182.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 20, at end of Clause, to add the words "Provided always, that the provisions as regards the registration of trees contained in the statute passed in the session of the Parliament of Ireland of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth year of the reign of His late Majesty King George the Third, chapter thirty-nine, shall apply to all such trees, woods, fruit trees, and osiers, and that no such tenant shall be entitled to claim or exercise any such right or privilege as aforesaid, unless in reference to such trees, woods, fruit trees, or osiers, as shall have been registered within the time and in the manner mentioned in the said statute."—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(5.25.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): It appears to me that it would be a great hardship if the tenants should be deprived of their property in the trees they plant merely because of the statute referred to. Had they been aware of the statute they would most likely have taken means to secure their rights, but there is no doubt that they have created the property, and they ought not to be deprived of it.

*MR. MADDEN: I will briefly state the reason why we think that this registration should be insisted upon. The main object is to afford some evidence that the trees claimed by the tenant as his property were planted by him. A Bill was introduced in 1888 by the hon. and gallant Member for one of the Divisions of Galway, which I supported, extending the provisions of the former Acts, subject to this requirement as to registration, in order to secure that by some means or other the tenants should record the fact of their having planted trees. The hon. Gentleman is in error in supposing that if this Bill does not pass the tenant may avail himself of the provisions of the older Acts, which apply only to tenants who hold under certain classes of leases. As the hon. Gentleman was not in the House when I answered a question put to me, I will repeat what I said. I said that although I could not agree to exclude from this Bill provisions for registration which are contained in all the Irish Timber Acts, still I quite admitted that the existing provisions of the old Act were obsolete and cumbrous, and I stated to the hon. and learned Gentleman that next Session I proposed to bring in a Bill to simplify the mode of preserving evidence of the fact that the tenant had planted the trees in respect of which he claimed.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not think the Bill will be of very much use if this Amendment is passed. This Registration Act will be passed within a year of planting the trees, and some farmers or capitalists will plant trees as a speculation. No ordinary tenant will get any benefit. What I think you should do, is to give the tenants two or three years in which to register. The great majority of cases are not touched by the remarks of the Attorney General.

It being half after Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

Clause 1.

(5.31.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I am sorry to disoblige the hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill, but as Gentlemen opposite will let no Irish Bills through, I cannot let them get any English Bill through. I beg to move that Progress be reported.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): The Amendments on the Paper are all accepted, and I would appeal to the hon. Member not to oppose the Bill.

(5.32.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I can assure the hon. Member that there is not a Tory on that side of the House who would be more sorry to disoblige him than I am, but as it is impossible for us to get any legislation through, we must make it impossible for Gentlemen opposite to get any through.

MIDWIVES' REGISTRATION BILL.

The Select Committee on Midwives' Registration Bill was nominated of,—Dr. Farquharson, Dr. Fitzgerald, Sir Frederick FitzWygram, Sir William Foster, Mr. Howorth, Mr. John Kelly, Sir Roper Lethbridge, Mr. James William Lowther, Mr. Maclure, Mr. Fell Pease, and Mr. Rathbone.

Ordered, that three be the quorum,—(Dr. Farquharson).

POST OFFICE SERVANTS.

On Motion for Adjournment:—

(5.40.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman who represents the Government a question which I should have desired to put to the Postmaster General had he been in his place. I want to place before the House the fact that the difficulty at the General Post Office has reached a very critical point at the present moment. The difficulty has arisen in this way. I put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General on Monday night, and pointed out that the men were willing and anxious to avoid any friction, and that they had accordingly accepted the proposal put forward by Mr. Shipton on behalf of the Trades' Union Council, and passed a resolution that no attempt to strike should be made until a report of the result of the intervention had been received by them, provided that no supernumerary labour was introduced to supplant the men during, what I may call, the truce. I had hoped that that representation might have stayed the hand of the Postmaster General, but it may be recollected that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) met my remarks in an exceedingly hostile manner, and intimated —what was certainly not the case—that the men were backing down and giving in to whatever he might demand of them. Practically he threatened that he would continue to import what are technically known as—I do not use the word offensively—blacklegs. Yesterday these supernumerary hands were put on, and the consequence is that there have been today, at the different post offices, conflicts, not of a serious character, I suppose in consequence of the men naturally refusing to work with those whom they regarded as blacklegs. In the course of the day the Postmaster General, or his subordinates, have insisted on the men signing a declaration to the effect that they will agree not to strike before the 21st of July. The first form of the declaration was that they should not strike at all. I believe that Sir A. Stephenson Blackwood has this afternoon given way to the extent I have stated, and the declaration now asked for is that the men shall not strike before the 21st of July—that is to say, during the time of the intervention agreed upon on Monday night last. It is perfectly obvious that if the men were compelled to sign a declaration of that kind the Postmaster General would be free, during the 12 days, to draft in the blacklegs and to teach them the business. The men ask merely for a recognition of their rights of combination, and for a re-instatement of the men who have been suspended or dismissed because they have stood up for their rights. If the Postmaster General, or his subordinates, insist on the men signing this declaration, or on calling in the police or military, if necessary, for the purpose of turning them out of the Post Office, I need hardly point out the exceedingly grave difficulties that must result. I do ask the right hon. Gentleman not to proceed with these extreme measures. The men are perfectly willing to sign the declaration which I have read, not to strike before the 21st of July, provided that the authorities on their part undertake not to introduce any additional labour during that time, and that the additional labour now employed be got rid of. The men are most anxious not to dislocate the Public Service, and if the Postmaster General deliberately employs blacklegs for the purpose of supplanting them, it is an intolerable state of things, and one which, I think, this House ought to take into consideration. It is too late to put a question down on the Paper for to-morrow with regard to the particular points I am raising, and I regret very much that the Postmaster General is not present. If he had been in his place I should have asked him how many men have been suspended in the East Central District; how many in the West Central District; and how many in the Mount Pleasant District; how many supernumerary men have been introduced at each station; and whether it is not the fact that the new men introduced have been in excess of those suspended or dismissed. I, this afternoon, asked permission to go into the Post Office to examine the working of the station, but permission was refused by Sir A. Blackwood. I do not say he was not justified in his refusal; but, in view of the discussions which must arise on the Post Office Vote, I think it would be only right that Members of Parliament should have access to the Post Office. I shall certainly press the right, if I am again refused, to see something of the inner working of the Post Office between now and the time the Post Office Vote comes on for discussion.

(5.48.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I think we have some cause to complain—with all respect to the Secretary to the Treasury, who seems to think it a joke that an inquiry should be made at this period into the state of the Postal Department—that the Postmaster General is not in his place, because he must have expected that some questions would be asked on so important a subject. I have this afternoon received telegrams from commercial men in my constituency, to the effect that they have already been inconvenienced by the state of things at the Post Office, and I wish to know if the Postmaster General is going to take steps to secure the proper carrying out of the Postal Service. I want to know if he intends to persevere in a policy which will dislocate the Postal Service, or adopt one that will conciliate the postmen, and enable work to be carried on in the regular way. The whole of the Metropolis is in a state of excitement on this question, and we have a right to know something definite as to whether we can expect the work of the Post Office to go on peacefully and properly. I am not going into the details of the case, which have been dealt with by the hon. Member for the Camberne Division. The whole thing will have to be threshed out when we get a chance of dealing with the Post Office Vote. But, in the interest of the general community, I wish to know whether we can depend upon such action being taken by the head of the Post Office as will ensure that the Department will not be disorganised by his conduct. Can the commercial and trading classes rely upon receiving their communications in the way they received them before this crisis came upon us?

(5.50.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am sorry that the hon. Member should have thought I am inclined to treat this matter as a joke. Nothing is further from my desire. But I would say I think that if anybody has reason to complain it is the Postmaster General. For my own part, I know nothing of the circumstances, but I apprehend that no notice was given to the right hon. Gentleman that questions were going to be asked. I venture to say that it is a little inconvenient that statements of this kind should be made in the absence of the Minister responsible for the Department. I am sure that, if notice had been given, my right hon. Friend would have been perfectly willing to answer the questions put. I myself, of course, am unable to do so.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a, and to be printed.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS BILL.

A Bill for the promotion of physical education in elementary schools—Was presented by the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath); read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 190.)

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (PREVENTION) BILL.—(No. 117.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment), according to order.

Clause 23.

LORD LAMINGTON: There is an Amendment on page 8, after line 35, to insert—

“The reference in this Act to Section 120 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is to be taken to be a reference to the Public Health (Ireland) Act of 1878.”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Should it not be “reference also”? Otherwise you exclude the English Act. If you make it a reference only to the Irish Act will not that exclude the English Act?

LORD LAMINGTON: I understand it takes them both together.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: What I mean is this. Certain provisions are made as to Section 120 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the object of the noble Lord is to apply them also to the Irish Act; but the words he proposes would, in point of fact, limit the reference to that Act. If it is a reference only to the Irish Act, it will not effect its object as regards the English Statute.

LORD LAMINGTON: If it is a question of words that can be done on the Third Reading. I look upon the Amendment as consequential upon the Amendment made by the Standing Committee in Clause 5.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not think the noble Lord quite sees what I mean. Clause 5 says that Section 120 of the Public Health Act, 1875, shall be repealed for certain purposes. This Amendment proposes that the reference to Section 120 of the Public Health Act shall be taken to be a reference to an Irish Act; it follows, therefore, if it is a reference only to the Irish Act, you will not repeal Section 120 in the English Act. Of course, what the noble Lord means is, that the reference to the clause shall include the English Act as well as the Irish Act. Perhaps the noble Lord will consider that point by the next stage.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received to morrow.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (PROCEDURE) BILL.—(No. 170.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, this is a Bill which has received the assent of the other House, and its object is to make some Amendments in the proceedings of our Courts of Justice, which have been suggested by the experience gained since the Judicature Act came into operation. I need only detain your Lordships for a minute or two in explaining the changes which it is proposed to make. The main charge is this. At the present time, if a case is tried by a Judge without a Jury, all questions of law go at once direct to the Court of Appeal, and are determined there. If the case is tried by a Judge with a Jury, then any question as to the law, as laid down by the Judge at the trial, or the finding of the Jury, goes to a Divisional Court, generally consisting of two Judges, with an appeal from their decision to the Court of Appeal. I need hardly point out that a double appeal of that description, in the cases in which it takes place, causes very considerable expense to the parties, in addition to some amount of delay. The proposal made by this Bill is that, in future, all applications for a new trial, in cases tried by a Judge with a Jury, shall go direct to the Court of Appeal, instead of only going to the Court of Appeal after passing through the Divisional Court. I think there can be only one possible objection of substance to such a proposal, and that would be that the Court of Appeal would be too much occupied with its existing work to be able to attend in due time to the additional work imposed upon it by this Bill. But I may tell your Lordships that, happily, the Court of Appeal has of late got so well forward with its work that it has been able at times to assist the Courts of the Queen's Bench Division in the disposal of the cases that come before them. I think experience has shown that the additional work that will be cast upon the Court of Appeal by this Bill is not such as they will not be able satisfactorily to deal with. The only other matter with which I need trouble your Lordships is a proposal to enable certain cases which hitherto could only be heard by two Judges forming a Divisional Court to be heard by one Judge. There will, of course, still be an appeal to the Court of Appeal; but there does not seem to be any reason why certain cases should be heard only by two Judges which can be equally well heard by one. There are other matters dealt with in the Bill, but, as they are only matters of detail, I need not detain your Lordships further with them now.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Herschell.)

LORD ESHER: My Lords, the Court of Appeal finds itself in the usual happy position of people who work hard. The Court of Appeal has worked extremely hard, and reduced the arrears before it, and the result is that they are asked immediately to take a great deal more work. I shall not object to the Second Reading of this Bill, as far as the first clause is concerned, which will send the new trials, of which my noble and learned Friend has spoken, directly to the Court of Appeal. As to the other parts of the Bill, I have a strong objection to them, for I cannot agree to the statement that it would be advisable that special cases which are intended to be taken before a single Judge by the Bill should be so taken. But that is a matter which may be discussed in Committee. I am sorry this Bill is pressed, for a particular reason. I think it is very much as if you were to put a patch on one corner of a large counterpane. This Bill will not satisfy anybody. There are discussions and complaints about the administration of the law in a dozen other points, even much more important than this. But I do not think this is an occasion upon which it would be advisable for me to make a speech with regard to law, for I suspect if I did it would not be very agreeable to the House in its present position, therefore I propose not to talk any more law to-night; but, if I may be permitted, I will give notice that I shall, on this day week, call your Lordships' attention to alleged defects in the administration of the law, and ask Her Majesty's Government whether, after hearing that statement, they will not grant a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiring into those defects, so that with regard to such of them as shall be found really to exist, the Commission may propose remedies, with the object of bringing forward immediate legislation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I heartily concur with the proposal of my noble and learned Friend who has moved the Second Reading of the Bill. There is no sense or reason in preventing a case from going direct to the Court of Appeal after being tried by a Judge and Jury, and thus causing additional expense. It seems to me very reasonable that it should go immediately to the Court of Appeal, and that it should be there decided whether there should be a new trial or not. With regard to the other points of the Bill, I am not quite sure that I approve of them.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 151.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order.)

Clause 5.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: This clause gives power to the County Council, or any Committee appointed under this Act, to make use of any public elementary schoolroom, that is to say, where the school is receiving a grant for the purpose of elementary education. The purposes described are three-fold: one is for the purpose of an inquiry under this Act; and another is for the purposes of this Act by the County Council or any Committee appointed under this Act. Those are two of the purposes for which the schoolrooms may be compulsorily used; and if the clause had rested there I do not think I should have troubled your Lordships with any Amendment. But the clause goes further, and says that the schoolroom may be used for the purpose of holding public meetings to discuss any question relating to the subject of Allotments under this Act or the principal Act. That is a wholly novel use to which our schoolrooms are to be applied, and I think your Lordships should consider well whether you will give the powers asked for. I should explain that my Amendment ought to come, not in line 31, but in line 32. I do not propose to interfere in any way with the use of the schoolrooms for the purposes of this Act, either by the County Council or by the Committee, but when you go further than that and say that they are to be used for the purpose of public meetings being called by persons who are in no degree responsible, I think the power should not be given. It does not say who the meetings are to be convened by, or under what limitations the schoolrooms are to be used, and I think your Lordships will see you would be making a grave innovation on the rights of property. These schools may be assisted with public money, but many of them have been built under trust deeds for the purpose of education, and they are limited in that way in regard to the purposes for which they may be used. There are, of course, discretionary powers for the purpose of enlarging the use of those schoolrooms by particular persons and under proper safeguards. Those safeguards are wholly wanting in the clause. Therefore, I propose that the consent of the freeholder should be required when the schoolroom is used not under the authority previously mentioned, but by irresponsible persons for public meetings. It is a notorious fact that many schoolrooms which receive grants of public money for the purpose of elementary education are still the property of private persons, and I do not see why, where benevolent persons have built schoolrooms, free of any charge upon them by way of rent, for certain definite purposes, they are to find those purposes suddenly enlarged, and the buildings which were intended for the purpose of education, should be applied to purposes wholly dissimilar, without any consent of theirs, and without any proper limitations or safeguards. Therefore, I move that in line 32, after "Act or," these words should be inserted "with the consent of the freeholder." That will ensure that proper care will be taken in so using the schools, because the freeholder will, of course, not give his consent unless he feels satisfied that the persons holding the meeting are responsible persons. Therefore, I hope your Lordships will assent to the addition of those words, which will ensure proper care and afford a safeguard that our schools shall not be left, without any control or limitation, in the hands of irresponsible persons. The words, if inserted there, will not interfere in any way with the legitimate operation of the Act; they will only tend to prevent the holding of possibly disorderly meetings.

Amendment moved, in line 32, to insert after the word "or," the words "with the consent of the freeholder."—
(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of Jersey): I am afraid I cannot accept the Amendment of the noble Lord, though certainly the altered position in which he proposes now that it should be placed in the Bill would somewhat limit its application. I am afraid that if the consent of the freeholder had to be obtained, it would, in some cases, defeat the intention of this clause. The object of this clause is to enable the people in the locality to hold meetings in village schoolrooms in reference to allotments. Now, the freeholders may be represented in various ways; they may be represented sometimes by the School Board, sometimes by Trustees. In rural places, the School Boards seldom meet more than once a month; and Trustees may be scattered all over the country, so that there would be great difficulty in obtaining their consent. However, as, on the Report, I propose to add some words with reference to the meetings to be held, perhaps it may meet the convenience of the noble Lord to postpone the consideration of this proposal until the Report.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: As I understand, from what the noble Lord has said, that he looks with considerable satisfaction upon the proposed alteration, I will not trouble your Lordships with it further on this occasion, but raise it on a later stage.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn; Bill reported without amendment.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL.—(No. 155.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I need not detain your Lordships very long in respect of this Bill, which will rather, I think, depend upon consideration in Committee than upon its principle. My noble Friend opposite, Lord Granville, introduced to me early this year a deputation upon this subject which followed upon a Royal Commission which went carefully into this subject, both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and had also, in fact, studied its position in foreign countries. Their recommendations were, in fact, that blind and deaf children should be placed in the same category as children possessing ordinary faculties; that is to say, that they should be liable to come under the Elementary Education Act, and subject to the same law as to education as other children in the country. At the same time, it was found that the expense necessary for the education of the blind and deaf is necessarily on a very different scale to that which is necessary in the case of ordinary children. Therefore there has been some difficulty in England in endeavouring to frame a measure to deal with that point; and, in reference to calling upon the School Boards or County Councils, or the School Authorities in connection with the County Councils, to find funds for the proper education of those children, I need not say, my Lords, how important it is that these poor children should be educated. There are now a great number of blind who are perfectly unable to support themselves in any way; there are, I think, some 4,000 or 5,000 who have no means of support of any kind. It is, therefore, an important question whether it is not better for the State to do something for them in the way of education, in order to enable them to use the other faculties they possess, which they are often well able to use in spite of their deprivation of sight, hearing, or speech. We have seen how many have been able to move than overcome their disabilities, like the late Postmaster General, Mr. Fawcett. We can, therefore, see how important it is that they should have a thorough education. With regard to deaf mutes, many of them having no organic defect but deafness, possessing even the means of speech, only that they hear no sound, and, therefore, are of themselves unable to speak on that account, or utter intelligible sounds, it is almost necessary that they should be educated in separate institutions. With regard to the blind, it is not always the case, but in their case, also, it is necessary that they should have a special education. This Bill will give power to send them to institutions for that purpose. I have received very few communications with regard to the Bill, and very few Amendments. But there is one point which I think is very reasonable, that is, that in the case of parents who would, if they could, use the ordinary elementary schools they should not be called upon to pay a higher fee for the education of these afflicted children than in the case of ordinary children. The necessity of spreading the expenditure, by not confining it in narrow limits or in particular localities, would, I think, become evident to your Lordships if you were to look into the question and see how unfortunately, by the intermarrying of people of this class, there is a perpetuation of deaf-mutism, and sometimes even of blindness, in the most remarkable manner, and, therefore, the burden would fall with exceeding heaviness in some places when there were many afflicted. To give your Lordships an instance. I received a card the other day giving particulars of a case where two deaf-mutes had married, and had produced five deaf-mute children, who would, of course, require to be educated in some institution. That is a lamentable state of things, but possibly there may be means by oral instruction of bringing a readier communication between the deaf and hearing people. Making provision for educating them in this way will, we may hope, lead to that result, so that marriages shall not so frequently take place as they now do between deaf-mutes. We cannot, of course, interfere in that matter by this Bill, but by means of education we may hope that something will be done in that respect. I am sure your Lordships will feel that these unfortunate children have some claim upon us, and that they need provision for their education quite as much as other children in the country. Those of your Lordships who have looked into the matter, will, I am sure, approve of the measure, and I think I shall meet the wishes of the House on the present occasion by not offering further remarks upon it. I know I have the approval of my noble Friend opposite, and I now leave the matter in your Lordships' hands.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord President of the Council.)

EARL GRANVILLE: As the noble Viscount has referred to me, I am anxious to state that the Bill, the objects of which he has so clearly described, will have my warm support. There are two or three Amendments of mine, one of which he has already mentioned, which I had thought of bringing forward on the Second Reading, but as there is other business of importance before your Lordships, I had better reserve them for Committee. In the meantime, no doubt, the noble Viscount will permit me to communicate with him on the matter.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT BILL.

(No. 180.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I rise to move the Second Reading of a Bill for the purpose of confirming a portion of the Agreement which was signed at Berlin on Tuesday week—that portion of it which provides for the cession of the Island of Heligoland to the German Empire, and, as the Bill is exclusively concerned with that island, I will make some remarks with reference to it; but I hope your Lordships will not consider me out of order if I go afterwards for a few moments into the general provisions of the Agreement in regard to other places than Heligoland. Perhaps, in strict order, I ought not to do so, but in this House we are indulgent in that respect. The island of Heligoland, as your Lordships are aware, is about three-quarters of a mile in extent, in the bay formed by Germany and the peninsula which ends in Denmark. It was taken in the year 1807, at a time when we were at war with Denmark, to whom it then belonged. Denmark was then the owner of the Frisian territory of Schleswig, to which this island naturally and by population belonged. It was of value to us in that great war for a reason that would not occur at first sight. The year when it was taken was the year following the issue of the Berlin Decrees by Napoleon, of which the aim was to ruin England by the exclusion of her manufactures and commodities from the Continental markets. It was natural that this strange and unprecedented policy should be met by efforts to break through the line which he had set up, and Napoleon's policy was, to a great extent, fought by the smuggler. Heligoland was of great use, lying within 20 miles of the nearest German coast. It was of great use as a store for goods afterwards to be in that manner introduced into the Continental markets in spite of Napoleon's Decrees. Towards the end of the war, but before it had concluded, and while Napoleon was still fighting gallantly in the Eastern Provinces of France, in January, 1814, a Treaty was concluded at Kiel, of which the main object was to provide that Norway, which had previously belonged to Denmark, should thenceforth belong to Sweden. In that great contest Denmark had the misfortune to take the wrong side, and Sweden had the good fortune to take the right side, and the transfer of Norway from Denmark to Sweden was the expression of that fact. Heligoland, which also had been taken from Denmark, was by the same Instrument transferred to the British Crown. I do not think there were any further stipulations with respect to it. It remained part of the territory of this country by virtue of the Treaty of Kiel. No doubt the motive for retaining it was partly the natural wish to retain territory, and partly that, as our contest was not then concluded, the value of the island was still considerable. It was held as a military post for some years. Up to the year 1821 there was a military establishment in the island; but in that year—not a year when peace theories were in vogue, but when the military spirit was very strong in this country—it was determined to withdraw the military establishment, and since that time the island has remained unoccupied by any considerable force, unfortified and practically unarmed. It has remained entirely undefended, and I believe there has been no attempt to defend it. Certainly there has been no indication of any intention on the part of Parliament or the Executive Government of the country to undertake the arming or defending of it; and I believe there is no doubt that the recommendation of the Colonial Defence Commission was expressed strongly against any such course. In truth, the value of the island is generally recognised for any strategic purposes as very small. It has no harbour. It has an open roadstead, which is untenable in a north-west wind, which is the prevailing wind. The commercial value of the island, again, as far as this country is concerned, may be expressed by very minute figures. I believe the import of British goods into the island in the course of the year amounts to £50 in value, or not quite that. The population are, as I have said, Frisian. They speak Low German, the language of the coast opposite. I believe there are only 5 per cent. that are not of that nationality, and they have not materially altered—they have increased in numbers, not much during the intervening period. Now, the point that we have to consider on the present occasion is, Is this island of any strategic value to this country? I have shown that commercial value, from the want of a harbour and for want of a market, it has none. Has it any strategic value? In time of peace, of course, the question of strategic value does not come up, but it may just be mentioned that even in time of peace it is apt to be a slightly inconvenient possession, because I think it was found during the late Franco-German War that its proximity to the German coast was sufficient to invite attempted breaches of neutrality, which are very convenient to belligerents, but which we know to our cost are apt to be exceedingly onerous to neutrals. But I will not dwell upon a consideration of that kind, which is not of paramount importance; I will ask, what would be the value of the island to us strategically in case of war? There are two cases—one a great deal more probable than the other, or rather less improbable than the other. One is the case of our being at war with Germany. Well, as I have said, the island is entirely unfortified. It lies within a few hours' steam of the great arsenal of Germany. If I am to suppose what I imagine is so utterly improbable a case as a war with Germany, I presume that if this island remained in our possession, the very day of the declaration of war a sufficient force, with all necessary materials and guns, would be despatched to it, and would arrive at the island probably considerably before any relieving fleet could arrive from our side. Experts differ a good deal as to its value in the case of war with Germany. Some think it of no value at all, while others think that it might be useful as a coal depôt to a blockading fleet; but a coal depôt, when England is so near, though it may be a convenience, can hardly be called a great advantage. The case, therefore, in respect to a war with Germany would be that it would expose us to a blow which would be a considerable humiliation, and it would not confer upon us any great advantage, if any advantage, in the conduct of the war on our side. But let us take the much less improbable supposition of our being at war with somebody else. This island is undefended, and can be defended only by a sufficient Naval force. If we were at war with any other Power it would be, therefore, necessary for us to lock up a Naval force for the purpose of defending this island, unless we intended to expose ourselves to the humiliation of having it taken. My Lords, our fleet is a large one, and I am happy to say it has recently been augmented, but it is none too large for the work it has to do, with our extensive and extending Empire, stretching into every corner of the globe, and meeting with new rivalries at every turn. I think all who have studied the subject will say that in defending our dependencies, and in defending our line of trade, our fleet, great and powerful as it is, would be taxed up to its fullest energies. I think we should labour under a distinct disadvantage if we have a position contributing in no degree to the defence of the Empire without commercial or other value, and which yet, in order to avoid a humiliating blow, would require a certain Naval force to be locked up and kept useless for every other purpose. On these grounds, my Lords, we have come to a conclusion, which I imagine is the conclusion held by many persons, and has been held for a long time, that this island, unfortified and undefended, is not an advantageous possession, but that it is one which for a proper consideration it would be well for the Empire to be divested. But the consideration has been raised by noble Lords opposite and others who deal with the question from a different point of view. It is said that the inhabitants of the island are opposed to the cession, and that their veto ought to be conclusive. My Lords, I do not think that the inhabitants of the island are opposed to the cession. There is no reason that they should be. They have not a long descended ancestral connection with the British Crown. There may be men there, living now, who were alive when the island was originally taken. They are related by the closest bonds of language, of race, of religion, with those who live almost within site of their shores. Their pecuniary interests, to come down to motives which are less noble to dwell upon, though they are often powerful in these cases—their pecuniary profit in no way is increased by the connexion of the island with this country, nor can they look with any advantage to the continuance of that connexion. On the contrary, their whole prospect of gain depends on the large number of German bathing excursionists who go there in the summer, and that source of wealth would not diminish, but would, if anything, increase, if the island formed part of the German Empire. And it is probable, though the island is worthless to us from a strategic point of view, it will not be thought to be worthless to those near whose coasts it lies, and the military expenditure which would be the result of any determination to fortify it will form a large addition to the resources of the islanders, and I have no doubt has already been discounted by them. I am informed, and your Lordships, I think, have been generally informed, that a very enterprising nationality have already purchased up most of the land in the island. But while I say this, I cannot admit the doctrine that the decision of a population of a position that has been occupied for military and belligerent purposes is conclusive with respect to the uses to which that position should be put or the destiny which shall attend it. You must draw a line between two sorts of possessions—those possessions which you rule for the benefit of the population that is in them, and those possessions which you hold in order to contribute to the defence of the Empire as a whole; and that latter class of positions, of which we have several, cannot complain of any injustice if it is said that Imperial considerations must occupy a place of paramount importance in the mind of the Government of this country with respect to them, just as local considerations would occupy a place of paramount importance with respect to positions of another kind. My Lords, cession is a very uncommon event, and it is not very likely to be repeated; but this doctrine, which has been rather insinuated on the present occasion, may stretch much further than cession. A hint was given that we ought to have taken the opinion of the people in some form or other, and we could only take it by way of plebiscite. Well, if people are asked to vote by plebiscite on a question of Imperial policy like this, they may also claim to vote on the question whether their country shall not be ceded; if their opinion is to weigh so heavily on the question whether they are to be ceded, it ought to weigh equally heavily in the other direction. But there is another case—a case which might become practical and important, having nothing to do with cessions—I mean the case where it is necessary to get rid of, or to induce the inhabitants to depart when the danger of war is imminent, and the possibility of actual siege arrives. My Lords, most of you who have paid any attention to these subjects know that a problem of a very serious kind attaches to one of our most important positions in that respect, and you would be very unwise to admit that posts which are occupied, or have been occupied, for belligerent purposes, Imperial purposes—that the paramount disposition of them can be affected because the population which has grown up upon the position has interests in a different direction. My Lords, I said we have come to the conclusion that this island is one which it would be not only no disadvantage, but an advantage to this country to transfer, if we could obtain for it a satisfactory consideration. The consideration for which we look lies on the East Coast of Africa. There we have obtained, as will have been seen from the Treaty which has been laid on the Table, an undertaking from Germany that she will not oppose our assumption of the protectorate of Zanzibar, and likewise a similar engagement with respect to the Sultanate of Witu, and the long line of coast dependent on Witu to the north. The objects of these stipulations are, of course, to make our influence predominant in these countries. With Witu we have had no ancient connection, but it has become a position of considerable value in consequence of the large tract of country which has been acquired by the British East Africa Company, reaching up from the coast to the Victoria Nyanza Lake. As long as the Sultanate of Witu was in the hands of another Power, there was a possibility of annexations and expeditions to the north of us, which would have cut off British influence and British dominion from the sources of the Nile, from the Lake Albert Nyanza and the valley which lies at the base of the mountains of Abyssinia. The advantage of the acquisition of Witu is that it cuts off any rivalry in this respect, and that, save for the Italian dominion over Abyssinia and its dependencies, we have no rivalry to fear from any European civilised Power until we reach the confines of Egypt. I do not, by any means, say that is an advantage of which all the results will appear immediately, for, as we know, the valley of the Nile is occupied by another Power which is not European and which just at present is not very much inclined to make room for us. But the advantage of limiting our rivalry to an Asiatic or African tribe is one which those who are engaged in these enterprises appreciate very highly. But, in addition to this, we have obtained the promise that Germany will not resist our assumption of the protectorate of Zanzibar, including the Island of Pemba. Zanzibar has 300,000 of a population which has very close commercial connection with our fellow-subjects in India, and the more closely it is brought under our influence the more that commerce is likely to flourish. It lies in the pathway from the Red Sea to Southern Africa; it must always be a commercial place of the first importance; it maintains an enterprising population and has a fertile soil; and there is no spot in all those waters more valuable to a maritime and commercial nation than Zanzibar and Pemba. But it has also to us a very special interest—that, with the exception of what goes on in the Red Sea, I think all the living slave trade, all the slave trade which is now actually in operation, goes upon that sea and is fed by the Arab traders from Pemba and Zanzibar, and the closer our influence over the Government of the Sultan becomes, the more we may hope we shall succeed in that great effort for which this country has sacrificed so much—the effort to destroy the slave trade and gradually to extirpate domestic slavery. I believe that in that effort we shall have a thorough support from the present enlightened Sultan of Zanzibar. We have every ground to believe that he sympathises with us in this respect, and the relations in which we will now stand under the new arrangement to that ruler will very much facilitate our task. But what it is important your Lordships should observe is that the only impediment to our complete influence in Zanzibar was the counter influence of Germany. Germany had a power in the Court of Zanzibar owing to the settlements it occupied on the mainland and the rights it had acquired over the Zanzibar coast; and however friendly the relations of the two Governments have always been, it nevertheless must inevitably be the case where two nationalities are struggling for the mastery that the struggle is not entirely destitute of the elements either of irritation or of danger. It has been said that in taking back our influence at Zanzibar we have only undone what we ourselves had previously done—that we gave to Germany her power over Zanzibar and are taking it back again, and I think that in the observations of Lord Rosebery the other night there was a considerable trace of that impression. [The Earl of ROSEBERY: Hear, hear!] That is not the case. I think it is well that anybody, in considering the recent history of Africa, should take notice of the enormous change which has taken place in the attitude of this and other countries towards it during the last 10 years. Up to 10 years ago we remained masters of Africa practically, or the greater part of it, without being put to inconvenience by protectorates, or anything of that sort, by the simple fact that we were masters of the sea, and that we have had considerable experience in dealing with the native races. So much was that the case that we left enormous stretches of coast to the native rulers in the full confidence that they would go on under native rulers, and in the hope that they would gradually acquire their own proper civilisation without any interference on our part. Then suddenly we found out that that position, however convenient, had no foundation whatever in international law. We had no rights over all these vast stretches of coast both on the West and East Coast of Africa. We had no power of preventing any other nation from coming in and seizing a portion of them, and the noble Lord opposite, Lord Granville, was suddenly confronted with a demand on the part of Germany, first on one part of the African coast and then on another part of the African coast, to be allowed to occupy enormous stretches of territory which, up to that time, had been looked upon as practically under the protection of England. I do not mention this as complaining of the noble Lord for the decision he took. On the contrary, I think it was a necessary decision. It was impossible that England should have the right to lock up the whole of Africa, and say that nobody should be there except herself; and I think that the noble Lord opposite arrived at a correct solution of the difficulty when he frankly allowed that Germany as well as England should take part in the task of developing the vast untrodden fields of Africa, making them into new outlets for colonisation by the excessive population at home, and new fields of industry and trade. But I only demur to the statement made that I did it. It was entirely settled before we came into office. I may be allowed, as the noble Earl cheered what I said just now, to read a passage bearing on this point. On May 5, 1885, Count Münster makes this Report on the occasion of Count Bismarck's last visit to London. I am reading from a Parliamentary Paper—

“The English Government, on their part only expressed a wish that we should not call in question the sovereignty of the Sultan over the coast. They further admitted that there was no intention of opposing or running counter to our claims for colonisation in the interior opposite Zanzibar.”

That was what happened. A large portion of the interior opposite Zanzibar was occupied during the early part of that year. Then came the question of what the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar on the coast really were. There was considerable discussion upon this point, and it was resolved to appoint an International Commission, which should report what the Continental possessions of the Sultan of Zanzibar were. They went out, they examined, and they reported. On some things they were all agreed; on others they were disagreed; and the noble Earl Lord Rosebery was asked whether he would accept the decisions upon which they were all agreed. He declined to do that, but he said that he was very well disposed towards them. Lord Idlesleigh came into office in August of the same year, and in October of the same year he signed an Agreement practically confirming the unanimous decision of those Commissioners. Of course, I am not now speaking in respect of the line of influence as between Germany and England; I am speaking of the demarcation of the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and in respect to them I maintain, though I am not complaining of what was done, that we had no special responsibility. Now, my Lords, I have pointed out the advantages which I think will come from the closer bonds which, under the proposed arrangement, will bind the Sultan of Zanzibar and the Sultan of Witu to us and the coast that is dependent on them. But that is not the whole of the African question. It is not the part of it which first gave rise to these negotiations. I think our negotiations arose, in the first instance, from a number of disputed points, but really the matter which occupied the greatest attention, both in Germany and in England, was the decision as to which Power was to inherit the territory which lay inland—the territory South of Lake Tanganyika and the territory to the North of that Lake. I need not describe to you, because I have sufficiently described it in a Despatch which was laid on the Table, the decision to which we ultimately came. The German Government reposed themselves entirely on the doctrine that the interior of the country belonged to those who had the coast. We had, at all events, in regard to the country South of Lake Tanganyika, claims resting upon Livingstone's exploration, resting on the work of a large number of mission stations where our missionaries had worked devotedly for a great number of years, and resting also on the efforts and struggles of commercial companies who had done their best to develop trade and to keep the slave trade at bay in those regions. The result, as your Lordships know, is that Germany gave way to us on the South of Lake Tanganyika and we admitted her claims on the North of Lake Tanganyika. On the North of Lake Tanganyika we had nothing to advance in answer to the argument which she based on the possession of the coast. We had no settlements, no experience of missionaries, or of merchants, and, therefore, the argument advanced by Germany was not easy to be refuted, and we could not have resisted it without abandoning the Agreement altogether. I think there has been only one strong criticism adverse to that Agreement. It has arisen from a very curious idea, which has become very prevalent in this country, that there is some special advantage in having a stretch of territory extending all the way from Cape Town to the sources of the Nile. Now, this stretch of territory North of Lake Tanganyika could only have been a very narrow one. It could not have been obtained without absolutely breaking off the agreement altogether. Germany absolutely declined to be hemmed in by our territories to the sea, and insisted on communication at some point or other with the Congo State. But what possible advantage should we have derived from the possession of, or rather the claim of possession to, a narrow strip of territory stretching for a hundred miles from the North of Lake Tanganyika into the territory that is under British influence? It is said that it would have been the trade route. I cannot imagine any trade going in that direction. Trade seeks either for a navigable river or the sea; trade does not willingly go across a continent. If there was trade coming up from the Congo district, across to the north of Lake Tanganyika, it would make for the sea as rapidly as it could. But if you look beyond the merely commercial considerations to those which are of a strategic character, I can imagine no more uncomfortable position than the possession of a narrow strip of territory in the very heart of Africa three months' distance from the coast, which should be separating the forces of a powerful Empire like Germany and the Congo State, which is, at all events, in the hands of another European Power. Without any advantages of position we should have had all the dangers inseparable from its defence. We should have had merely those advantages of situation which may be supposed to belong to the function of a buffer. The only other objection to our arrangement in the interior of Africa is rather of a similar kind. Far away from the country of which I have been speaking, in the south-west, in the year 1885, I think it was, or 1884, Germany had taken possession of a vast territory called Namaqualand and Damaraland, of which the inner boundaries were only imperfectly determined. As far north, I think, as latitude 22°, they were determined, but north of that there was no fixed line. They claimed to go as far east as longitude 24°. In these matters we can only deal with latitude and longitude as indications of frontier. We have, in the course of the negotiations, induced them to accept longitude 21° instead of 24°, but it was accompanied by a condition to which a certain amount of exception has been taken, and that is, at the very north of this Damaraland territory they should have a strip of territory going along the Portuguese border, and giving them direct access to the River Zambesi. It was not an unnatural demand, but I never was able to understand what the objections were that have been raised on several sides. Again, we are told that it would interfere with the progress of trade; but it is the last route in the world by which trade can pass. It is at the head of the waters of all the affluents of the Chobe and the Zambesi, over an impracticable country, and leading only into the Portuguese possessions, into which, as far as I know, during the last 300 years there has been no very eager or impetuous torrent of trade. I think that the constant study of maps is apt to disturb men's reasoning powers. Certainly the enthusiasm which has been evoked for this desolate corner of Africa has surprised me more than anything else in this controversy. We have had a fierce conflict over the possession of a lake whose name I am afraid I cannot pronounce correctly—I think it is Lake Ngami—our only difficulty being that we do not know where it is. We cannot determine its position within 100 miles, certainly not within 60 miles, and there are great doubts whether it is a lake at all, or only a bed of rushes. I am very anxious that full scope should be given to the enterprise of men who have undertaken concessions in that country from a well-affected chief named Moremi; and I think that the whole country of Moremi has been retained within the British sphere. But when I hear the language that is used, the hopes that are entertained, and the extraordinary reasoning as to the future which is based upon them, I cannot help thinking of similar language and similar dreams entertained by our ancestors some 300 years ago connected with the well-known projects for reaching the land of El Dorado. I hope and believe that this is only language, and that the practical sense of our countrymen will not lead them to take for absolute gospel all that has been said on the subject of these countries for the last few months. I will not trouble your Lordships now with one or two other arrangements in other portions of that part of Africa or the delimitations of territory which have been made there. If I were to do so I believe my noble Friend opposite, Lord Aberdare, would be the only person who would understand me, and I think I may therefore venture to pass them by. But I will say that during these negotiations it occurred to me more than once that it might be wiser to break them off altogether and to allow the years to pass over us until the natural progress of emigration and civilisation and the struggle for existence should have determined in a far more effective way than can be done by Protocols and Treaties who are to be supreme, and in what part of that vast continent each nation is to rule. But, on reflection, we could not convince ourselves that that, though far the most comfortable course, would be our duty, because in the front of this advancing tide of colonisation there are numbers of men of both nationalities—men of energy and strong will, but probably not distinguished by any great restraint over their feelings—who would be urging, in every part where rivalry existed and the two Powers touched, the claims of each nation to supremacy in each particular bit of territory, pressing them upon the natives, getting from native chiefs Treaty after Treaty, each Treaty conflicting with the other, and trying to establish by means which must constantly degenerate into violence the supremacy of that nation for which they were passionately contending. In such circumstances, whatever the friendliness of the Government at home, some friction and collisions could not be averted. The Governments of Germany and England have been on the most friendly terms, and I think have been able to impart at least a considerable portion of their own friendliness and moderation to those who served under them, but it is impossible to impart it to those not under their control, though they share our nationality, and are keen for the object which we also desire. It is impossible to restrain them. It is impossible to prevent the danger of collisions, which might be murderous and bloody; and then when those collisions took place, the echo of them would be heard here, they would be recounted and magnified in newspapers in both countries, they would be pressed upon popular passion until even the Governments themselves might not be able to resist the contagion of the feeling evoked. The happy sympathy and agreement which exist between the two Governments, and which I trust may long exist, would naturally be exposed in no limited time to very serious risks if we had allowed to remain undecided the many causes of conflict and the many questions of territory and right which had arisen in various parts of the continent between the two countries, and especially in the island of Zanzibar, where we should have been brought to close quarters, and where many questions of difficulty would have arisen. I fear that if the existing state of things had gone on the harmony of the two countries might not be long maintained. My Lords, I commend this Agreement to your approval, not as pretending that we have gained or that Germany has gained any great advantage. I believe we have gained on both sides advantages, because each has obtained what suited its own purposes, and of which it could make the most valuable use. I think we have each obtained what is most advantageous to us, but I do not pretend that either country has gained any advantage over the other. What I believe is that we have come to a common agreement which will remove all danger of disunion and conflict between us, and which will cement, I hope for a long time, the good feeling of those who by sympathy, by interest, and by descent, ought always to be friends.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I am sure it is the wish of those who sit beside me on this Bench to acknowledge in the fullest and the freest manner the fair and conciliatory statement which the noble Marquess has laid before the House, and certainly it is not our wish to pick small holes in an Agreement of this vast character. If it were, as the noble Marquess said in his concluding remarks,
The Marquess of Salisbury

a one-sided Agreement, in which one side had got all the benefit and the other was conscious only of loss, that Agreement would have no chance of being permanent, and, in my opinion, would be a greater misfortune than no Agreement at all. But perhaps it may be permitted when one looks back a few years to envy, for a moment, the powers of pungent sarcasm enjoyed by the noble Marquess, and to reflect without acrimony on what would have been said if Mr. Gladstone's Government had submitted an Agreement of this description to the House. I do not wish, however, to pursue that subject, and in all that I desire to say—and it will not be long—I only wish to put forward one or two points of not, I hope, unfriendly criticism of the Agreement, and not to carp at or cavil with an arrangement which must in any case, to whomsoever falls the advantage, conduce so largely to the present and future friendship of two great countries. Now, my Lords, I take it that the noble Marquess has put the case very clearly before us in stating that in exchange for the cession of Heligoland, which, of course, in itself is a strange and unusual incident, the main compensation we have received is in connection with Zanzibar. It is with those two points that I propose mainly to deal this evening. I do not wish in any detail to deal with this vast Agreement for mapping out and apportioning Africa, which, to many, forms the central point of interest. My feeling as regards this Agreement is this: that, as the noble Marquess said on a former occasion, we should have larger maps in order to appreciate their importance, and also that on this vast continent there is ample room for all the colonising nations of the world. But I would make two remarks with respect to these Agreements, and the first is, that whatever their merits may be, they are an entirely new feature in European diplomacy, or rather, they are a revival of that form of apportionment by which Pope Alexander VI. mapped out the new world between Spain and Portugal. Of course, such Agreements may be necessary; they may, as the noble Marquess said, be better than no Agreement at all; but, at the same time, they have their bad side too, and they cannot but produce in many quarters a certain feeling of jealousy and discontent among those nations who are not party to them. I confess I believe it would be to the advantage of all parties if Agreements as to apportionments of this kind could be submitted to some formal Conference or Congress, so that they might receive the sanction of the communities of Europe at large. The second point I would call your Lordships' attention to in connection with them is this: that these apportionments ought not to be taken for more than they are. They bind only the two Powers that are parties to them. If I am right in so thinking, they are rather in the nature of influence than in the nature of possession; they confer rather protection than dominion; and, in that respect, I think some misleading language has been used with regard to this Agreement. I think it was the right rev. Prelate who spoke the other day of the policy which had added an Empire to an Empire, but I think even the noble Marquess would disclaim such language as that; and though the great explorer to whom we are indebted for our knowledge of so much of this territory has used language of that character, I presume it is not to be taken as either diplomatic or exact or political. But I will say this, I do not wish now to deal with the large African questions involved in this Agreement. I desire rather to deal with the two points which are practically before us—the cession of Heligoland and the counterbalancing advantage which we are supposed to have received in Zanzibar. With regard to Heligoland, the noble Marquess gave us a most picturesque view of our acquisition of that island, but I think that in some respects his subsequent remarks tended a little to contradict themselves. He is against, as I understand him, consulting the inhabitants of a place which we hold for belligerent purposes; and, on the other hand, he tells us there are no belligerent advantages in Heligoland. I do not quite understand how he can reconcile those two statements. But I come to the point of what the strategic value of Heligoland really is. I do not think that we on this side have any theoretical objection to the cession of territory, quod cession of territory, if the general advantage of the Empire results therefrom. But I think we have a right to demand that one or two conditions shall be fulfilled, and one of those conditions is that in an island which, after all, is so near our shores, we should be quite sure that we are not giving away any military or naval advantage which is essential to us. Well, I confess I never meddle with the opinions of naval or military experts. Those opinions of naval and military experts must rest upon their own foundation and be judged according to their intrinsic merit. But we have never seen the opinions of the naval and military experts on this occasion. I believe they have been confided by the First Lord of the Treasury in another place to an indiscreet follower, who only gave us an appetite for more by alluding to them on a postcard to one of his constituents. At any rate, I think we may refer back to a Despatch written by Admiral Russell in 1807 when he took the island. He said that—

I do not say this convinces me in the slightest degree, but I say that, in the absence of opinions of existing naval and military authorities, it is almost all we have to depend upon. But we have other opinions, not exactly naval and military, but traditional in their character, which may help us in this connection, and, as the noble Marquess has chosen to unite the questions of the belligerent importance of Heligoland and the wishes of the inhabitants, I must say I am not aware that any of us on this side of the House would wish that a plebiscite should be taken of the wishes of the Heligolanders in regard to this cession, whether they wished to be parted from this Empire or not. But we do hold as a condition of the proper consideration of a question like this that the opinions of the inhabitants of any part of the Empire which we think it necessary for Imperial motives to dis sever ourselves from should not be so absolutely disregarded as they have been, so far as we know, in the present transaction. The noble Marquess the other day, when pressed upon this point, said that he had ascertained the wishes of the inhabitants. I do not pretend to have ascertained the wishes of the inhabitants myself, but we have as yet failed to find out exactly how the noble Marquess arrived at the conclusion which he has confided to us. All the rumours which we have heard are adverse to the notion that the wish of these people is that they should be dis-severed from this Empire, under which they have enjoyed such great benefits. I know it is said that they are only a population of 2,000, and what does the feeling matter of a population of 2,000 in a transaction of this kind? I want to know what is the test of population which you are to apply to the patriotism of the various peoples of this Empire. If you say that 2,000 is a limit which is not to be considered, you have two of the Channel Islands, one of which has a smaller population than 2,000, and the other hardly reaches a quarter of that population. But I go a little further than that, and I say, whether you have 2,000 souls or one soul, you have some right to be considered in the transfer of your person and the territory in which you live from the flag under which you were born. I venture to say that the noble Marquess himself, great as is his power and his abilities, is only one person and one soul, and I do not think that he would very much care to be transferred against his will with the territory in which he lives to the dominion of a foreign Power. But I do not wish to dwell at all upon or to bandy words with the noble Marquess as to what he thinks the wishes of the Heligolanders may be in this matter. I think we have information of a character which the noble Marquess himself will admit to be authentic with regard both to the strategic value of Heligoland and the wishes of the Heligolanders. In a speech which was delivered in 1885 a distinguished Member of Her Majesty's Government said—

"He had listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Gorst) with some surprise"

—the Government was apparently rather divided upon the question at that time.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: We were then in opposition.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: Quite so; but evidently the present Members of the Government, unless they have since very much changed their opinions, were very much at issue on that point—

"For there was a most extraordinary omission in that speech. The hon. and learned Member had spoken of the ardent desire of the German people to have possession of Heligoland, but he had quite forgotten to refer to the feelings of the Heligolanders upon this point. He was satisfied that there was no desire on the part of the people of Heligoland for the proposed annexation. They had prospered and thrived under English rule, and he was certain they did not desire to come under German rule or German Law, including conscription for military service. He was not prepared to sacrifice these people for the purpose of pleasing and conciliating the German people, however desirable it might be to do so. The hon. and learned Member had stated that from a strategical point of view Heligoland was no use to this country. He was disposed to contradict that opinion even upon the hon. and learned Member's own statement as to the position of Heligoland, but he had the honour of having served on a Royal Commission on Colonial Defences and the Protection of Trade, and although their proceedings and the Report were strictly confidential, yet it would be no breach of that confidence to say that, at all events, some persons of experience entertained contrary views to that of the hon. and learned Member."

I am not prepared to go so far as that speech, but that is the speech of the present Secretary for the Colonies, under whose amiable and genial rule Heligoland is at present existing, and I hope that at some later moment of the Debate he will give us some explanation of what it is that has caused him to change his views, both as to the strategical importance of Heligoland, and as to the wishes of the Heligolanders. On the same occasion we have another Member of the present Government, Sir M. Hicks Beach, to the fore, saying—

"He was much astonished when he saw the notice of Motion of his hon. and learned Friend, which appeared rather as a trap for Her Majesty's Government,"

—if Sir Michael Hicks Beach could have foreseen the present condition of things, he would have known what Government it was a trap for—

"And he congratulated them that they had escaped the snare. He was very glad that the proposal had practically received no support in the House. As to the point that the island was of no use to us, it had been shown by the noble Lord and others, who had taken part in the Debate, that Heligoland was of great importance to our fisheries in the North Sea. As to the feelings of the people of Heligoland, when he was at the Colonial Office, so far from there being any desire on their part to sever themselves from the British Empire, they were exceedingly well pleased to be connected with England rather than with Germany."

My Lords, I do not think I can add anything to the weight of those opinions, or to the pungency and force with which they are expressed. They are all, I venture to say, practical upon the point whether the island of Heligoland is of strategical importance, and as to whether the wishes of the Heligolanders should be in any degree consulted on the subject of their transfer. There is another condition which I think, in the opinion of the people of this country, would attach to any such cession of territory as has been made in this instance, and that is, that there should be no breach of faith on our part. Now, I cannot say whether there has been any breach of faith here or not; but it is asserted that by the 10th

- Article of the Capitulation of 1807 it was provided that the natives of Heligoland should be permanently exempted from any naval service in the future. Whether that pledge has been given, and whether, if given, it has been safeguarded by the noble Marquess in the present Agreement, is a point upon which we shall no doubt receive information farther on. As to that Capitulation, I may say that my interest in it is not newly sprung from the incidents of the cession. I moved for a copy of that Capitulation in this House in 1876, and I remember that my noble and lamented
- Friend Lord Carnarvon—whom I cannot mention on a subject like this without expressing what I am sure has been the feeling of the whole House during the past fortnight as to the loss this House has sustained through his untimely death—refused to give me that Capitulation, because he said it contained much perilous matter. In consequence, I have never been able to trace or see that document. I do not know whether the noble Marquess will be more liberal now that Heligoland is about to pass away from us. I suppose the least condition that any Parliament would be disposed to attach to a cession of this kind is that we should receive adequate and ample compensation for a sacrifice not so much of territory as of amour propre. Well, the equivalent for the cession of Heligoland is to be found, we know, in Zanzibar. The noble Marquess has devoted some attention to what I have said on the subject of Zanzibar. I insinuated something and I cheered something else the noble Marquess said; and from that the noble Marquess drew something of a most portentous kind.

Let me see what I really did say. I said that "the Sultanate of Zanzibar, which the noble Marquess is now acquiring by the cession of Heligoland is not by any means the Sultanate of Zanzibar which we left behind us when we left office in 1886." I must complain a little, I confess, of the language of the noble Marquess on this subject. We were left until the day these Papers appeared with nothing but the Despatch of the noble Marquess to guide us with regard to the Agreement into which he had entered. In that Despatch to Sir E. Malet of the 14th of June, 1890, the noble Marquess says—

That I felt to be good news. I did not know much about the rest of the Agreement, but I ventured, in order to make assurance perfectly sure, to place a question on the Paper asking exactly what was meant by the "Sultanate of Zanzibar," but being on that afternoon occupied with the more august duties of the London County Council, I had to ask my noble Friend Lord Kimberley to put that question for me. The question was this:—

"The exact meaning of the expression 'Sultanate of Zanzibar' used in Lord Salisbury's Despatch of June 14th, 1890?"

The noble Marquess answered that "The word 'Sultanate' bears the same relation to Sultan as the word 'monarchy' does to monarch. The protectorate of Zanzibar means the protectorate over the territory which is under the government of the Sultan of Zanzibar or under his suzerainty."

Well, that is a perfectly clear statement. That means Zanzibar and Pemba and some 500 or 600 miles of coast, though only of a depth, it is true, of 10 miles on the mainland, which are all under the suzerainty of the Sultan of Zanzibar. The noble Marquess made this more clear in a subsequent answer, in which he said that this sovereignty of the Sultan of Zanzibar over these hundreds of miles of mainland was perfectly clear and undisputed, but, by a somewhat unfortunate metaphor, as I think, he added that for a part of it the Sultan of Zanzibar had in the German Empire a tenant who understood his relations to the Sultan somewhat more in the way that tenancies are understood in the Sister Island than as they are regarded in this country. Then, my Lords, we had arrived at this point. From the Despatch we knew that we were to take over the protectorate of the whole Sultanate of Zanzibar, and also from the noble Marquess we had got a definition that the word "Sultanate" implied everything over which the Sultan of Zanzibar had sovereignty or suzerainty. We had, further, this concession from him—that the whole of the coast line opposite to Zanzibar was held under that Sultan's suzerainty. Surely the conclusion was irresistible—we came naturally to the conclusion that all that line of coast which we left under the sovereignty of the Sultan of Zanzibar when we left Office in 1886 was to be transferred to the protectorate of the British Crown by this Agreement. My Lords, what is the case? We gain information only by instalments, and though we thought the information satisfactory as far as it went, our anxiety was rudely put an end to by the publication of the Treaty. Not merely does the Treaty not give us anything of the kind; not merely does the Treaty in a most emphatic way contradict the statement of the noble Marquess in his covering Despatch, but it actually makes out that so far from assuming this protectorate, we are to assist in every way the transfer of the whole of the territory of the Sultan of Zanzibar on the mainland opposite the island to Germany. What are the words of the Treaty? Article 11 of the Treaty says—

"Great Britain engages to use all her influence to facilitate the friendly arrangements by which the Sultan of Zanzibar shall cede absolutely to Germany his possessions on the mainland comprised in existing concessions to the German East Africa Company and their dependencies, as well as the Island of Mafia."

No protectorate; but he "shall cede absolutely to Germany" his possessions on the mainland. I venture to say that, under those circumstances, the expression used by the noble Marquess in his Despatch was not one that was accurate, or that was calculated to convey a real impression of Article 11.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Have you a copy of the Despatch?

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: Yes, I have marked the passage. Therefore, I think under these circumstances it is not an illegitimate conclusion to arrive at that the sultanate of Zanzibar has suffered material detriment since we left Office in 1886. But the noble Marquess resents that conclusion. He says—
The Earl of Rosebery

"I do not think any diminution of the prestige or the power of the Sultan of Zanzibar can be laid to our charge."

The diminution of the Sultanate of Zanzibar, as far as it is diminished on the coast at all, is, I am afraid, rightly or wrongly, entirely the work of the noble Marquess, and, therefore, I cannot understand his using the language of injured innocence with regard to that transaction. But I am not disposed to rest this matter entirely on figures or Treaties alone. We have had the advantage of the indiscretion of one of the most remarkable Members of the Government, though he has since ceased to be a Member of the Government—the noble Lord who was leader of the House of Commons at the time this course of policy was inaugurated, and who has given us a full, free, and candid, but I think a somewhat indiscreet, revelation of what has taken place in a speech delivered at Birmingham in July, 1889. Lord Randolph Churchill said—

"Now the price we have paid all along to the German Chancellor since we occupied Egypt for the support of the German Government in our policy there has been one concession after another to the colonial policy of Germany. Now the colonial policy of Germany is essentially an aggressive policy. I will give you one instance of the price which we paid for the support of the German Government in Egypt. It happened at a time when I was in the Government, and in saying what I do I do not wish to blame the Government; or if the Government is to be blamed, I take as much blame on myself as being a part of it as may be necessary or proper. But this is what took place. The support of the German Government in Egypt was necessary to our policy. The German Government had designs on Zanzibar. Our position there at that very moment was one of immense value and strength."

That was when we left Office in 1886.

"The whole of the tribes of that part of Africa were under our influence, and were looking up to us, and were determined to be guided by us. We held at Zanzibar the key to all the commercial development of the great African territory. Well, in order to gain Prince Bismarck's support for our Egyptian policy we had to give up our position of predominance at Zanzibar. We practically ruined almost, but certainly most seriously damaged ourselves with that part of Africa, the commerce of which, at that time, was valued at upwards of $2,000,000 a year. And we know perfectly well that the state of that part of Africa at the present moment, owing to German designs and owing to German enterprise, is one of utter confusion, utter insecurity, and one where commercial relations cannot possibly tranquilly prevail. Now that is one price we had to pay for the Egyptian policy."

He goes on to make some remarks with regard to the Government policy as to Samoa which I will not read at this moment, but which are not devoid of interest to those who have followed the course of events in that island. I think I have proved, out of the mouth of the noble Marquess himself, from his own Treaty, and out of the mouth of his own Colleague the Leader of the House of Commons at the time of the Treaty concluded by Lord Iddesleigh in October, 1886, that there has been a considerable diminution in the prestige and influence of the Sultan of Zanzibar under the auspices of the present Government. And I think I will go a little further than that. I will lay down this position—that if, by the cession of the island of Heligoland, we are as the noble Marquess has told us, receiving as our equivalent the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, we are only by this cession of British territory—which is, with Malta and Gibraltar, our only remaining European asset from the great war with Napoleon and France, which cost us about a thousand millions and innumerable lives—we are only re-acquiring a small portion of what the Government of Mr. Gladstone left behind them under the full control of Great Britain. I do not think that this is of itself an overwhelming position, but it certainly puts the concession in a grave light. But I will return to the phrase of the noble Marquess, to which I attach so much importance, and take this Agreement from a different point of view. He says that—

"England will further assume, with the consent of the Sultan of Zanzibar (which has been given) the exclusive protectorate of that Sultanate, including the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, and that this assumption will be made with the full concurrence of Germany."

What I have to ask about that is—When did France disappear from the position of a Guaranteeing Power with regard to Zanzibar? We are told that Germany has given her consent and that the Sultan of Zanzibar has been pleased to give his consent, but neither the Sultan nor Germany are the guaranteeing Powers at Zanzibar. The two Guaranteeing Powers are England and France: and the solemn pledges that we made by the Mutual Declaration which was signed at Paris, on March 10th, 1882, to respect the independence of the Sultans of Zanzibar and Muscat appear, as far as we can gather from the Papers laid on the Table, and from the expository speech of the noble Marquess, in which the name of France was not once mentioned, to be treated as absolutely non-existent. My Lords, I consider this to be rather a grave matter. I do not know whether the noble Marquess is negotiating with France or not for her consent. I only know what I read in the papers, and it is no part of my duty to believe implicitly all that I read. But I think it would have been more graceful and more conciliatory to the dignity of a great Power, with which we have always been in the most friendly relations, if, in a transaction of this kind, transferring the protectorate of a territory with regard to which that Power and ourselves are the only Guaranteeing Powers, some mention had been made of that other Power in this transaction. So entirely was that position of France recognised in regard to Zanzibar that the Commission of Delimitation to which the noble Marquess has referred, which was set on foot in order to ascertain the real dominions of Zanzibar, was really set on foot to enable Germany to become a third Guaranteeing Power, there being then only two. Therefore, my Lords, I must add this to my description of the exchange which has been effected of Heligoland for this protectorate of Zanzibar, that we are not only re-purchasing a portion of what we had in 1886, but that we are only re-purchasing it subject to the consent of another Power, which has not yet been given, as far as I know. But I am not sure that I have even yet done with the qualifications which I must attach to the triumphant announcement of the noble Marquess. By Article 11 he is going to facilitate the complete arrangements by which Germany is to get possession of the territory on the mainland. Germany will receive the acquisitions referred to in Article 11 of the Treaty in full and fair freehold, so to speak. Our protectorate, if I am not misinformed, will be by no means of this fair freehold description that attaches to the position of Germany. Our protectorate will be, more or less, subject to all the commercial Treaties entered into by the Sultan of Zanzibar, and will be subject also to that extra-territorial jurisdiction of Foreign Powers which has caused us so much trouble in Egypt and elsewhere. We must, I am afraid, therefore, attach this further qualification to the description of the noble Marquess—that we are ceding Heligoland in order to obtain at Zanzibar partially now what we had altogether in 1886, subject to the consent of France, and subject to all the restrictions which have been placed by Foreign Powers, at different times, on the full and free action of that Sultan. I shall not ask your Lordships to consider this Agreement any further this evening. I have thought it right to lay before you the view I hold, that it is by no means the triumphant arrangement which it has been claimed to be by the organs of the opposite Party. There may be counterbalancing advantages for us in the “Empire that will be added to an Empire,” in the 650,000 square miles which Mr. Stanley says are now open to the Anglo-Saxon race. Your Lordships understand that I am not now dealing with vast intangible regions; I am dealing now with very tangible interests. We have handed over Heligoland and its people, like chattels, to a Foreign Power, and in exchange we have received this extremely qualified and diminished concession, which I have described in detail. It may be thought that this is an Agreement to which we in this House and in the other House should offer open and persistent opposition. But I confess, for my part, I shall offer no such opposition. It would be futile, if I wished to do so, in the present condition of our Party in this House; but if there were behind me, instead of 30, 300 Peers, my attitude in this respect would be exactly the same. In the first place I believe that the Agreement might have been considerably modified for the better, but having been made, and having been accepted by Germany, it would plunge us into the worst possible relations with Germany if the arrangement were not now consented to, or if it were now to be cancelled or withdrawn. I set far more value and importance on our good understanding with a great Power than I do on points of detail, however important, that may be found in an Agreement of this kind. But I confess that, while I am one of those who have always most stoutly and persistently urged that this country should establish the closest and best relations with the united Empire of Germany, and I did so long before I was at the Foreign Office, I do not see that that precludes our paying due and friendly respect to that other great Power with which we have always striven to be in the most friendly relations, and which, in my view, should have been consulted on this occasion. That is one other good reason for having nothing further to say in opposition to this Treaty. But there is a larger reason still to which I attach personally more importance than that; and it is this—I, for one, will never be party to dragging the foreign policy of this country into the arena of Party warfare. I attach infinitely more importance to our preserving a dignified and united attitude abroad, than to any petty advantage we can gain at home. I, for one, will never raise my voice by the utterance of a syllable, I will never give a single vote, unless under a major force than any that exists in this instance, which might diminish by one jot or tittle the supreme influence and position of Great Britain in the world.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, I should have thought it unnecessary, after the eloquent speech of the noble Earl who has just sat down, to interfere with reference to what, after all, is an almost personal matter; but the noble Earl has directly challenged me to explain away a speech I made in March, 1885, in the House of Commons. In fact, he has offered me the tempting proposal to eat my own words; but I entirely decline the leek that is offered to me. Your Lordships will see that that speech was made on a Motion for an Address to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be good enough to induce Germany to take over Heligoland. There was no question then raised as to whether there should be any consideration for the cession of Heligoland, or whether it was to form part of a great arrangement for the settlement of difficulties with a foreign nation, to which the noble Earl and the noble Marquess have referred, and which might lead to grave complications. It was merely a question whether we should cede Heligoland to Germany, in order to please Germany, and to get rid, as far as we were concerned, of a certain amount of useless expenditure. In these circumstances I was of opinion that it was a case in which the Heligolanders might well be consulted. If the only object of giving up Heligoland was to please Germany, or to relieve ourselves of a certain expenditure, I thought, and venture still to think, it would only be reasonable for us to consult the wishes of the Heligolanders. But the circumstances of the present case are entirely different. I am also free to admit that I do not believe there is any strong desire on the part of the Heligolanders to make any change. They have thriven under our rule, and are content to remain under it. As I said on a former occasion, the main reason for my thinking that the Heligolanders would be unwilling to place themselves under Germany was that they objected to naval and military conscription. But, again, the conditions of things is entirely altered. Germany has now agreed to conditions by which any person living at the date of the Agreement will be free from naval and military conscription. We have also secured to the Heligolanders that there shall be no increase of their dues for 20 years. We have secured to them the observance of their customs and laws, as far as possible; and, looking at these conditions, I believe it will be found that the people will readily come under the German Sovereign whose subjects have already for many years been their best customers. One observation only upon another part of that speech. The noble Earl has pointed out that I, as a Member of a Royal Commission, had referred to persons of experience having expressed opinions different from those of Sir J. Gorst. I would observe in the first place that Sir J. Gorst said that Heligoland was of no value whatever, and could not be so in any circumstances. I ventured to differ from him; I thought that, under certain circumstances, it might be of some value; but, speaking on the spur of the moment, and without reference to books, I exaggerated, unintentionally, the evidence that had been given before the Royal Commission. I find, on closer examination, that there had not been several persons of experience who believed in the strategical importance of the place, but only one, and he did not come up to be cross-examined before the Commission, but his opinion was only stated in a letter. My Lords, I really feel that I ought to apologise to you for having made these remarks, but I was challenged by the noble Earl to defend what I said. I content myself by pointing out that those observations were made in circumstances altogether different from those which are now presented to your Lordships.

EARL GRANVILLE: I observed when my noble Friend Earl Rosebery sat down, after his extremely able, and, at the same time, moderate speech, that the Prime Minister signed to my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies to get up; and he seemed to be a little reluctant to do so.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: I am afraid that is not exactly the case. I asked the noble Marquess whether it was necessary that I should offer a few observations.

EARL GRANVILLE: If that is the case, I can hardly believe that the noble Marquess thinks that the only answer it is necessary to offer on the part of the Government to the criticisms of my noble Friend is merely the explanation which has been given of a speech made by the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. We have not heard one word of defence of the manner in which the Treaty has been made. My noble Friend quoted what Sir John Gorst said, what Lord Knutsford said, and what the present President of the Board of Trade said in 1885. Those are not quite the latest Parliamentary utterances on this subject. Lord Beaconsfield is quoted to have said that surprise was the greatest element of success in politics. This certainly has been a surprise to us, not so much as to the cession of Heligoland, as that it should be Her Majesty's present Government who have taken this course. How is it to be explained that, not five years ago, but some five weeks ago, in the House of Commons, the Representative of the Colonial Office made a strong speech exactly in consonance with that of Lord Knutsford in 1885? I have always pointed out the difficulty of the Foreign Secretary's attending to all the duties of Prime Minister; but I should suppose that when a question concerning the Foreign Office is to be asked or discussed in the House of Commons those who have to answer for the Foreign Office would communicate in some degree with the Prime Minister and the Foreign Office as to the answer to be given. Can any greater surprise be shown than that which has followed the argument of the Representative of the Government, forcing, as it were, a large majority of the House of Commons to vote against the principle which has so immediately been abandoned, and is now embodied in this Bill? No answer has been given to the comments made upon the point referred to by the noble Marquess the other day, when he said he had the means of knowing that the Heligolanders were not dissatisfied with the change. All the general information given to us is exactly the reverse. The noble Marquess did not adduce any facts, but said he had reason to believe that the Heligolanders were satisfied, and that, as reasonable people, they ought to be. There is one ground on which it strikes me they might object to their transfer, and that is that people who have been once English subjects do not like to cease to be English subjects. I think that is a reason which might have weighed with the Government. But as for supposing that the Heligolanders are satisfied, because, in the opinion of the noble Marquess, they ought to be satisfied, that appears to be an illusory way of arguing this question. No answer has been given with regard to the Capitulation. I observed that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Knutsford) when my noble Friend Lord Rosebery read out the words that are supposed to be in that Capitulation cheered, and I imagine that cheer signified that they were privileged not to be obliged to serve on board ship. It is said that these Heligolanders are protected, because the noble Lord opposite said that those who are now living are not to be subjected to the conscription. But what is to happen to the children of those living people? Do the parents consent to their children being subjected to conscription, from which they are free now? Reasons of State may justify this transaction, but one would have thought Her Majesty's Government would have felt the strongest possible stimulus to protect the Heligolanders in the enjoyment of all the privileges that had been secured to them. What does the Agreement come to? With regard to English fishermen, their protection is unlimited to all eternity; but with regard to the Heligolanders, the protection is only for a few years. I really think these are points which have a very great bearing upon the question, and call for a reply from the Government. However much we may rejoice, and I rejoice as much as my noble Friend does, that an arrangement has been made on colonial matters with Germany, I cannot but think that this Agreement has been come to in a sudden and impulsive manner. I have never felt any jealousy of German colonisation; I believe they will colonise, and the noble Marquess has been good enough to say he thought I was right in conceding a right to Germany to colonise in Africa, and not claiming a monopoly of colonisation on our part. I really believe that the noble Marquess cannot have thought of the Capitulation until it was brought forward on the present occasion. Nothing has been said in reply to what my noble Friend said about our ignoring the joint-guarantee of France. The noble Marquess gave us an explanation, and, so far as the mere facts go, it was, perhaps, an explanation; but the state of things was this: That when Mr. Gladstone's Government left office our influence in Zanzibar was supreme, partly owing to our predominant maritime and commercial position, and partly owing to the character of Sir John Kirk, who was removed by the noble Marquess; and our position was supreme in a way of which neither France nor any other Power complained. But that position has been given up. We are now in this position, and I should like really to know whether we are to assent to the cession of Heligoland without being aware whether we can carry out the Treaty or not as to the Protectorate of Zanzibar which we have arranged with Germany. I think that it is a very important thing, if we give up the island, or are in any way deprived of it, to know whether the Government can say that we are in a position at this moment to carry out the guarantee which England and France have agreed upon. I think, considering how desirable it is that this case should stand as well as possible, it is a pity that the Secretary of State for the Colonies did not think it worth while to answer any of the criticisms of my noble Friend, but left the case exactly as it stood after his speech, without any reassuring reply from Her Majesty's Government.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have no reason to be dissatisfied with the reception which the Agreement has received from the noble Lords opposite, though their criticisms have been somewhat minute. The point to which the noble Lord directed attention most was the question of the assent of the Heligoland, and the security that we were in possession of that assent. I thought that I had explained the other night that, in my judgment, there is no way of being absolutely sure of the assent of the Heligoland, except by the mode of taking a plébiscite, but taking a plébiscite seems to me to be a plan not only singularly alien from all our practice, but also, what is more important, a precedent full of risk and difficulty with regard to other portions of the Empire. Without a plébiscite it is impossible to know precisely what the people may think—you may form a guess at it, but you cannot know it. I must say that I have no doubt myself that the population, as a whole, are well disposed towards this change, but the sources from which I have received that impression are necessarily confidential. I should quite agree with the noble Lord that he has no right to be satisfied with that assurance on my part if the assent of the population is an essential part of the agreement. I have tried to establish that a very strong line of distinction is to be drawn between those countries which were originally occupied for purely belligerent purposes and those countries which were occupied for settlement. In the latter case the veto of the population ought to have an enormous weight, but in the other case they must be subordinated to the general considerations affecting the welfare of the Empire where we are dealing with a possession which was originally acquired on purely belligerent grounds. After all, when we talk of the necessity for obtaining the sanction of the population to becoming German subjects, I would remind the noble Lord that they became British subjects entirely without their consent, by the application of pure force, and that, too, within the lifetime of many who are now alive; and, therefore, I think that the doctrine which the noble Earl asserts is exceedingly wide of any doctrine which has been hitherto laid down, and if it was accepted by authority in the first instance would, in regard to matters irrespective of cession, produce signal inconvenience in the administration of the Empire.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Marquess will remember that on the last occasion he did not take ground quite so high as this. He told us that by means of confidential communications he had ascertained that the whole of the Heligoland, were satisfied, but he was not good enough to answer my question as to how that took place, whether those confidential communications were with the islanders or the Executive Council of the island. He did not tell us whom he had consulted, or whether it was the Governor. If so, I should be glad to know whether he consulted the Governor after the Agreement or before it?

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have simply to say in defence of my conduct on a former occasion that I tried very directly to answer the questions, and, therefore, I did not go into the whole case for the Second Reading of the Bill. I maintain that the duty of the Government in this case is to consider, in the first instance, the Imperial interests committed to their charge; and, in the second instance, to do all they possibly can for the welfare of the population of the ceded territory. I think that we have fulfilled that demand; and, in the third place, we have to consider the circumstances which would determine the views of the population and the motives by which they are likely to be influenced. Absolutely to ascertain what populations think, I maintain, to be impossible except by a plébiscite, and to imagine that you can obtain it by simply consulting the Executive Council I think would be a very illusory proceeding. The impressions which I hold have certainly not been contradicted by any trustworthy evidence. The manner in which I have arrived at the impressions I have stated, and which have not been contradicted by any trustworthy evidence, I regret to say I am compelled to treat as confidential. I do not know that there is any other point which my noble Friend has pressed upon me for consideration except only the allusions to France. I will briefly say that we have been in communication, and are still in communication, with France, and therefore it is impossible for me to discuss that question. I can only say that I do not put upon the document the interpretation which the noble Earl puts upon it. Then the only other matter is this. The noble Earl apparently maintains such a vigorous look out as to the communications which pass between my noble Friends and myself that it is impossible to conceal that a whisper did pass between me and my noble Friend. I am glad that the noble Earl has so much detachment of mind and freedom from care that he is able to give so much study to our personal communications.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: I thought the noble Marquess seemed to suggest a reply from the noble Lord.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: As I was directly challenged I expressed my desire to answer.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: With respect to the Capitulation in question I do not read it as conferring upon the Heligolanders a permanent exemption from serving on board Her Majesty's ships, and I do not quite understand by what argument it is proved that if, when their allegiance was forcibly changed, they were told that they should not be forced to serve upon the King's ships, that therefore there is a promise for all time even after they have returned to the same allegiance as the neighbouring province.

EARL GRANVILLE: Not "returned."

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: They return to the allegiance of the ruler of Schleswig, which they were under in 1807, though several things have happened to Schleswig in the meantime. I can only say I do not read the Capitulation in that sense, and I do not think any person could do so. I do not in the least believe that any Heligolander will think that faith has not been kept with him in respect to that subject.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I think I said by accident that the Capitulation had not been printed. It was some time ago, and I founded my The Marquess of Salisbury recollection upon a speech of Lord Carnarvon, who refused it to me. I have since found out that it was printed, and the words of the Article are worth remembering—

"As it is one of the privileges of the inhabitants of this island"

—pointing to a privilege that they had enjoyed in the past, or in perpetuity—

"Not to be obliged to serve on board a King's ship contrary to their inclination, that privilege is to be continued to them.—Agreed."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I only desire to make one remark, not to prolong the Debate, but I hope the noble Marquess will take one matter into consideration. He told us that he could not state what the communications between the British and the French Governments were. That I quite understand. It is, of course, impossible to give Parliament information as to negotiations which are now going on; but what I wish to impress upon the noble Marquess and the House is that we shall be placed in an exceedingly strange position: if we ratify the Treaty with Germany for the cession of Heligoland to her without having any assurance whatever that we can obtain the Protectorate of Zanzibar, because we shall not know whether France is willing, in face of the guarantee of the independence of Zanzibar which was entered into in 1862, to allow us to exercise that Protectorate which Germany is willing to give us. I do not in the least desire to embarrass the noble Marquess in his negotiations with France, but only to point out that the position is one of serious embarrassment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 10th July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE BRENNAN TORPEDO.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state what has been the total expenditure hitherto incurred in the purchase and manufacture of the Brennan torpedo, including expenses of the staff employed in it; what amount still remains due to Mr. Brennan for his invention; and how many of such torpedoes are now fit for service?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): To the end of the last financial year about £126,000 had been paid in all for the purchase and manufacture of the Brennan torpedo; and the sum of £32,000 remains to be paid as part of the reward granted. A considerable number of Brennan torpedoes are ready for use, but the right hon. Gentleman will scarcely expect me to state how many.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what addition it is proposed to make to the staff of the Royal Observatory of Greenwich, in order to assist the Astronomer Royal and Chief Assistant in the general superintendence of the work of the Observatory, which has so greatly increased of late years in every branch; and whether this addition is on the lines recommended by the Board of Visitors of the Observatory, who are the scientific advisers of the Government in the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): One first and one second class assistant were added at the end of last year to the staff of the Royal Observatory, that is to say, the same number of additional officers as the Board of Visitors recommended, the difference being that the Board of Visitors suggested a deputy chief assistant and a first-class assistant instead of two assistants.

SIR H. ROSCOE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Board have entered a strong protest against the present arrangement, and, in view of that expression of opinion, is it proposed to re-consider the matter?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not seen the protest to which the hon. Member refers, but the matter was considered in November, and the conclusion arrived at was that the staff was sufficient.

LIGHTHOUSE AT DIMLINGTON.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can explain the reason of the delay in the erection of a new lighthouse at Dimlington, near Withernsea, for which land had been already purchased; and whether the Government has been made aware of the continued danger that is being caused to passing steamers by the delay?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The commencement of this work has been postponed in consequence of more urgent claims upon other parts of the coast. But I hope that it will be possible to make provision for it in next year's estimate.

THE WEST HIGHLAND COMMISSION.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the West Highland Commission has closed its evidence, or at what stage its proceedings now are; whether the Commission has visited the localities on the north coast of Sutherland, promised by the Secretary for Scotland in his letter of 13th March last, and taken evidence regarding the claims of those localities; whether, in view of the recent deplorable loss of life in the said localities, chiefly through the want of harbour accommodation, the Secretary for Scotland will use his influence to induce the Commission to visit the localities referred to, and report upon their claims; and what steps he proposes to take to redeem the promise in the letter above referred to?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Commissioners are now engaged in preparing a Report, and it is nearly ready. They visited a part of the north coast of Sutherlandshire, that locality being included in the scope of the inquiry, as stated in the letter referred to by the hon. Member. The stormy weather prevented their visiting other parts of that coast. The Secretary for Scotland is necessarily unable, pending the consideration of the Report, to say anything as to the future movement of the Commission.

THE CUSTOMS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a re-organisation of the Statistical Office of Her Majesty's Customs, on the basis laid down in paragraph 46 of the Treasury Minute of 10th August, 1889, would effect a saving to the country of about £1,500 a year, after providing for superannuations on compensation terms; whether the Board of Customs have recommended the economical re-organisation of the Office on that basis, and especially the granting of compensation terms; and is it the fact that there are now four vacancies in the above Department; if so, how long have they existed, and why have they not been filled up?

MR. GOSCHEN: No calculation has been made of the cost of re-organising the Statistical Office of Her Majesty's Customs on the basis of the Treasury Minute of August, 1889, for the reason that no re-organisation on that basis has been recommended. The Board of Customs has, however, accepted the Report of a Departmental Committee on the subject, which is now under consideration, but the Board have not recommended the grant of compensation terms. As regards such terms, I must refer the hon. Member to my recent statements that the Government is precluded from granting compensation terms by the decision of the House of Commons and the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments. It would, however, be possible, with a view to facilitate reductions in the higher establishment generally, to consider applications from heads of Departments to permit retirement on ordinary terms. I am informed, with reference to the last part of the hon. Member's question, that two or three gentlemen have recently retired from the higher establishment of the Statistical Office, but the question of filling up the vacancies must be postponed until the scheme for the total re-organisation of the Office has been settled.

BALLAST FOR SHIPS.

MR. THOMAS SUTHERLAND (Greenock): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state under what authority a monopoly exists for the supply of ballast to ships in the port of Hull, and for whose benefit the proceeds of such monopoly are applied; whether he is aware that shipowners are compelled to make prepayment for ballast thus supplied, but are unable to obtain any redress from the Local Authorities when such ballast is short shipped, as is alleged frequently to be the case; and if he can suggest means by which redress may be obtained in such cases of overcharge?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The supply of ballast to ships in the port of Hull is regulated by a Local Act of Parliament, passed in 1832. Under that Statute, $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton of the current price of ballast (which is now 1s. 8d. per ton) is retained by the Pilotage Commissioners for cost of management, the remainder going to the ballast men. Shipowners are required to make prepayment, and the officers of the ship receive, before taking the ballast on board, a printed notice, requiring them to examine the ballast lighter, and thereby ascertain whether they receive the correct weight, and the ballast men are not paid except on the ship's receipt of having taken so many tons. The onus, therefore, rests with the officers of the ship.

SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in the case of two men, named Edward Marshall and Charles M'Gill, convicted of killing one rabbit at Maryhill, near Glasgow, Sheriff Balfour has imposed a penalty upon each of them of £5 or 14 days' imprisonment; and whether he will obtain some mitigation of this sentence?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I have no knowledge of the case referred to in this question. If mitigation of the sentence is desired the proper course is to make a representation for the consideration of the Secretary for Scotland.

GOTHENBURG LICENSING SYSTEM.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, following the precedent in the year 1876 (see Appendix to the Lords' Committee on Intemperance, First Report, dated 23rd March, 1877), the Secretary of State will instruct Her Majesty's Minister at Stockholm to obtain information as to the working of the Gothenburg scheme for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors from 1876 to the present time, and lay such information before Parliament?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Yes, Sir; the information will be called for.

THE MARGARINE ACT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the statements of Consul General Bernal, at p. 29 of his Report on the Trade of the Havre District, as to the evasion of "The Margarine Act, 1887;" and whether instructions will be given to the Customs Officers to do their utmost to prevent these frauds?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have referred to the Report quoted by the hon. Member as to the adulteration of Normandy butter, and have called the attention of the Board of Customs to it, and asked them to take any steps in their power to expose the adulteration. I notice that the Vice Consul states that, between 1882 and 1887, the export of butter from Normandy to England fell from nearly 90,000,000f. to 58,000,000f., a decrease of more than 35 per cent. It is therefore apparent that deteriorated butter is not appreciated.

THE SCOTCH MAILS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why it is that no acceleration in the mails has been effected by the opening of the Forth Bridge, notwithstanding the fact that passenger trains are arriving over an hour earlier, and before the London mails; and what steps he intends to take in the matter?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The Department is fully aware of the acceleration which is possible owing to the opening of the Forth Bridge. Arrangements are now under consideration which will enable me to take advantage of it for the mail service, and I hope it may be possible to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the matter.

THE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, N.E., Clitheroe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now in a position to state the course which he will adopt with regard to the representations made on behalf of School Boards as to the prejudicial effects which the Industrial Schools Bill, in its present form, would have upon their powers and duties, and on the education and training of large numbers of neglected children; and whether he has fixed a day for receiving a deputation from School Boards upon this subject? I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman how soon the Report for 1889 of the Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Great Britain, which was laid upon the Table of the House on Monday night, will be in the hands of Members, and whether a copy of it is now accessible in the Library?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am quite prepared to consider the representations of the School Boards as to the Industrial Schools Bill. No day has been fixed for receiving a deputation. The Report of the Inspector of the Reformatories is not now accessible in the Library, but will be early in the morning of Tuesday next.

POSTAGE OF VOTERS' CLAIMS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether claims of voters, either as lodgers or occupiers, both before and after signature by the claimants, can be sent through the post at book-post rates, notwithstanding the fact that a printed footnote is attached to the document instructing the claimants how to fill up the form?

*MR. RAIKES: Claims of voters are allowed to pass at book-post rates provided nothing of the nature of a letter is added; and if the printed footnotes the hon. Member refers to can be put in general and impersonal terms they will not be objected to, either when the documents are sent out or when they are returned after signature.

MR. CAUSTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give attention to the matter in order to prevent these fidgetty and vexatious objections in regard to postal matters? Would the regulations be strictly enforced if a man wrote "or" instead of "this"? A letter appeared in the newspapers a day or two ago, in which it was pointed out that a trivial objection of that nature had led to the Post Office refusing to receive the notices.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a question which ought to be put on the Paper in the usual way.

MR. CAUSTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the first part of the question?

*MR. RAIKES: Am I to understand that the circular was printed in general terms?

MR. CAUSTON: The Post Office Officials looked upon the word "this" as personal.

TITHE RENT DISTRAINTS.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, in the course of the last three years, the total number of distrainments for the tithe rent-charge in the county of Montgomery amounts to 122; whether, in any of those cases any of the parties concerned have acted in any way beyond their legal rights; whether he is aware that the total number of sales under distrainments for tithe during the same period in the same county is 43; and whether at any of these sales there has been any breach of the peace, and whether, in the carrying on of the sales any expense whatever has been thrown upon the County Authorities?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Chief Constable that the number of distrainments and of sales under distrainments have been as stated. There has been no breach of the peace at any of these distrainments or sales, and the county has incurred no expense whatever.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the statement of the Chief Constable of Denbighshire, made before the Joint Police Standing Committee, has been brought to his notice; whether it is true that rioting has occurred in North Wales, and the agents distraining for tithe rent-charge have been prevented from carrying out their legal duties; whether 300 farms remain to be visited, and whether in the Chief Constable's opinion he has not sufficient force to protect the agents; whether his attention has been called to the recommendation of the Chief Constable that Hussars should be called in for their protection, and to the fact that Mr. Stevens, acting on behalf of the Ex-Commissioners, has been put in fear of his life, the people threatening to kill him and all his party; and whether, under these circumstances, the Government are prepared to take precautionary measures for the preservation of order in the disturbed districts?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The only information on the alleged facts I have, is derived from a newspaper report, as to the accuracy of which I cannot give an opinion. It is the duty of the authorities charged with the preservation of the peace to see that proper steps are taken to prevent disturbance and to secure that process of the law duly issued is carried into effect. The nature of the steps to be taken and the precautions to be used must rest with the judgment of the authorities, and Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake, in answer to an abstract question, to say what measures should be taken.

MR. STUART RENDEL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been directed to the difference in the experience during the last few years of the Head Constables of Montgomeryshire and Denbighshire in collecting tithes?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should not like to draw any invidious distinction between public servants who are performing valuable services. I may say, however, that I am informed that the tithe has been collected in Montgomeryshire in a manner which reflects credit on those concerned, and that the Chief Constable has exercised remarkable discretion in the discharge of his duties in connection with the maintenance of the law. I trust that like results may attend the due exercise of similar functions in Denbighshire.

CASE OF THE REV. MR. DOBIE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to make a full statement as to the case of the Rev. Mr. Dobie, who suffered imprisonment at Hodeidah; and what redress he is to receive for the maltreatment he has undergone?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The account given of the circumstances by the Turkish Authorities differs so materially from Mr. Dobie's version that the British Vice Consul at Hodeidah has been directed to make further inquiries as to the facts.

CASE OF JED AT ALEPPO.

SIR A. BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Aleppo Consulate has confirmed Mr. Barker's accusation against Jed?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The case is still before the Turkish tribunals, but is being carefully watched by Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople and Consulate at Aleppo. It would be obviously improper to make public the opinion of one of Her Majesty's Consuls upon a matter which is still sub judice.

REFORMS IN ARMENIA.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any communications, formal or informal, have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Turkish Government as to the effect which the continued refusal of the Porte to carry out reforms in Armenia, in accordance with Article 1 of the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1878, has upon the validity of other provisions contained in that Convention?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Such communications have passed, but they are not of a kind to be made public.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Will any of these communications appear in Papers about to be laid on the Table in relation to the Armenian Question?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; I do not think so.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has had his attention drawn to a telegram from Odessa, in the Daily News of 9th July, to the effect that the Armenians have lost all hope of protection and redress from the Turkish Government at Constantinople, as the futility of all appeals and protests made to the Porte by the Great Powers has been demonstrated during the last 12 months; and whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to invite the Russian Government to occupy Armenia, and put an end to the scenes enacted by the Kurds?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That would be a very strong step to take on the strength of a telegram from Odessa.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is it true that there are two Russian Infantry divisions within a day's march of the frontier?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not prepared to answer that question.

TEACHING UNIVERSITY FOR LONDON.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the proposed Scheme for the establishment of a Teaching University for London will be laid upon the Table of the House before it is finally confirmed; and whether, before such confirmation, an opportunity will be afforded to the University Colleges in the provinces of expressing their views on the provisions of that Scheme?

MR. JACKSON: Under the College Charter Act, 1871, a copy of every Draft Charter for the foundation of any College or University must be laid before both Houses of Parliament for 30 days before it is submitted to Her Majesty for approval. Every opportunity will be given to the provincial colleges for expressing their views on the subject. The Scheme has not been as yet submitted to the Privy Council Office

LOTTERIES IN INDIA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if it has been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State, either by Reports from India, or by advertisements in the Indian newspapers, that a very extensive system of lotteries has lately prevailed in India, the law against lotteries notwithstanding, and that very large sums have been publicly offered and drawn for in connection with the last Derby Race, as "Bengal Club Derby Sweep. 20,330 tickets at Rs.10 each, Rs.203,300. First horse, Rs.101,650," and other lotteries on the same race, advertised by the Bengal Masonic Association, the North-West Club, Allahabad, the Cawnpore Club, and other Associations; and whether any steps have been taken to put down these infractions of the law, as was the case in former years?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no official information on the subject. It is one of the local administration of the law, which in India, as well as in England, forbids lotteries. But the question of the hon. Member will be sent out to the Government of India.

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Will the First Lord of the Treasury say when it is intended to proceed with the Indian Councils Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have received some information, but I do not know whether it is entirely correct, that the measure will not be opposed, as at one time it was feared that it would be. If it is possible to take it without opposition, it will be proceeded with on an early day.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: When does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take the Second Reading of the Bill? He will, no doubt, bear in mind that I refrained from moving an Amendment to the Address upon the honourable understanding and almost distinct pledge that the question would be dealt with between Easter and Whitsuntide. This arrangement has been recognised over and over again across the floor of this House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I acknowledge the accuracy of the statement of the hon. Gentleman, but I am not able to say at this moment when the Second Reading will be taken. We are now in Committee of Supply, and as soon as I can see my way I will intimate to the hon. Gentleman when the Bill will be taken.

THE POST OFFICE DISTURBANCES.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the notice signed by the Controller, and dated 7th July, which was published in the Pall Mall Gazette and other papers, on Tuesday last, was issued with his knowledge and sanction; and, if not, how it happened that an important notice purporting to contain his orders to the employés generally was issued without his knowledge and sanction?

*MR. RAIKES: I had no knowledge of the notice to which the hon. Member refers, and, therefore, could not have sanctioned it. Notices in the name of the Postmaster General are necessarily often issued which he has not previously seen. In my absence on Sunday last the authorities of the Post Office only discharged their duty in issuing the notice in question, which has my entire approval.

MR. CONYBEARE: May I ask whether, in view of the apology which was posted by the Controller in the Post Office relating to a resolution supposed to have emanated from the E.C. district postmen, which the right hon. Gentleman read to the House on Monday, he is now prepared to make any correction of the statement which he then made?

*MR. RAIKES: I have no correction to make in the statement, because I read it to the House exactly as I received it. It appears that the Controller who forwarded it to me was under a mistake as to the body from whom the resolution emanated. I only wish that the Controller's first impression had been a correct one.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the Holloway district this morning no letters were delivered and no collection was made until 1.30 p.m., and whether it is a fact that in the E.C. district work has been suspended; whether at the Leicester Square Parcels Office 72 men have been dismissed at a moment's notice, for declining to sign an agreement binding themselves not to strike; whether it is a fact that 50 supernumeraries, or additional hands, are now employed there, how many of these the right hon. Gentleman has employed in the Post Office, and how many police he has employed to look after them?

*MR. RAIKES: I must ask for notice of the hon. Member's questions as to matters of detail; but in order to re-assure the public mind, I may state that the defections which took place at Leicester Square Parcels Office have been more than filled up, and that applicants for the work have had to be turned away. I understand that the postal delivery has been proceeded with in the East and Holloway districts, but, of course, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, not with the usual regularity.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the traffic in Leicester Square has been considerably obstructed owing to vans remaining outside the Post Office there uncared for?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; I have no information to that effect.

MR. CONYBEARE: Are boys, usually earning 7s. a week, employed as letter carriers?

No answer was given.

THE LEWIS MAILS.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the loss entailed on the inhabitants of the Island of Lewis by the mail contractor, Mr. MacBrayne, causing the mail steamer Locheil to diverge to Portree, both on her outgoing and incoming passage daily from Stornoway to Stromeferry since 27th June, to relieve himself of the expense of chartering a steamer for the Skye Mail Service, this divergence causing the Lewis Mails to lose the train connection at Stromeferry, and retarding their arrival at Stornoway by three to six hours behind the advertised time, notwithstanding that the right hon. Gentleman had caused the Stornoway Burgh Authorities to be informed on the 20th September last that Mr. MacBrayne had promised in September, 1889, that under no circumstances, unless compelled by storm to do so, would the Stornoway and Stromeferry steamer be diverted from her course; and whether he will use means of putting an immediate stop (if not already stopped) to such a course of action on the part of the contractor?

*MR. RAIKES: It appears that some dislocation of the Mail Service has been caused by one of the steamers employed striking on a rock. Mr. MacBrayne has been communicated with in respect of the divergence from the prescribed route complained of by the hon. Member, but I think the House will understand the difficulty in which the contractor was placed by the accident in question, and that the hon. Member will make some allowance for the unforeseen contingency. I will give directions that the service shall be restored to its normal state without delay.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN AMERICAN CATTLE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has received a copy of the Annual Report of the United States Department of Agriculture (Bureau of Animal Industry) just issued; and whether, for the information of British agriculturists, he will lay upon the Table of the House that portion of it which relates to the alleged existence of pleuro-pneumonia in cattle shipped from the United States to Great Britain?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Annual Report of the United States Department of Agriculture has been received, and there will be no objection on my part to lay upon the Table of the House those parts of the Report which relate to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in cattle in the United States.

PICTURES FOR THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is true that, without consulting Parliament, and while the debt for the very expensive pictures bought a few years ago is still undischarged, he has consented to giving £25,000 from the Exchequer to enable the National Gallery to pay £55,000 demanded by the owners of three pictures?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have consented, subject, of course, to the approval of Parliament, to contribute £25,000 towards the purchase of three pictures—a Velasquez, a Holbein, and a Moroni, as representations made to me by the highest authorities convinced me that it was most important to secure these works for the nation. The remaining £30,000 has been guaranteed by private donors, who have come forward with great munificence. Their alacrity in making the offer is a striking and most satisfactory proof of the value attached to these pictures by men who are competent to judge, and ready to back their judgment by personal liberality.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that I shall strenuously oppose the purchase.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the serious want of details and discrepancies that exist in the published maps of Africa, purporting to give the new boundaries as settled by the Anglo-German Agreement, and seeing that the Tea Room map to which he has referred hon. Members does not correspond in some particulars with the Agreement, and does not give the following rivers and places named in the Agreement and Correspondence, namely, the River Lumé, southern branches of the River Kilambo, River Aka, Lufira River, and Towe, Kowe, and Agotine, in the Volta District, he will re-consider his decision, and have a correct map setting forth the new boundaries published for the use of Members?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A map will be placed in the Tea Room. At the time when that now in the Tea Room was prepared we were not in possession of the full particulars.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Naval Authorities at the Admiralty, or otherwise, have presented any Report as to the strategical importance of Heligo-land to England; and, if so, what is that Report?

Sir George Campbell

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As I have before stated, the papers relating to the strategical value of Heligoland are of a confidential character, and I am unable to make any statement as to their purport, but the hon. Gentleman may draw his own inference from the fact that no Government since 1821 has either armed or garrisoned the island.

MR. SCHWANN: Does it not appear that these documents are so confidential that they can only be shown to Members on the other side of the House?

[No answer was given.]

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the case of those inhabitants of Heligoland who, under the 2nd section of the 12th article of the Anglo-German Agreement, exercise their right of option to remain British subjects, the children of such inhabitants born after the signature of the Agreement will, under the Agreement, have the status of British subjects or will be German subjects, and liable to military and naval conscription and the other duties of German subjects? I wish further to know what will be the position of these children under the German law. Will they be liable to conscription or not?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will lay the German law on the Table.

FLASHING SIGNALS.

MR. HOLLOWAY (Gloucester, Stroud): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if the Papers to be laid upon the Table of the House of Commons relating to the claims of Admiral Colomb as the inventor of the system of flashing signals in use in the Navy will include copies of the Correspondence between Major General Henry P. Babbage and the First Lord of the Admiralty regarding the title of his father, the late Charles Babbage, M.A., F.R.S., &c., to the invention?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have only undertaken that the Official Correspondence relating to the claims of Admiral Colomb shall be presented to Parliament, and this is voluminous in itself. I see no advantage in adding to it the letters alluded to, as the question is not who invented flashing signals, but the value of Admiral Colomb's system in adapting such signals to naval purposes.

In answer to further questions from Mr. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester), and Mr. BRADLAUGH,

LORD G. HAMILTON: I must adhere to my answer, that it would be useless to add to the Correspondence the letters I refer to. If Mr. Babbage or any other person was the real inventor of the system of flashing signals, he could have made his title good in a Court of Law.

POSTAGE OF VACCINATION CERTIFICATES.

MR. THOMAS SUTHERLAND: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that in Scotland the form of vaccination certificate given out to be filled up on the registration of a child's birth is charged at the rate of a penny postage, instead of a halfpenny as in England; and if he will have this difference of charge remedied?

MR. RAIKES: Mere certificates are passed at the book-rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in Scotland as well as in this country. But vaccination notices are considered to be letters, and the charging of letter postage in the cases to which the hon. Member refers has no doubt arisen from the fact that the certificates have been accompanied by the notices. I am, however, now in correspondence with the Registrar General of Scotland with a view to an arrangement which, I trust, will be satisfactory.

THE DISCONTENT AMONG THE GUARDS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is true that a line regiment has been ordered to London to help the Guards in their duties; and if he will inquire into the alleged discontent in the regiment (Grenadier Guards) as to parades and drills?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The answer to both paragraphs of the hon. Member's question is—Yes.

MR. CONYBEARE: How has it come about that it should be necessary to bring a line regiment to London to assist the Guards in performing their duties?

DR. TANNER: Is it true that the unfortunate men of the Grenadier Guards have been compelled to perform night sentry duty on seven nights out of ten?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I can make no observation with respect to the last question, because the whole subject is now under inquiry. The presence of the line regiment is necessary, because, for the present moment, the number of Guards in London is short, owing to the absence of men engaged in manœuvres.

MR. EDWARD BARNARD.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the superannuation allowance proposed in the Vote in the name of Mr. Edward Barnard for £140 includes any added number of years for "special age at the time he joined, and for special technical knowledge and experience;" whether Mr. Barnard joined on the understanding that he should receive the benefit of the 20th article of the 1859 Act, and whether the War Department have decided his claim to be a fair one; and whether he will state the reasons why, if so, his claim has been refused?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No years have been added under the provisional clause, because the Treasury are unable to admit that any promise was made under due authority at the time Mr. Barnard entered the Service.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (WALES) ACT (1881) AMEND- MENT BILL.

MR. ROBERTS (Flint): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give any facilities for passing into law the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, which carries out all the recommendations made in the Report of the Royal Commission appointed by the Government to inquire into the operation of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say that the Government are not in a position to give facilities for this Bill.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the appropriation of the money provided for the purposes of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise Duties) Bill, Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration that these taxes were voted with the express intention of making good to the County Councils the deficiency in the sums promised in 1888 arising from the withdrawal of the Excise Duties (Local Purposes) Bill in that year; and whether, having regard to the probability that the tax will considerably exceed the estimate, Her Majesty's Government will take this opportunity of placing sufficient sums at the disposal of County Councils to enable them to establish or aid technical schools within their jurisdiction, and also to enable them to aid subordinate Sanitary Authorities in dealing with unhealthy areas and premises under the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, about to be passed this Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must refer the hon. Member to the many answers I have given to questions of a similar nature.

MR. CHANNING: But, Sir, this raises a new point. Cannot the right hon. Gentleman state whether the money will be appropriated to Imperial or local purposes?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can give no further assurance.

MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the strong objections taken by the inhabitants of Malta to pay the expenses of Sir Lintorn Simmons's special Mission to the Vatican, on the ground that the Mission was despatched by the Imperial Government acting on its own exclusive responsibility, and that neither they nor their representatives had any voice in the matter; and whether, under the circumstances, he will consider the advisability of placing on the Estimates a Vote for the Mission in question? I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that Mr. Savona brought forward a Motion in the Council of Government at Malta, on 20th June, to the effect that—

"The payment of all the expenses incurred for Sir Lintorn Simmons's special Mission to the Vatican out of the revenue of Malta, without taking the vote of the elected Members thereon, was made in violation of the 29th section of Her Majesty's Letters Patent of the 12th December, 1887, and that the amount so paid should, therefore, be refunded;"

that a majority of the elected Members of the Council voted in favour of this Resolution; that the three salaried elected Members of the Executive Council who voted against it have since resigned; and that the Council of Government has been adjourned sine die, without completing the business which it had under its consideration; and whether he can give the House any information on this subject?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Her Majesty's Government are aware that objections have been taken by some of the Members of the Council of Government of Malta to the payment of the expenses of the Mission to the Vatican out of Malta funds on the grounds mentioned. As the Mission related exclusively to Maltese affairs, Her Majesty's Government do not propose to place a Vote on the Estimates. In answer to the second question of the hon. Member, Mr. Savona did bring forward a Motion in the Council of Government in the terms stated. The Motion was not carried. Eight of the elected Members of the Council voted in favour of the Motion, and six against it. The three salaried elected Members of the Executive Council who voted against the Motion have tendered their resignation, which has not been accepted. The Council of Government has been adjourned, in consequence of the tender of resignation by the three Members of the Executive Council, without completing the business before it. I have no further information to communicate to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: This is a subject in which Irish Members take an intense interest, regarding it as an attempt by a side wind to bring the authority of the Government to bear on Rome, via Malta. I beg to ask what opportunity will be given of discussing the policy of the despatch of Sir L. Simmons to Malta?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I apprehend, although I do not speak with certainty, there will be an opportunity for a discussion to take place on the subject on the Colonial Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Irish Members will certainly raise that most important question, either on the Colonial Vote or on some other occasion.

IRELAND—THE POTATO BLIGHT.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the reports from West Cork and several parts of Kerry County, stating that, owing to the continued bad weather, the potato blight has made its appearance in those districts; whether the Government have any information on the matter; and, in view of the serious nature of these reports as affecting a large number of poor people, whether he will cause inquiries to be made on the subject?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The reports before the Irish Government lead to the conclusion that the recent continuous wet weather has had the effect mentioned in the first paragraph of the question. The matter is receiving the careful attention of the Government, and all possible inquiries have been and will continue to be made.

EMERGENCY MEN.

MR. SHEIL (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that the emergency men occupying the house of Miss N. Kieran, of Castletown, Navan, County Meath, are in the habit of indulging in revolver practice beneath the windows of the house; that besides the lady named above two others dwell in it, one of whom is so ill that it is impossible to remove her, and that her life has been seriously endangered; and whether he will take steps to put an end to this conduct of the emergency men?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the facts are not accurately stated in the question. On one occasion only did one of the caretakers referred to discharge his revolver. His object is stated to have been to frighten some crows from a field of potatoes under his charge.

LAND COMMISSION—MR. SUB-COMMISSIONER FRAZER.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is true that Mr. Robert Frazer has recently been appointed a Sub-Commissioner to fix fair rents; whether this is the same Mr. Frazer who formerly applied to have a fair rent fixed on a farm near Donaghmore which he held from the Dowager Lady Castletown, with regard to whom the Chairman of the Sub-Commission said—

"We have had frequently Mr. Frazer, the tenant of this farm, before us as a valuer, generally for landlords, and certainly if we took his valuations as a standard to base the value of this land on, we should be obliged to increase instead of decrease the rent. However, we give him the benefit of our own estimation of its value and reduce the rent. We must say we consider this the worst managed farm we have come across for a long time;"

and whether he can state what Mr. Frazer's qualifications are for the office to which he has been appointed?

*MR. MADDEN: In May last, Mr. Frazer was merely appointed temporarily to perform the duties of an Assistant Commissioner, who was absent on sick leave. When this gentleman returned to work, Mr. Frazer ceased to be employed, and has no claim for further employment. Mr. Frazer is the same person who applied to have a fair rent fixed in the Queen's County, to which reference is made in the second paragraph. That farm, however, appears to have been merely a small outlying grass holding, containing some 40 acres, and on which Mr. Frazer did not reside. As regards his qualifications, I am informed that he is a practical farmer, holding altogether nearly 500 acres.

LAND COMMISSION—MOUNTMELICK UNION.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can state how many cases of tenants from the Mountmellick Union, who had served originating notices to have fair rents fixed, were heard by the Sub-Commissioners sitting at Maryborough last month; how many cases were postponed; and why the case of Mr. Carroll, of Gossbrook, in the Mountmellick Union, who served an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed as long ago as October, 1887, has not yet been heard?

*MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners report that 57 cases from the Mountmellick Union were listed for hearing at Maryborough, and were heard and disposed of on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of June. Three cases were postponed; one in consequence of the recent death of the landlord; one at the request of the parties to effect an arrangement of the future rent; and one for the purpose of ascertaining the proper area of the holding. The case of Mr. Carroll, of Gossbrook, will appear on the list for 8th October next, with other cases from the same district. This case was not in the same district as the cases which appeared for hearing on recent lists.

BALLYMENA UNION.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report in the Belfast Morning News of 30th June, of the proceedings at the last meeting of the Guardians of the Union of Ballymena; and whether, considering that the Master of the Workhouse has practically denied the serious charges made against him, and considering, also, the explanation given by the Matron of the charges made against her, he will consider whether it is not desirable to cause a sworn inquiry to be held to investigate these charges?

*MR. MADDEN: The Local Government Board, having received and considered the explanations in writing of the Master and Matron of the Ballymena Workhouse in regard to the charges made against them, have determined that it is a case in which a sworn inquiry should be held. They have accordingly directed one of their Inspectors to proceed with such inquiry.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Phoenix Park was declared an infected area within the past 12 months because of an outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia amongst the cattle grazing thereon; who owned these cows, and who sanctioned their being in the Park; what loss have the taxpayers sustained for compensation to the owners; will the Government in future prevent the annoyance caused to the public by allowing cows to graze in the Park; and by whose authority has the lower portion of the Park, near the Hibernian School, been railed in from the public, and for what purpose?

*MR. JACKSON: The Phoenix Park was declared an infected area on September 16, 1889, in consequence of an outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia among the cattle grazing in it, and the Order is still in force. The cattle referred to were the property of Mr. R. G. Nash, of Howth. They were, in accordance with the usual practice, taken in for grazing by the Commissioners of Public Works, who are the custodians of the Park. I have no information as to the loss the taxpayers sustained by the payment of compensation to the owner. The Park is now, under the advice of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, being grazed with sheep, and this arrangement will be continued so long as there is any liability to an outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia among cattle. The plot of ground near the Hibernian School has been railed in for many years under the authority of the Commissioners of Public Works, being meadow land, the hay from which is used for feeding the deer in winter.

Mr. Madden

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not stated what the loss to the taxpayer has been, nor has he explained why it is that the Board of Works, in spite of the repeated expression of opinion on the part of the Irish Members, still allow cattle to graze in the Phoenix Park. I myself warned him last year against the practice, and the ratepayers have now lost £600 in consequence of allowing it.

*MR. JACKSON: I have given the information I was asked to give. I was asked a specific question, and I am told by the Board of Works that they have no information that will enable them to give the figures.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not the fact that when this herd of cattle was ordered to be slaughtered under the Pleuro-Pneumonia Act a claim was immediately made by the owner for so much per head? Surely if that is the case the loss may be easily calculated even at the Board of Works.

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member had better give notice of the question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will put down another question.

INDECENT ADVERTISEMENTS ACT.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he will state why "The Indecent Advertisements Act, 1889," is not more stringently enforced in the Dublin Metropolitan Police and Clontarf districts; and have any prosecutions taken place within those areas?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the police are watching the advertisements closely, and are making every effort to enforce the Statute. I am further informed that since the Statute came into operation the phraseology of certain objectionable advertisements has been modified. Several cases have been reported for prosecution. Of these, the strongest was taken as a test case. It was adjourned for a week and then dismissed, the Magistrate expressing his regret at having to adopt such a course. No opportunity will be lost of instituting further proceedings where there is a likelihood of obtaining a conviction.

MR. WILLIAM BLOOD.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I see there is a question on the Paper in my name to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. William Blood, of Cranaher, County Clare, was twice fired at within the past 12 months while under protection of the police, first on the public highway in the middle of the day, and secondly, into Mr. Blood's house while he was sitting at the fire; whether the bullets found in the house, and alleged to be fired, were found to be of the Constabulary rifle and revolver pattern; whether any investigation as regard the police on protection duty was made; and, if so, with what result; and whether any arrests were made in connection with either of the alleged outrages? The question appears on the Paper to-day without my knowledge. I did not authorise it to be put down. I may say, however, that the question now appears as I originally handed it in. It may be remembered that on the last occasion I had to complain of its mutilation. I have now to ask whether the two attempts, by shooting, on the life of Mr. Blood, within the past 12 months, are included in the Returns of Irish Agrarian Outrages; and, if not, under what head do they appear?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the outrages referred to are recorded in the printed Returns under the following heads, namely:—First, Firing at the person—not agrarian; second, Firing into Dwelling—not agrarian.

WEATHER FORECASTS.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the following statement of the officer in charge of the Ballycastle (Antrim) Coastguard division, which is given in the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries:—

"There should be more knowledge of forecasts of weather, and if the system of hoisting drums were carried out at Port Ballintrae and Portrush it would be advantageous, the fishermen at those places being very persevering. At the former place two boats lost their long lines on two separate occasions, owing to unforeseen gales coming on;"

and if, in consequence of this suggestion, it is proposed to arrange that drums shall in future be hoisted, so as to allow the fishermen of these ports to have the advantage of weather forecasts?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed by the Meteorological Council that they are quite prepared to issue storm warnings to Portrush and Port Ballintrae if local arrangements are made for publishing them.

NATIONAL LEAGUE MEETING AT TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that a meeting of the suppressed branch of the National League at Tipperary was held on Sunday, the 29th ultimo, and that after the meeting was over, from 500 to 600 men marched into the town in a body; whether any steps were taken by the police to prevent the holding of this meeting, and do meetings of this branch regularly take place once a fortnight, where speeches are delivered; and is it the intention of the Government to allow these meetings to be held in the future; and, if so, will the Government announce its intention, so that the members of the branch may not be put to the trouble of holding them in secret?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that there was no outdoor meeting of the suppressed branch of the League at Tipperary on the date mentioned; and, also, that it is not a fact that 500 or 600 men marched into the town. The Government has no intention as that expressed in the last paragraph of the question.

"BARRY v. BALL."

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that the civil action of Mr. Barry, Poor Law Guardian, against District Inspector Ball, Royal Irish Constabulary, Fermoy, is fixed for Thursday next; and, in view of the fact that Mr. Barry is at present in Cork Prison as a bail prisoner, whether he can state if there are any means open to the Prisons Board by which they can have Mr. Barry produced at the Court on Thursday, or any later day on which the action may be taken?

MR. MADDEN: My attention was called to this matter through the previous question on the subject put by the hon. Member. As I then stated, while the General Prisons Board have no power to produce the bail prisoner in Court, there would not be the least difficulty in his obtaining a writ of habeas corpus, which would enable him to attend at the hearing of the case.

ALLEGED DEATH BY VIOLENCE IN A LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with reference to the verdict of the Coroner's Jury on the inquest on Christopher O'Connor, who they found came to his death by violence in the Richmond District Lunatic Asylum, whether the Inspectors of Lunatics have made any Report on the case; and what steps he intends to take to find out by whom the injuries were inflicted?

*MR. MADDEN: The Inspectors have called for copies of the depositions at the inquest. Upon receiving them, they will be in a position to consider the matter.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask whether the First Lord of the Treasury proposes to make any statement as to the course of business, and whether the Government have formed the intention of summoning Parliament for a new Session in November?

Mr. Madden

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The House will remember that I undertook to make a statement respecting the course of public business, if, as I then hoped, the Committee on Procedure should report at an early date. I now hear from my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee that it has adjourned until Monday, and that after what has occurred in the Committee we cannot hold out any certain expectation of an immediate termination of its labours. In these circumstances, I have thought it advisable and respectful to the House not to delay making a statement as to the course which the Government are prepared to take for the future conduct of public business. The first question which the Government had to consider was whether it was desirable in the second half of July to interpose a prolonged and possibly an acrimonious Debate in order to secure the passing of a Standing Order to which they attach great importance in the present Session. I had hoped that that Standing Order would be received with favour in all parts of the House as an improvement in our procedure; but I need not refer further to the opinion which I formed, as it does not appear to be shared unanimously by hon. Members. The Government have decided in the negative—that is to say, not to press this Standing Order in the course of the present Session, at the same time reserving to themselves absolute freedom of action in the future. It follows that they will not proceed with the Land Purchase Bill or the Tithe Bill before the prorogation; but, having regard to the great importance of those measures, they intend to re-introduce them at the earliest opportunity in the next Session, which, as at present advised, they propose shall begin at a much earlier period than is customary. In this way, whilst it is the desire of the Government and the intention of the Government to deal at an early date with that which they regard as important legislation, it will also be possible to meet the wish expressed this Session by the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division, and supported in the Division which followed, for a much earlier prorogation of Parliament. It now remains for me to indicate generally the more important measures with which the Government intend to proceed this Session. They are the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, the Police Bill, the Heligoland Bill, the Local Taxation Bill, and the Census Bill. There will also be one or two Departmental measures which I need not particularise. In these circumstances, I think I may assume that the House will be ready to give Wednesdays for public business, and I shall make the necessary Motion on Monday next.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not told us the date at which the Government propose that the new Session shall begin.

MR. W. H. SMITH: We intend that we should meet at a much earlier period than usual, and the Motion of the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division pointed to a meeting in November. As at present advised, Her Majesty's Government think it would be right to ask the House to meet in November, but we hope not until after the first part.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I hope the Government will give an opportunity to ascertain the general feeling of the House as to whether the meeting of Parliament should be in November or at an early date in January. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman should take some means of ascertaining the general feeling of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider the climatic conditions that prevail in London in November. When we met in November, 1888, for the purpose of considering the Land Purchase Bill, the fog rendered Debate almost impossible.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Are we to understand that the Land Purchase Bill will be the first measure dealt with in the new Session?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford will see that any condition of atmosphere which would tend in the slightest degree to the shortening of Debate would be a great advantage. With regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, I am sure he will see that it rests with the Government to recommend Her Majesty as to the period at which Parliament should be called together, and I think it is necessary that they retain to themselves that responsibility. They have not formed the conclusion at which they have arrived without first taking due precautions to ascertain the feeling of hon. Members.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to express the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will bring the Census Bill forward at a time when there can be a discussion upon it.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Can the right hon. Gentleman state what the Departmental Bills are?

MR. W. H. SMITH: From the right hon. Gentleman's experience, both in the Government and in the House, he must know what the Departmental Bills are. The Government will endeavour to give a fair opportunity to the House to discuss the Census Bill, but I may add that there is no change in it. It will practically be the same as the Bill of 1880, which, I believe, met with general approval.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to know whether the House is to understand from the answer given very succinctly by the right hon. Gentleman that the Government have already determined that the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill is to take precedence of all other important measures in the coming Session, thereby reversing the order in which it stood with regard to the Tithe Bill in the present Session? I wish also to ask with regard to the right hon. Gentleman's answer to the question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, that it rests with the Government to advise Her Majesty as to the period of the prorogation and summoning of Parliament—in which, of course, I quite agree—whether that is a reason why the House should have no opportunity of expressing its opinion upon a matter so very gravely affecting the convenience of Members, and likewise a matter concerning the progress of public business, upon which hon. Members must be supposed to have some opportunity of forming an opinion which may be of use to the Government in determining what advice they should tender to Her Majesty?

MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman as to the Land Purchase Bill, I have already indicated the views of Her Majesty's Government at the present time. It is impossible to say what circumstances may occur to qualify those views, but it certainly is our intention to put the Land Purchase Bill forward, so that it can be dealt with by the House at the earliest possible opportunity. With regard to the other questions of the right hon. Gentleman, if he will be so kind as to point out any occasion in his experience on which the House has been consulted prior to the assembling of Parliament at a period unusual, but determined upon with reference to the better management of business, I should be exceedingly glad to consult that precedent. But there are methods of finding out the view of hon. Members with which the right hon. Gentleman is acquainted, and which have satisfied us that it would be for the convenience of the House, on the whole, that we should meet in November, at all events, by way of experiment, with the object and intention of rising in July.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: This is simply a question, not of determining the matter, but of allowing Members an opportunity of expressing their opinion. Undoubtedly, as the right hon. Gentleman is well aware, there have been occasions on which Members of the House have partially expressed their opinion, and the right hon. Gentleman has himself referred to the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton as having been a matter which has given light to the Government in considering the course they will pursue; and now the Government have come nearer to the point and are about to determine the matter, I must own that it appears to me, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it does not seem to him, to be a moderate claim that there should be some opportunity given to the House to express its opinion.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I did not ask the right hon. Gentleman that a vote of the House should be taken upon the matter. The right hon. Gentleman may have communicated with some hon. Members, but I do not think any communication has reached hon. Members on this side of the House upon the subject. I never heard of the suggestion to meet in November until I saw it in the newspapers this morning. All I ask of the right hon. Gentleman is that, having indicated that it is the wish of the Government, they will not announce it as a decision from which they cannot recede. Assuming that the Land Purchase Bill is to be the first measure next Session, if you meet at the end of the first week in January, you would have three weeks in January in which you might dispose of the Debate on the Address — at all events, I have never known a Debate on the Address take more than three weeks, not even when it was conducted by right hon. Gentlemen on the Bench opposite — I repeat we might dispose of the Debate on the Address and the Second Reading of the Land Purchase Bill before the end of January, and I say that with the assent of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. If that were so, on February 1 you might go into Committee on the Irish Land Purchase Bill, and dispose of that stage in the course of February, March, and April. The legitimate object you have in view might be accomplished by meeting on January 10, which would give you four weeks before the usual time of meeting.

*MR. J. TALBOT (Oxford University): I wish to ask my right hon. Friend to bear in mind the great importance of getting the Tithe Bill passed before the winter is far advanced. Therefore, if Parliament meets again in November, I would urge upon my right hon. Friend that the Government should, if possible, make the Tithe Bill the first measure of the Session.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Will the Savings Bank Bill be proceeded with?

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): As reference has been made by the right hon. Gentleman to the Division on an early occasion this year, and the deductions the Government have drawn as to the feeling of the House, may I ask him whether he is aware that a very great number of Members voted on the Main Question whether they could get a considerable part of the summer away from the House of Commons, and that a considerable number of Members who voted for the Resolution believed that that could be done by meeting at the end of the first week in January, and it was only in case that failed to secure a good part of the summer that a considerable number of those who voted in the minority would then very likely have gone over and voted in favour of meeting in November or December? I would also ask whether it is not the case that the actual number of working weeks in the House is, according to the usual proceedings of the Session, 25, and whether, in case we met at the end of the first week in January, those 25 weeks and two weeks for an Easter holiday would not have been secured before the middle of July?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider how much it would soothe the declining hours of the present Session if the Irish Members were consulted with regard to the allocation of a certain surplus arising out of a certain dropped measure?

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposes to make his Motion with regard to the Government taking Wednesday Sittings?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Monday.

MR. LEA: Then I give the right hon. Gentleman notice that I shall certainly oppose his Motion. I would also ask him whether he is aware that the first business now on the Paper for Wednesday next is the Irish Intoxicating Liquors Bill, the Second Reading of which was carried in this House by a majority of 166; and whether he is aware of the enormous interest taken in that measure in all parts of Ireland?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Am I right in supposing that the Government intend to proceed with the Scotch Police Bill as well as with the English Police Bill; and is it intended to proceed with the Scotch Private Bill Procedure Bill?

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): If the House meets in November, at what time in the new year will it re-assemble?

MR. SEXTON: I would like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he proposes to secure for Ireland the allocation of the £40,000 under the Local Taxation Bill within the present year, and whether it cannot be done by a clause inserted in the Appropriation Bill?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman need have no anxiety as to the withdrawal of the £40,000 from Ireland. It shall be secured in one way or another, but it would be premature to deal with the matter at the present time.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will consider the possibility of the Financial Statement for India being presented before the last days of the Session; and whether he is aware that the explanatory Memorandum, which last year was issued on the 15th of May, has not yet been laid upon the Table?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Savings Banks Bill obviously cannot be proceeded with if it is an opposed Bill. In regard to the allocation of the surplus, I am not able to add anything to what I have already stated as to the Local Taxation Bill, but the Government will come to a consideration of that question in the course of a very few days. I have listened, with the greatest attention and with every desire to meet the views of hon. Members and right hon. Gentlemen, to their remarks with regard to the period of the Session; but I think they must be content with the assurance that their suggestions will be received with the consideration which they deserve, and that we do feel ourselves responsible for calling Parliament together for the business to be transacted. And when we have called Parliament together we shall endeavour, as far as possible, to consult the convenience of hon. Gentlemen. I do strongly deprecate the idea that this arrangement will add to the length of the Session. I think there is a strong wish on the part of hon. Members on both sides of the House that we should get away into the country earlier this summer than we have done. As far as the Government are concerned, we shall make every endeavour to bring the Session to an end at a period which will correspond with the earlier meeting of Parliament. With regard to the Scotch Police Bill, it is our wish to proceed with that measure. I hope that it will be referred to a Select Committee this evening, and that it will come back to the House in a form in which it will be possible to deal with it. In regard to the Indian Budget, I will endeavour that it shall be taken at an earlier period if possible. I was not aware that the Memorandum referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton had not yet been issued; but I will communicate with my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India on the subject. With regard to the Scotch Procedure Bill, the question is whether it is opposed. [Mr. H. H. FOWLER: It is opposed.] I hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton say that he does oppose it, and we cannot in these circumstances proceed with it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: As the right hon. Gentleman has spoken of suggestions from this side of the House, and as it appears to be very doubtful whether there will be any opportunity of giving an opinion in detail in Debate, I cannot help expressing my strong conviction, with regard to this very well-intended plan of shortening the Session, that if we begin our meeting in November, and if no other method is adopted, the inevitable effect of that will be, not to shorten, but to lengthen the Session.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

* (4.50.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): On a previous occasion the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (MR. T. M. HEALY) asked me whether it would be possible to put these two Votes separately. The Estimates presented this year reduce the number of Votes by combining a certain number of them together. One of the combined Votes is for the salaries of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. The Estimates were subsequently referred to the Public Accounts Committee, and the Government frankly and completely accepted their recommendations, and, as a consequence, the two Votes now combined will next year be presented separately. It is proposed this year that there shall be no transfer between the two Votes as regards this year's accounts, and, as I have found it is possible to propose the Votes as separate Votes on this occasion, I propose, with the leave of the Committee, to take that course.

(4.53.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think it was a strong order for the Treasury to attempt to take the course they sought to take in this matter without any authority or precedent whatsoever. When the Closure was passed, I prophesied that an attempt would be made to extend the operation of the Closure by putting more matter into a clause, but I never dreamed for a moment that the Constitutional Authorities at the Treasury would attempt to dovetail one Vote into another for mere Closure purposes. I stigmatise the attempt made by the Treasury to consolidate these Votes as a most unfortunate one for the Department; and I am very glad to find that, after attention has been publicly called to the subject, the Treasury have been obliged to recede from their position. But that does not relieve the Treasury from the imputation which they will be under—that they have endeavoured to subordinate for Closure purposes matters of Treasury detail and management. I would advise the Treasury, if they again desire to throw dust in the eyes of the House, to confine that dust to English and Scotch optics, and not to ours.

*MR. JACKSON: It is due to the Treasury, and particularly to the Departmental Treasury, to say that the proposals made were made on the authority of the Government. In framing the proposals no idea of combining Votes for Closure purposes ever entered into their calculation. The hon. and learned Gentleman says there is no authority or precedent for what has been done. I assure him there is both authority and precedent, and what was done was recommended by a Committee.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in the last sentence which he uttered. What was recommended by the Committee on Estimate Procedure was that the scheme for throwing some of the Votes together should be submitted to the House, not that the Votes should be thrown together and the Estimates introduced in the altered form. I think the right hon. Gentleman has to-day taken a course which was obviously the proper course to follow.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. and learned Member for North Longford has said that a reduction in the number of Votes was suggested by the Treasury for Closure purposes. The reduction in the number of Votes was suggested by the Select Committee.

(5.0.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I am glad there is a division of the Votes. I do not say that in the present instance the combination would lead to any very great inconvenience, but in the future it might lead to very great inconvenience, indeed. We have now a Chief Secretary who is a very strong man, and we have a Lord Lieutenant who is remarkable only because his title begins with the last letter of the alphabet. But for this fact I do not know that there would be many people here or in Ireland who would remember who the present Lord Lieutenant is. But it may happen in the future that we may have a strong Lord Lieutenant and a mild-mannered gentleman like the Attorney General to represent him in this House, and under such circumstances it might be awkward to have to discuss the two Votes together, for we might find ourselves visiting on the head of the inoffensive Chief Secretary the censure we intended for the Lord Lieutenant.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(5.2.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I understand there was an intimation at the close of last Session, and it was generally mooted that there was some intention to make a statement as to the continuance of the office of Lord Lieutenant. We heard that a number of Conservative gentlemen, hon. and gallant Members on the other side, Ulster Members of the Conservative Party, intended to make a tremendous onslaught upon this Vote this year.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be quite outside the scope of this Vote to discuss the salary of the Lord Lieutenant, which, as the hon. and learned Gentleman is aware, is charged upon the Consolidated Fund. This is a Vote for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant. Any question of general constitutional policy in Ireland should be raised on the Chief Secretary's Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, Sir; but I apprehend the expenses of the Household are the consequence of the office of Lord Lieutenant; and if we had no Lord Lieutenant, it naturally follows we should have no Household to provide for; abolish him, and his Household would be abolished. However, Sir, if you can point out the distinction by which we can discuss the propriety of abolishing the Household, and leave the Lord Lieutenant standing, I will endeavour to obey your direction. I will endeavour to narrow my observations within the sense you have indicated. I will only say, in regard to the expenses of the Household, that we did expect to hear from hon. Members opposite or from the Government some statement expressive of their views as to the continuance of the Lord Lieutenant's Household.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: That being so, I ask if the Government are now prepared to say whether His Excellency's Household—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. and learned Gentleman knows that discussion must be confined to the expenses of the Household.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course, Sir, if you rule that we must discuss it from an £ s. d. point of view merely, accepting the existence of the Household, I presume it would be impossible now for Her Majesty's Government to make such a statement, though it was mooted abroad that the Government had such an intention.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No, Sir; I do not propose to make any statement.

(5.6.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): This Vote is an old friend. I am sorry the Financial Secretary is not here, for I was going to ask him a question upon the Estimates; that is, under what head of the Irish Votes an item is included which I thought to have found here, but do not—I mean the Vote for the Ulster King-at-Arms. But I suppose it will turn up ultimately.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not recollect just now where the item appears. I think in the latter class of Votes.

MR. MAC NEILL: Well, we have the Votes now divided, and have to deal with the Household first, and we find that for servants and keeping up of the Household we are to vote £4,500. I take, first, the Spiritual Department—the Chaplains—and for this alone £789 is expended. That is a very small sum, but it touches a matter of principle; and I should ask to be forgiven perhaps if on a Vote in Supply, I make a personal allusion. As a member of the Irish Church, I do most strongly object to this State support of a chaplain in Dublin Castle. It is the very last relic of an Established Church in Ireland, the last relic of a shameful system which connected the Church with Dublin Castle; and as an earnest member of the Church, I should like to see this last relic of a State Church abolished. If this £789 were taken to-day and thrown into the Thames it would not be less wisely applied. The Chaplain at Dublin Castle is a gentleman whom I know very well, and for whom I have a very great esteem. He has another cure in Dublin. In former times the Dean of the Chapel Royal held the post as a stepping stone to a Bishopric. He had rooms in Dublin Castle; he was a Member of the Viceregal Court; he dined every day with the Lord Lieutenant; he was part of the Household. Under the new system, that is, since the Irish Church Disestablishment, this office, formerly something more than a sinecure, has now become considerably less than a sinecure, and the salary is taken by a gentleman who is rector of St. Andrew's, Dublin. He has £150 a year added to his chaplain's salary. This is an example in a small thing of what is done in greater things. This is an addition in lieu of rooms in the Castle simply because, as the Attorney General for Ireland very well knows, Dr. Nicholson has attached to his rectorate a very fine residence, and, therefore, does not require what were formerly the chaplain's rooms in the Castle, and so the Government give him £150 a year more because he has a residence of his own. Is this not a small example of the heartless, wanton waste and jobbery that run through Irish administration? Money is a thing of relative value, and what £5 is to one man 1d. is to another. We know how the gross amount of taxation weighs heavily upon the poor, and is it not a heartless, wasteful thing to take the public money thus and give it to a gentleman simply because he does not take, because he does not need them, the rooms formerly belonging to the office he holds in Dublin Castle? This chapel in Dublin Castle is not used by the Dublin Court, nor is it a place of worship of popular resort. We have in Dublin an exquisite Cathedral with full choral services—St. Patrick's—and this the Lord Lieutenant attends in the afternoon. In the morning he goes to the chapel at the Hibernian Military School, and within short distances he has churches on all sides. In former days the chapel in the Castle was frequented by hangers-on to the Court, that dubious class of persons ever on the look-out for an appointment or the means to advance their social position, and these used to visit the chapel for worship or to stare at the Lord Lieutenant; but he does not go there now. This beautiful chapel, for so it is, has been converted into a military chapel, and the Protestant troops in Dublin attend there. The arrangements for conducting State worship have been practically abolished, yet still we have these expenses on the Estimates. Here are expenses for reading clerk, choristers, and boy choristers, and choral services which are absolutely unnecessary. For those Protestants who admire a choral service there are such services at Christ Church and at St. Patrick's Cathedral. This is kept up, I say, as the relic of an old system, and as, I should say, a pernicious system, having regard to the true interest of the Church of which I am a member. With regard to the present holder of the office of chaplain, I say he would have been appointed to a Bishopric long ago under the free election of the Irish Church, but such an appointment is retarded by his connection with Dublin Castle. Only one good sermon, so far as I know, was ever preached in this Chapel Royal, and that was on the occasion when Dean Swift, one of the first chaplains, preached his eloquent sermon on the broomstick. And now, leaving this spiritual provision, I come upon large sums for service and attendance, and a waste of public money. Here are 17 attachés, I may call them, though they have different positions. I recollect a celebrated actor once saying the most difficult thing to do on the stage was to do nothing, but here are 17 supers who perform that difficult task on the Viceregal stage. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in a brilliant speech once said he only knew within his experience five literary men who subsisted upon their pen, but I think he may now add a sixth in the person of the private secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. This gentleman draws the handsome income of £829 0s. 8d., and what does he do for it? Since Lord Zetland has been in office, I do not remember a single public letter from him. There have been one or two answers to addresses, and I believe on one occasion Lord Zetland made a speech of three or four minutes' duration, and these may have been prepared by the private secretary; but sure I am that since Lord Zetland was appointed, Mr. John Mulholland, his private secretary, must have received £100 for each letter of a public character he has written. Now, we come to four aides-de-camp at £200 each. Their duties, I believe, consist of standing about in more or less picturesque attitudes on the few occasions when receptions are held at Dublin Castle. They help to give distinction to this vulgar, gingerbread Court. Then follow various other officers. The State Steward—I am sure I do not know what he does. I had an acquaintance with an ex-steward from Dublin Castle under a very different régime, and he told me that his duty was to introduce ladies to gentlemen at dances. For this important and delicate duty he is paid £505 19s. 4d. This is very amusing as a farce, but it is very real indeed when we remember that these are items in the heavy taxation of our poorer countrymen. The Comptroller—what does he do? He has a kind of fixed tenure of his office which I believe he has held for 20 years. He pays, I think, the Viceregal Household, and for this he is well paid himself at £413 13s. 4d. Following the catalogue we come upon the Gentleman Usher; what his function is I do not know, except to receive the cards of those who come to leave them. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can give us some information, although the right hon. Gentleman himself does not appear at these public receptions, upon which I congratulate him. Next comes a Chamberlain at £200, and then the Master of the Horse. There are no horses, but for the mastery of the pretended horses this official draws £200 a year. Then comes a group of three Gentlemen in Waiting, gentlemen waiting for something to turn up, for some crumbs from the Viceregal table of patronage, some Resident Magistracy, or vacant office; meanwhile, they are solaced with salaries amounting to £443. There are many such gentlemen waiting for what may happen; possibly the right hon. Gentleman himself may be added to the number after the next General Election. Why, if we pursue our investigation, we shall find that this establishment is merely an asylum, a means of providing pensions for idle, lounging members of the aristocracy. Among others, we find a son of our old friend Mr. Olphert, of Falcarragh, getting £184 12s. 8d. Next passes in review the Surgeon of the Household with £100, an amount which is either too little or too much. If he does anything at all in the way of keeping the Household in health £100 is too little; if he does nothing, which I strongly suspect is the case, then it is too much. Then there are other items which go to make up the gross sum of this waste of public money. A State porter, an old Army pensioner, £61 13s. 3d.; a sergeant of the Riding House £30—the Riding House does not exist. Remember all this expenditure, and more of the same kind, comes from our constituents, and we who know the intense poverty of our people are justified in contesting this waste of money penny by penny. If we can we will prevent this robbery. Here I come to the evidence of a job to which I have before called attention. I have been four years in Parliament, and here is my only legislative achievement. I have succeeded in staying the expenditure of 5s. a day upon a telegraphist at the Viceregal Lodge for doing nothing. The distance between the Viceregal Lodge and Dublin Castle is a mile and a half, and no telegraphic messages are sent from the one to the other. I believe such messages are sent from the Chief Secretary's Lodge during the time the Chief Secretary is there, which may be six or seven weeks during the year. This salary of 5s. a day for every day in the year is now, I see, only to be paid during the lifetime of the present holder of the office; but I say, if the Lord Lieutenant chooses to make provision for the man out of his own extravagant salary, by all means let him do so, but it should not be given at the public expense. I hope we shall not be met with the trite and somewhat absurd statement that if we maintain a Viceregal Court at all, we must pay to keep it up. I am curious to know what defence the right hon. Gentleman can make. It is of no use to tell us these things come down to us an evil legacy from a bad old time. If it be not for public benefit that these men should receive public money for nothing, then we, as Trustees for the public, should do our duty by knocking off these sums; we have no right to say these men shall be gainers at the expense of the country. Unhappily, the Chief Secretary knows very little about Ireland. I sometimes feel irritated at his observations, until I remember that he is simply giving official information. If he examined things for himself, I cannot but think he would come to very different conclusions; but as it is, he simply adopts the statements of interested persons. Why, again, I ask, the payment of £789 for the Chaplains' Department? It is wholly unnecessary. The Lord Lieutenant may be of a very different religion to that of the late Disestablished Church; he may be a Hindoo; he may be anything, or nothing; only he may not be a Catholic. It is one of the worst instances in this list of jobs. Under the system of former times the outgoing Lord Lieutenant was, of course, not able to retain these various gentlemen, or the retinue of Dublin Castle, and it was left to his successor to make appointments; but now, under the new régime, most of these 17 officials are fixtures, and have retained their appointments through the reigns of several Lords Lieutenant. It is difficult to remove them, but, none the less, it is time these abuses, these mischievous attempts by a sham aristocracy to keep up a shoddy Court, were swept away.

Mr. T. M. Healy

(5.27.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): There is one part of the Vote to which my hon. Friend has not given much notice, the salary of the Master of the Horse, who, as a foot-note informs us, also receives £276 a year as the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare. I should like to know from the Chief Secretary what are the duties of the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare, valued at £276 a year. That which we have had occasion to find fault with in the English Estimates is here repeated—the salaries of officials are divided under different heads, and do not appear in one lump sum. Also, I should like to know what are the duties for which three Gentlemen-in-Waiting receive £443 a year. I appeal with all earnestness to the Government, is it not possible to exercise some authority in these matters? Must all this expenditure go on helping to swell the amount of taxation, while throughout Ireland we see such evidences of dire distress among the people? It would be much better if the money were spent on some deserving object in Dublin, or other parts of Ireland, instead of in supporting Gentlemen-in-Waiting. What good on earth are the Gentlemen-in-Waiting for? It would take more than three gentlemen, whether in waiting or not, to make Dublin Castle a respectable resort. As to the telegraphist at the Viceregal Lodge, I do not know what his duties are, but the chances are that he earns his £91 a year a great deal better than the Gentleman Usher earns his £200, or the Chamberlain his £200. I think that matter might be arranged by cutting down the salaries of these gentlemen, and thus providing for the telegraphist. Now, the State Steward receives £506 and the Comptroller £414 a year. What do these gentlemen do? Are they entitled to public money on any ground whatever? I do not know what the Chamberlain does; but if you are to have a Chamberlain, surely £200 is a very cheap price. Then there is the Sergeant of the Riding House. Does the Chief Secretary go riding in order to give this official employment in teaching him to ride, or does his private secretary (the Member for Dover) give the Riding Sergeant work to do? Sir, I think that all these offices are useless and ought to be abolished. The Chief Secretary should give us some explanation as to why we are asked to pay £3,875 a year for these useless offices. It is simply a waste of money, and I am sure hon. Members opposite, in their hearts, condemn it. And then I come to the Chaplain's Vote. It is a monstrous thing, in my opinion, that in a country like Ireland, where the great bulk of the people profess the Catholic religion, they should be called upon to maintain an office which no Catholic could ever find it possible to fill. I think the supporters of the Government in Dublin Castle might very well be called upon to provide their own chaplain, for we do not find that people of other religions are ever called upon to pay for a Catholic chaplain. If there is one place that requires purification by prayer or by any other means more than another, I am sure it is Dublin Castle. Still, I do not see why the Roman Catholics of Ireland should be called upon to pay a single sixpence for the purpose of maintaining a chaplain to administer to the religious wants of the Lord Lieutenant. The fact that a Roman Catholic can never hold the office of Lord Lieutenant, and that a priest can never receive this salary, makes the charge grossly unfair, and constitutes a standing and continuous insult to the people of Ireland.

(5.40.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid that I cannot give the House or the Committee any minute information on the various details referred to by hon. Members, or as to the duties of the officials of Dublin Castle. But if you are to have a Lord Lieutenant at a salary which is admittedly inadequate to cover the cost of the functions which have to be performed, I do not think it right that Parliament should complain that part of the cost is borne by the community. I have no doubt that if the Lord Lieutenant could carry out the duties of the office at the expense of £20,000, allowed out of the Consolidated Fund, he would be a great gainer; but knowing what I do of the experience of previous holders of this great office, I can tell the House that they spent a great deal more than this £3,000 charged in the Vote for these posts in excess of the £20,000 which is voted for the office. When you choose to abolish the office of Lord Lieutenant, all the other offices will, of course, disappear with it; but while you retain the Lord Lieutenant, you ought to retain these other officials. With regard to the salary of the Dean of the Chapel Royal, the hon. Member who has just sat down appears to be of the opinion that it is an insult to the Roman Catholics of Ireland that those in authority in Ireland should be Protestants.

MR. W. REDMOND: I must strongly object to the right hon. Gentleman putting that construction on my words. What I said was, that it was an insult to the Catholics that they should be called upon to pay the salary of an office which, under the present law, is impossible for a Catholic ever to fill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I take it the hon. Member's objection is that, in a Roman Catholic country, £700 a year should be paid to a Protestant chaplain.

MR. W. REDMOND: No; my point is, that in a country which is largely Roman Catholic, it is wrong to make the people support an office which cannot be occupied by one of their own religion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose the hon. Member does not object to the present holder of the office?

MR. W. REDMOND: Certainly not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand. I will not now go into the question whether or not the office of Lord Lieutenant should be abolished, but, in regard to the post of chaplain, I may remind the Committee that whatever view they take of the propriety of retaining the office, it is held for life, and therefore the money must be paid under any circumstances, for the honour of Parliament is pledged to the holder so long as he chooses to retain the appointment.

(5.43.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I understand the Chief Secretary to justify these charges on the ground that the salary of the Lord Lieutenant is insufficient to maintain the dignity of the office. That is a view which I cannot accept. The salary is, I believe, £20,000 a year, and I ask, is it not an outrage on common sense to tell us that the Lord Lieutenant, who keeps up this petty, contemptible, wretched travesty of a Court in a city which, under the present régime, has been reduced to the condition of a fourth-rate provincial town, cannot do it at a salary which is double that paid to the President of the United States, who rules over 63,000,000 of people. Nothing more grotesque could be imagined. When Abraham Lincoln ruled America he had a salary of $25,000, or £5,000, and it is ridiculous to say that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland cannot keep up his office on £20,000 without these Supplementary Votes. If that is the only argument the Chief Secretary can bring forward, it is a very poor defence. Now, let us look at the details of this Vote. We find that many of the officers are paid large salaries for doing absolutely nothing. I do protest against the assumption of the Chief Secretary that we are bound to vote blindfold large salaries out of the pockets of the taxpayers for sinecure offices. He came down to this discussion forewarned that he would be called on to defend the Vote on its merits. Yet, what was his answer? It was, "I am not able to give information as to the duties of these officials." That means that he will not take the trouble to inform himself on these points, although he knows that, as the responsible Minister of the Crown, it is his duty to defend the Votes. That is the way in which we are met. The right hon. Gentleman rose from his seat slowly and with infinite grace and announced that his duties would not allow him to examine into the details of this matter. I do not know what his duties are; but some people say that they consist of reading French novels, on which he is one of the greatest authorities. The truth is, however, that the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that there are no details to be inquired into, and that these officials have no duties to perform. All they have to do is to dress themselves in lace and silk stockings and parade about on absurd occasions when ladies are admitted to the Castle. Now, take the case of the State Steward. He receives £506 a year. I am told that his business is to introduce ladies and gentlemen when entertainments are given at Dublin Castle, and to decide who shall go into dinner first. Is it not an outrageous thing that this House should be called on to pay £506 of the taxpayers' money to a gentleman whose onerous duty it is to decide who shall have precedence in going in to dinner. I say that people do not care three farthings who goes in first or last, and the ladies and gentlemen who honour Dublin Castle by their presence ought to be left to settle the matter of precedence amongst themselves. Can the Chief Secretary name any other duty which the State Steward is called upon to perform? If he cannot, then I call on him to strike that Vote out of the Estimates. The next Vote is for four aides-de-camp to the Lord Lieutenant. These are four young gentlemen whose only duty is to dance with young ladies at Dublin Castle balls. Are we to pay military gentlemen for doing that which they should be glad enough to do for nothing? I never heard of a young officer requiring £200 a year as an inducement to dance with young ladies. The next Vote to which I have to call attention is that of £829 for the salary of the private secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. This question has been brought before the House over and over again, and in the whole of the Estimates no more disgraceful or scandalous piece of jobbery is to be found. In many of the permanent Departments of the Civil Service may be found highly-trained and valuable officials, who for years have laboured skilfully in the service of their country, and would be only too glad to get a salary like this, yet here we have an utterly untrained man chosen for this appointment. It is notorious that Mr. Mulhall has had no training of any kind whatsoever, and any ordinary ornamental young man would deem himself extremely lucky to get a salary of £200 a year and his board for performing the duties of this office. It is, I repeat, a gross and monstrous job. Now, what are the duties of this private secretary? We are told that his business is to write invitations to balls, dinners, and suppers at Dublin Castle. Surely that does not justify the payment of a salary of £829 a year. If the Lord Lieutenant, with his salary of £20,000 a year and all these hangers-on, cannot write his own letters, he had better pay his private secretary out of his own pocket, for the taxpayers of England certainly ought not to be called on to pay £829 a year to a young gentleman whose only duty, besides dining with the Lord Lieutenant, is to fill in printed cards of invitation, address the envelopes, and paste on the stamps. I would therefore suggest that the Chief Secretary should hand over his coal allowance of £400 a year to his chief private secretary. I am sure Mr. John Mulhall will have every reason to be gratified. Then there are two other items on which we are entitled to an explanation. First, "Telegraphist, 5s. a day," a charge which expires with his life. I always find that where salaries are for life, the recipient goes on living for ever. Why is this telegraphist at the Viceregal Lodge? I could understand the need of a telegraphist for the monstrous use which is made of the wires in the work of spying all over the country. But why should there be a special telegraphist dancing attendance on the Lord Lieutenant? I cannot see any object at all, unless it be, as we know the Viceroy is a horsey man, that he has to send telegrams in respect of horse races. But Lord Zetland should pay for his own racing telegrams, and I protest against it. The Castle of Dublin is provided with a staff of telegraphists; all the business is done by that staff. If the Lord Lieutenant, his weary round of labours over, retires to the rural delights of Phoenix Park, and he wants to arrange his betting, let him pay for the telegraphists out of his own private resources. There is one other item I desire explained. I refer to the chaplain at Dublin Castle. It is an absurd and monstrous provision. It is a remnant of the old intolerance; and we had a recent example of the monstrous absurdity to which this gives rise. Although the Lord Lieutenant must not be a Roman Catholic, yet he may be a Presbyterian; and we had the grotesque spectacle of a Presbyterian Lord Lieutenant, who was unable to receive the ministration of the Church of Ireland clergyman who was chaplain. I want the Chief Secretary to get up and tell us in a businesslike way what the private secretary does and why he is paid a large salary; why these four aides-de-camp each receive £200 a year; what the Comptroller does; and, if the Lord Lieutenant has a Chamberlain, Master of the Horse, and Gentlemen-in-Waiting, what does he want with State Stewards? These three gentlemen are not required for deciding questions of precedence in going into dinner, and so on. I hope the Chief Secretary will get up and explain what these officers do. If he does not, I think we are entitled, in the interests of the taxpayers of this country, to divide the Committee against every single Vote.

(6.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY: It is very painful to me to hear all these attacks upon the Lord Lieutenant. I think I shall save the Chief Secretary trouble if I give a general defence for the existence of the Lord Lieutenant's Household. First of all, I will take the salary of the private secretary. Now, my hon. Friend says that Mr. John Mulhall is getting a larger salary, when a smaller one would do. But, no doubt, the private secretary to the present Lord Lieutenant and to the late Lord Lieutenant, the Marquess of Londonderry, has something to do. We know that the private secretary to these noblemen must have some allowance made for his feelings. I observe the hon. Member for Dover opposite. He is private secretary to the Chief Secretary—an intellectual man—he gets nothing. I have examined the Votes, and there is no charge whatever for the extraordinary services of the hon. Member for Dover. He takes a pleasure in the work, and perhaps the reason of it is that he often gets his name published in the newspapers. I have often wondered to myself whether the hon. Member for Dover is private secretary to the Chief Secretary or the Chief Secretary is private secretary to the Member for Dover. Then, again, Mr. John Mulhall, it must be remembered, is a barrister, and he has to advise Lord Zetland of the legal competence of Irish Resident Magistrates. It will be seen at once that Mr. Mulhall has a number of very important duties. Knowing how difficult it is to get Irish barristers into the service of the State, unless a sufficiently tempting and adequate salary is offered, I must say it is something to get a barrister for £829 0s. 8d. a year. I admire the 8d., and it shows that Mr. Mulhall is ready to maintain the reputation of the Irish Bar down to 8d. Then the aides-de-camp. On what ground are these gentlemen attacked? It is said that they do nothing but dance attendance on the Viceregal Household. It is a very dull place for these English gentlemen to spend their time in, and why on earth should they not have some salary. The Chief Secretary, who has £400 a year for coals, never goes to Ireland. Is it to be tolerated that these four aides-de-camp should not get each £200 a year for living in that country? I say they are dirt cheap to the State. Then we have the State Stewards. I do not know what they do. I have read about stewards in the Bible; but what the State Stewards do is a question on which, no doubt, the Chief Secretary will illuminate us. For my part, I could not for a moment attempt to decide why they should not get £413 19s. 4d. There is the Comptroller. I must say nobody wants more controlling than the Lord Lieutenant. It is a most admirable office; and if the Lord Lieutenant had not a Comptroller, there is no knowing what would happen to the British Constitution. Master of the Horse. That I can quite understand, because the Lord Lieutenant has no horses to be master of. I say to the Radicals of the country, that when they have got the Lord Lieutenant and his Household, they must be prepared to pay for them. Do not attack these miserable details. Let us address ourselves to these questions in a large and becoming spirit. It is unworthy of this House that these niggling comments should be made upon such an office as the Master of the Horse. I must say, Mr. Courtney, that so long as the Lord Lieutenantcy exists, so long, I hope, we will register no opposition to the Master of the Horse. But, Sir, something must be said of the Sergeant of the Riding House. All these are absolutely indispensable requisite to his position. From my knowledge of the Lord Lieutenant, and the large acquaintance I possess among these persons, it would be wholly impossible to maintain the dignity of the office if these adjuncts were not maintained. Then I come to the Chaplain of Dublin Castle, and I would ask, does any Institution stand more in need of such a functionary? He reads prayers daily at an expense of £184 12s. 8d. per annum, and yet we are asked to vote against his salary. Beyond this there is the cost of the telegraphist, who receives 5s. per day. Well, Sir, I say let us cut that off. I am prepared to cut down the expenditure of the Lord Lieutenant by 5s. per day, but when I am asked to abolish the other officers necessary to the dignity of that official, every feeling that is loyal and legitimate in my nature revolts against the proposal. This 5s. a day may seem a small matter; but I say it is not a small matter; and if any Radical in this House ventures to move its reduction, I shall vote with him against that payment.

(6 18.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hon. Members opposite have spent a considerable portion of the evening in a discussion which may be very agreeable and entertaining to them, but which can hardly be said to relate to matters of importance as affecting Ireland. In regard to what has been said as to the Private Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, I can assure the House that the Lord Lieutenant has an enormous and very confidential correspondence, and it would be impossible to obtain a competent gentleman to deal with correspondence of that character by merely going into the market and engaging the first person who undertakes to give his services. When a comparison is drawn between the salary given to the Lord Lieutenant's secretary and that of a permanent Civil servant, it should be remembered that the appointment of the Lord Lieutenant's secretary is only temporary, and that, unlike the permanent Civil servant, he knows that his tenure of office will end with the tenure of the Lord Lieutenant himself, and that he has no claim to pension. Under these circumstances, I think the arguments used on this subject fall entirely to the ground. I hope the Committee will now come to a decision on this Vote, and that we may be allowed to proceed to matters of rather more importance.

(6.20.) MR. W. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has altogether failed to answer the direct inquiry put to him as to what are the duties of these officers of the Lord Lieutenant's Household. The right hon. Gentleman in his first speech told us he was not in a position to inform us as to the duties of the members of the Lord Lieutenant's Household.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said I was not in a position to explain the minute details.

MR. W. REDMOND: We do not ask the right hon. Gentleman for minute details. All we have asked is that the right hon. Gentleman should state broadly what these officers do, and the right hon. Gentleman has not pointed out a single duty performed by either of these persons. He has told us, however, that we should commence by attacking the office of the Lord Lieutenant himself; but the right hon. Gentleman knows very well that if he were to attempt to discuss the Lord Lieutenant's office, you, Sir, would rule us to be out of order; consequently, we are compelled to draw attention simply to the Household of the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman is evidently in absolute ignorance of the duties performed by those functionaries; he has made some attempt to give an account of the duties of the secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, but he has not told us what the steward and the other officers do for the salaries which are here set down. It is an exceedingly cool proposition to expect this Committee to pass this Vote without the slightest inkling as to what these persons do for the money which is paid. Take the case of the Master of the Horse. He receives a salary of £200 a year; but, in addition to this, he has a further salary of £276 a year as the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare. Even if this were not a question of £276 added to £200 a year, natural curiosity would prompt us to inquire who and what is the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare, and I think we are entitled to that information. If the right hon. Gentleman does not know himself, he might inquire through his private secretaries. The right hon. Gentleman's chief private secretary has spent some time in Dublin Castle, and surely ought to be in a position to tell us what is done by the three Gentlemen in Waiting in order to earn the money they receive. He ought to be able to tell us what are the duties of the State Steward and the Controller, and also of the Gentleman Usher, who is in receipt of £200 a year. But the right hon. Gentleman gets up, and, with an obvious affectation of seriousness, tells us we are not entitled to occupy the time of the Committee now, because the Vote does not relate to any serious important matter, such as will arise, no doubt, on the question of his own salary. This may be true; but, at the same time, the Vote is one of close upon £3,800 a year, and, therefore, it is not a trivial matter. We find that not only do some of these gentlemen receive salaries set down in this Vote; but, by a note at the bottom of the page, we find that they are also receiving salaries for fulfilling other offices in different parts of Ireland. How can the right hon. Gentleman expect the Committee to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the fitness of the salary given to the Master of the Horse when we find that he is receiving another salary as Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out to the hon. Member that the question at issue with regard to the Master of the Horse has reference only to his salary of £200 a year. The other question is not raised by this Vote.

MR. W. REDMOND: I quite see the force of your interposition, Mr. Courtney, but I apprehend that there must be some connection between the two payments. However, when the proper time arrives, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell us what are the duties of the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh of Kildare. At present I only desire to know the duties of the officers of the Lord Lieutenant's household. We are bound to go to a Division in order to express our view as to the maintenance of these apparently useless offices. We are bound to do this in the interests of the unfortunate taxpayers, not only of Ireland but of England and Scotland, who have to provide the means of maintaining these useless appointments.

(6.25.) MR. DILLON: I rise to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £3,000, in order that the opinion of the Committee may be taken upon this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has stated that we are wasting time in a discussion of an insignificant Vote. If time is being wasted it is simply because our criticism of the Vote has been met in a manner which is, at any rate, very unusual in this House. Here are a number of items which have been challenged in Committee, year after year, and I ask any Conservative or Liberal Independent Member to compare the way we are treated in regard to these Votes with the way the Secretary to the Treasury meets points that are raised in the Votes which are under his charge. I have never known the Secretary to the Treasury, political opponent of ours as he is, fail to go into the most minute detail on any question raised on a Vote; but here, when criticisms are offered, the right hon. Gentleman deliberately refuses to give us any information on any detail in the Vote, and rides off on the plea, "I have not got sufficient time to acquaint myself with the details of the matter." Therefore, if there is waste of time in Committee, the blame must rest entirely on the shoulders of the gentleman who expects us to take Votes in this way. The only case in which the right hon. Gentleman attempted to give anything in the shape of an answer was in regard to the Private Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He said this gentleman had an immense mass of confidential correspondence to deal with, and that, therefore, we got full value for his salary. But I would point out that the whole of the work of the Government of Ireland is done through the Irish Office and the Castle. Then what can be the nature of this confidential correspondence? A lot of it is correspondence about betting, or has to do with the private affairs of Lord Zetland, and it is not for this House to pay a secretary to attend to it. If Lord Zetland's private correspondence is large, and his betting transactions are considerable, he should pay out of his own pocket the salary of the private secretary who attends to such matters. But, as I say, whatever time is occupied with these Votes, the Chief Secretary, whose duty it is to know all about these things, comes down here and calls on the House to vote a sum of £3,164, without giving us the slightest information as to the duties of the officials.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, Lord Lieutenant's Household, be reduced by the sum of £3,000."—(Mr. Dillon.)

(6.35.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Before we proceed to divide on the question I would point out to the Chief Secretary that most of these aides-de-camp are military men drawing full pay all the time they are absent from their regiments. Many of these gentlemen belong to cavalry regiments, and have fair private means of their own, and they look forward to positions of this kind without the slightest regard to this beggarly £200 a year. They enjoy the kudos of being appointed to this honorary position. They act as dancing men, in every sense of the word, attending all the Viceregal entertainments. Their salaries, it seems to me, if the Chief Secretary would look upon the matter in a business-like and conciliatory spirit, might easily be dispensed with. Why is not this economy effected? Merely because these salaries were granted years ago, and the right hon. Gentleman, as a member of the Conservative Government, desires to preserve the salaries of others, as he desires to preserve his own. I would point out that the surgeon to the Household receives only £100 a year, though he has to look after a great many people. He has to maintain a high position, yet he only gets £100 a year, while these dancing military men get £200 a year each. Then, the Master of Horse—than whom there is no more courteous gentleman in connection with Dublin Castle, and who is well known to many hon. Members—has nothing to do but, on certain occasions, choose the horses for the Viceregal equipages. That is not a very onerous duty. The gallant Colonel is a permanent official. Like the Vicar of Bray, no matter what Government comes or goes he still remains Master of the Horse, and if the question is put to him whether he desires to see this controversy year after year on this useless Vote, I am sure he will say he does not want the money, and will be very happy to fulfil his functions without payment. There is an item of £200 for a Chamberlain, and it seems to me absurd that you should pay that amount, when the surgeon only gets £100. Why, the telegraphist at the Castle only receives £9 a year less than the surgeon, a thing which is absurd on the face of it. I am sure that the Chief Secretary will see that some explanation is due to us in regard to these matters, and that he will deal with such Votes in a dignified, steady, and righteous manner.

*(6.41.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I desire to support this Amendment as a Representative of an English constituency. I think this charge is simply plundering the English and Scottish taxpayers. There may be some use for the private secretary and telegraphist, but the amount which it is proposed to leave will be ample for them. It seems to me extraordinary that we should pay for the objects set forth in this Vote four times as much for Ireland as we pay for Scotland.

THE CHAIRMAN: This Vote has been divided into two parts, and we are now dealing with the first portion.

*MR. MORTON: We must bear in mind that there is no occasion at all for State in Ireland. The people do not want it; and it must be a sham and a farce. If the Queen or the members of the Royal Family were in the habit of residing in Ireland, I could understand that there was some excuse for the Vote, though, in another way, it would be bad even then; but, at present, so far as we have any evidence, there is no occasion for this money being spent in any shape or form whatever. I hold, therefore, that for us to vote this money is to deliberately waste it. I hope the Committee will reduce the Vote.

(6.45.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I fail to see why this House should vote money for a surgeon to the Lord Lieutenant. If with £20,000 a year the Lord Lieutenant cannot pay his own surgeon's bill—as we Members of this House have to do—there is a law which the Tory Party are constantly quoting, namely, 1st and 2nd Vic., Chap. 26, by aid of which the noble Lord can obtain relief. He can go to the South Dublin Union Dispensary and get attended to; but why he should come here for assistance of this kind I cannot make out. I find there are two Gentlemen in Waiting charged for, one at a salary of £184, and the other at a salary of £58. The reason one of these has got his post is because he is the son of Mr. Olphert, of Donegal. When I went down to Donegal this very Gentleman in Waiting had an interview with the Lord Lieutenant, and got me four months imprisonment, my sentence being doubled on appeal.

(6.47.) MR. AIRD rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put," but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. BLANE: The Chief Secretary does not tell us the use of these men, or give us an intelligible explanation of the Vote, and, therefore, I say that we are justified in resisting it. It seems to me that the Lord Lieutenant should be able to meet all these charges out of his £20,000 a year, and that, in respect of them, no call should be made on the general taxpayers, most of whom are poor men, who have to pay to the Treasury on every smoke of the pipe they take, and every cup of tea, coffee, or cocoa they drink.

(6.48.) MR. DILLON: I feel compelled to say, Sir, that the proceedings on the opposite side of the House are not such as are calculated to facilitate discussion. I never, in the whole course of my experience in Committee in this House, witnessed such a method of attempting to carry the Estimates as that adopted by the Chief Secretary to-day. We are accused of wasting time, but I will undertake to say that no English Vote was ever attempted to be carried through Committee in the way these are attempted to be carried through. The Chief Secretary has not endeavoured to offer the slightest justification for the Vote, and then, whilst we are trying to extract some explanation from him, one of his supporters gets up and moves that the question be now put. Surely some intelligent Member of the Party opposite will shortly rise and move that the whole of the Irish Estimates be carried forthwith. Let the hon. Member opposite give some intelligent indication that he understands the matters we are discussing before he tries to stop the Debate.

(6.50.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would point out that on the Irish Estimates, as Irishmen themselves have often said, there arise great controversies on matters connected with the Government of Ireland. I am most anxious that the Committee should discuss those great controversial questions which come up upon the Irish Estimates, but we have now had two and a half hours of a discussion upon questions which cannot be regarded as of first, or even secondary, importance. The hon. Member for Mayo has accused the Government of declining to give information. I have not declined to give information. I have discussed many details with regard to the Vote, and if I have not gone into detail upon the duties of the various officials, the Committee will see that to attempt to discuss such questions in detail must be unsatisfactory in a high degree. If we require a Lord Lieutenant, and one who has to pay more than his salary—for that is what it really comes to—I maintain that it is not important to discuss what precise distinction there may be between the duties of a Chamberlain and those of an Equerry. There is no Court in which there are not similar functionaries; the salaries are not excessive, and far less than those which used to be paid. These have been discussed over and over again in this House, and I would again respectfully urge the Committee not to peddle with these twopenny-half-penny questions, but to decide at once the question of whether there should be a Lord Lieutenant or not.

(6.54.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that they were not twopenny-half-penny which were raised in Committee on Monday and Tuesday night. The right hon. Gentleman has given us another proof of his great cleverness in evading the real question, and turning aside the whole course of the Debate. We maintain that the offices for which these charges are made are not real offices. There is no real office of Master of the Horse, as there are no horses to master; there is no office of Equerry, as there are no horses to ride. If we object to this Vote it is because these offices are unreal, and because we want to put an end to shams. We move a reduction of the Vote, and at once an hon. Member on the opposite side rises and moves that the question be now put. I was at that hon. Member's election. I have never heard him make a speech—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member must confine himself to the Question before the Committee.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The question, "That the Question be now put," was raised.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Then I will only say I object to this item for a Private Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. If the Lord Lieutenant were such an one as we had prior to 1886—a Member of the Cabinet and a distinguished statesman—one could understand the necessity for a Private Secretary, but we cannot in the case of a man whose only claim to distinction is that his name begins with a Z. The secretaries to the Chief Secretary deserve to be on the Vote, if they are not, for we get information from them. They enlighten the House. But that cannot be said of the officials under this Vote, whose functions the Chief Secretary declines to explain. We in Ireland are not opposed to institutions like the establishment of the Lord Lieutenant. I should have no objection myself, under more propitious auspices, to be conducted to the State ballroom by an aide-de-camp. We do not object to the pomp of State, but we want the offices to be real. They are not real, and, for that reason, I feel it my duty to support the Amendment.

(7.0.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 202,—(Div. List, No. 183.)

Original Question again proposed.

(7.15.) DR. TANNER: We now pass to sub-head (b), and I want to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to one item under the sub-head. It is a very small matter, but I trust the Chief Secretary will vouchsafe us some reply. I see that £100 is set down for incidental expenses. The same sum was taken last year. How comes it to pass that in these wonderfully well paid offices a sum is provided every year for incidental expenses? What is the £100 for?

(7.16.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the incidental expenses are principally connected with travelling by Members of the Lord Lieutenant's household upon matters of public importance, and also with the supply of newspapers, and the like. The sum is less than it was some years ago; it has remained at the present figure for the last two years.

DR. TANNER: £100 for newspapers is a large sum. To whom are the newspapers supplied? Is it to the Lord Lieutenant or to individual members of the staff? We know that the Chief Secretary, a gentleman of great literary culture, objects to newspapers; he never reads them. Let us receive some enlightenment on this matter, small as it is. It certainly would save a great deal of time if the particulars were given in the Estimates themselves. To whom are the newspapers supplied?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Lieutenant's household.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I wish to raise the question of the distribution of the Queen's plate, but am not sure whether I can do so in this Vote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That will come up in a later Vote.

(7.20.) DR. TANNER: We now come to the question of the chaplaincy to the Castle. It seems to me extraordinary that a clergyman of the Disestablished Episcopal Church in Ireland should occupy the position of chaplain. I should have thought that when the Church was disestablished, this office, this ridiculous sinecure would have been done away with. The chaplain has very few duties to perform; indeed, most of the members of the Lord Lieutenant's Household take a great interest in receiving, and very little in praying. Surely it is time this solemn farce was stopped. The chaplain gets a very good sum of money. He has an allowance of £184 12s. 8d. a year, and an allowance in lieu of furnished house of £150. Speaking as a Protestant, I think it would be to the benefit of all parties if this solemn farce should be abolished. I know the chaplain is a very learned and a capable gentleman, and I have no doubt he feels very deeply the absurdity of his position. I hope the Chief Secretary will see his way to at all events make some inquiry in the matter. In the meantime, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £335.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item C be reduced by the sum of £335 (the salary of the Chaplain of Dublin Castle)."—(Dr. Tanner.)

(7.25.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I trust my hon. Friend will not persist with this Motion. We have now passed the Vote for the Lord Lieutenant's Household, which includes many gentlemen who must necessarily belong to the Protestant Church. While the House of Commons maintains these gentlemen in their offices it is only right and proper the House should provide for their religious observances. It has been the custom of the Committee to provide for these requirements in the past, and I trust that under present circumstances the Committee will not find it necessary to depart from that custom. I appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion, and allow us to proceed to more serious matter.

(7.26.) DR. TANNER: Apparently my hon. Friend does not see the importance of this matter. You have surrounded the Lord Lieutenant with at least five or six Protestant Churches, and if these gentlemen are desirous of going to Church there is no reason why they should not walk about 300 yards to Christ Church or a few steps further in another direction to St. Andrew's. The Chapel Royal is scarcely attended by anybody except the dearly beloved clerk. I went there on two occasions many years ago, and I was struck by the paucity of the attendance. The Protestants of Ireland know this is a solemn farce, and would be glad to see it stopped. I sincerely hope a decision will be taken upon this point.

(7.28.) MR. MORTON: I must support the proposed reduction unless we get some explanation. Up to the present the Chief Secretary has not given us any explanation. Why should not the gentlemen connected with the Castle pay pew rents like other people? I certainly do not see why we in England should be called upon to pay for such expenses as these. I trust we shall have the courage to reduce this Vote. I entirely object to the speech the Chief Secretary delivered just now. He said, "Vote this money and let us get on to what is political matter." As I understand we have been discussing these votes as a matter of business. We are trying to study economy, trying to do away with what is absolutely useless expenditure. I have great pleasure in supporting the reduction.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(7.33.) Mr. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £4,425, the amount of the salary of the Chief Secretary. It is a little outrageous, perhaps, but I think nobody can have failed to notice a certain change of demeanour on the part of the Chief Secretary towards Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman seems lately to have developed some spirit of courtesy, and even of blandishment, towards some at least of the criminal conspirators sitting on these Benches. Now, this would be very gratifying, and we should all, I think, be very glad to reciprocate it if, with the altered manner towards Irish Members in this House, there was any indication of a change in the treatment of the people of Ireland. We should be very much more impressed with the right hon. Gentleman's somewhat new-born courtesy towards Representatives of the people here, if it were accompanied with some consideration shown to an unfortunate newspaper editor in Ireland, who is now picking oakum among thieves in Tullamore Gaol; or for another gentleman who is lying on a plank bed in Cork Gaol to-night for protecting Protestant tenants. Let the right hon. Gentleman display his change of demeanour towards Mr. Tom Barry, a man of great influence, and held in much respect in the South of Ireland, who, a few days ago, was dragged handcuffed, without reason, through his own town of Mallow. I would advise the right hon. Gentleman to instruct Colonel Caddell to change his manner towards the people of Tipperary, and not to use filthy language towards a young woman in custody of his police, not to stick out his tongue at a clergyman, and proclaim his triumph at the grave of a Nationalist. These and many more such things we cannot help remembering, they are burned in upon our hearts, and we cannot help remembering that if the Chief Secretary has adopted a somewhat subdued tone towards Irish Members in the House, that happens after he has discovered that his other and original policy of insult and violence towards the Representatives of the Irish people did not commend itself to the constituencies of Great Britain quite so enthusiastically as he concluded it would. The right hon. Gentleman began with a very different sort of programme towards the Irish Members. We can hardly forget my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien) stretched in the street at Cork by my side with two frightful gashes in his head, his life hanging in the balance for a couple of weeks afterwards. We cannot forget the personal violence inflicted upon my hon. Friends the Members for South-East Tipperary and Mid Cork, while the man who ordered these attacks, instead of being brought to trial and sent to prison, is promoted to the post of County Inspector. Most fortunate—for those were the early days of coercion, "when the bloom was on the rye" it is pretty well off now—for us, the British constituencies, at bye-elections, rather moderated the enthusiasm of the right hon. Gentleman for gibing and coercion. I really think that every brilliant gibe of his must have cost his Party a seat in this House. It is pretty plain that he is a gentleman who can be improved by a little wholesome thrashing. We do not hear so much of the expressions of delight at the progress of his administration in Ireland. Only the other night, in a spirit of meekness and humility, he confessed that when two years ago he boasted in this House to the British public that the National League in suppressed districts was a thing of the past, he only spoke in reference to what he desired.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken, as he will see on reference to the report of what I said in answer to a question in reference to attendance at suppressed meetings.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I have not the slightest desire to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman, but does he now say that the National League in suppressed districts is a thing of the past?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Do I understand him to deny what he so piteously complained of the other night in this House, that he, with all his force in Tipperary, can make no headway against the power of the National League? Does he deny the Report cited in the House, that, at the last meeting held under the nose of his 130 policemen, in Tipperary, the three last adherents of Mr. Smith-Barry made their submission to the National League? I gave him credit for better things. Facts are too strong for him. There is no getting over the fact that, instead of crippling the power of the League, his Administration has increased the contributions to its resources until they exceed the contributions of half a century before to the national cause. He will find it hard to get out of the fact that, in six bye-elections in different parts of Ireland, not a single Representative of the Party opposite dared to put in an appearance, and three of these elections were in the province of Ulster, and one of the constituencies was sacred by the residence of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh. I must say I had thought the right hon. Gentleman had changed his old tone of boasting. It seemed to me his speech on the Constabulary Vote if it meant anything was really a piteous appeal, a lament that he had been utterly foiled and was helpless against the irresistible power of the League in Tipperary and elsewhere. Though he has 130 police and nearly 700 soldiers massed in that one small town, he cannot point to a single officer of the law injured in the struggle. The worst crime he can impute to the people of Tipperary is that they insist that men shall choose their sides, that they shall throw in their fortunes with Mr. Smith-Barry if they love him, and have confidence in him, or with the people whom

Mr. Smith-Barry has wantonly, wickedly endeavoured to exterminate. Whether there is any change or not in the tone of the right hon. Gentleman in this House, at all events there is a change of tactics rather than a change of administration in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has learned to conduct his operations in such a way that they do not attract attention in England, and they make no sensational appearance in the English Press. He fights pretty shy now of eviction campaigns, such as those carried out at Glenbeigh, Bodyke, and elsewhere. He conducts evictions now by surprise in half dozens. He takes care to provoke no more quarrels with prisoners in gaols. He takes care to have no more English visitors attacked and flung off platforms, as Mr. Wilfrid Blunt and Lady Ann Blunt were flung off the platform at Woodford. He hides his hand now, and carries out his operations stealthily, silently, and slowly; the work of clearing estates is carried on without attracting notice in England. This was done last year, when the backs of English visitors were turned, with little excitement, and little to attract English attention. The Chief Secretary is very fond of sneering at the English visitors to Ireland; but he himself once invited English visits to Ireland. He was not quite so ardent in pressing his invitation when it was suggested that English visitors might take the form of a Committee of this House, to investigate facts, and show the slanderous nature of the charges made against the people of Tipperary in this House. The right hon. Gentleman is never tired of jibing at English visitors to Ireland who happen to go and see for themselves; but, I venture to say, these English visitors have done more for the tranquillity of Ireland, and for the permanent unity of the Empire, considerably more, than he has done with all the bayonets and coercion at his command. What is more, although he affects to sneer at these men, and the want of effect of their speeches compared with those of Irish Members, I venture to say he knows in his heart that these men are very much more formidable adversaries to his Party and Administration than we are, and this he has discovered from the results of the bye elections in this country. These men have, for themselves, examined the daily work of coercion, the only way to learn what is going on in Ireland under the present Administration. These men can tell their countrymen, from actual knowledge, the hardships of the Irish people, not in single instances, but in daily life. They can tell how clergymen and principal men in various districts in Ireland are hunted about the country by the police like thieves, under the suspicion that they intend to hold meetings. The persecution is well-nigh incredible to the English people. It astounds me to hear the Chief Secretary talk of intimidation by the people, and the sufferings they inflict. Why, they are the most marvellous people in the world, that, year after year, they have borne this system of cruelty and violent persecution at the hands of the myrmidons of the right hon. Gentleman. These things the English people now know from their own Representatives. It is as well to know in every constituency in England how, in the struggle between landlord and tenant, the dice are loaded against the unfortunate tenants, and every combination of landlords and English capitalists, many of them like those who back Mr. Smith-Barry, is petted and supported by the whole power of the Executive, at the expense of the British taxpayer, while the forces of the Crown are used, and the most desperate attempts are made, to terrorise the people and break down the combinations, so that many of them day and night are in constant dread of the visit of the Sheriff to confiscate their property, or the police to arrest them. Look at the state of things in the City of Cork. We dare not go there, because the people would assemble to greet us, and we know that from some dark ambush a gang of police would sally out and commence a savage bludgeon attack. We have seen, in the streets of Tralee, how the silent rising of the hat may subject a man to such treatment. This is how coercion works in Ireland, and these things are now known in England, in spite of the sneers of the Chief Secretary. There are districts in Ireland where you cannot find a man which has not had a member of his family evicted or put into prison. In Longford, one of the quietest towns in Ireland, you have a member of the Town Council, the Chairman of the Board of Guardians, five of the principal men of the town, all in prison, undergoing the treatment of criminals, upon some trumped-up charge of intimidation against them. In the noble town of Tipperary a boy was killed by a Force of 37 armed police. It is not there a question of the Plan of Campaign, in spite of all the Chief Secretary has said. I do not think any Judge would say so, not even my namesake would say it. The action of the tenants in Tipperary is as lawful as the dockers' strike in London. It is an unselfish, crimeless, fight for justice and humanity. We could go on accumulating facts, if it were any use piling Pelion upon Ossa, we could quote volumes showing the utter hopeless failure of every department of coercive policy. There is no disguising the fact that this unarmed peasantry have resisted all the force with which the Chief Secretary has been pounding at them for the past four years. In spite of the Olpherts, Clanricardes, and Ponsonbys, the people have defied the right hon. Gentleman and all his legions. The contest still goes on, but I do not think it can last much longer. So long as it does last it is our duty to expose the policy of the Chief Secretary, his failure, and gross ignorance of Irish affairs. There is no disguising the issue—either he must crush us or we must crush him and his administration. He still has his motley majority at his back in this House. [An hon. MEMBER : Of four.] No, more than four on the Irish question, for that happens to be the one question upon which they are together—together in a leaky boat in a heavy sea—and their only chance is to stick together, and together they will stick. The constituencies have long been united in condemning the verdict of the majority here, and are longing for the chance of shattering that majority to atoms. Meanwhile we are bound by our duty here to our people to protest by voice and vote against any admission that the Chief Secretary is entitled to any recognition for services rendered at the hands of the Irish people, or anyone who values the peace and tranquillity of the Empire.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item D be reduced by the sum of £4,425 (the salary of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant)."—(Mr. William O'Brien.)

(8.0.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: During the opening remarks of my hon. Friend, the Chief Secretary denied that there had been any meeting held in Ireland of suppressed branches of the National League. Now, Sir, to-day I asked a question of the Chief Secretary, or rather of the Attorney General for Ireland, whether a meeting did not take place in Tipperary last Sunday, and whether it was not attended by 500 or 600 men, who subsequently marched into the town in procession, in order to show that such an assembly had taken place. The Attorney General, acting on the information supplied by the officer of the Chief Secretary, stood up and denied that any such meeting had taken place, or that such a procession had marched into the town. Now, I have read a report of the proceedings in no less than three different newspapers, and I am convinced that it did take place. In fact, I myself have attended many such meetings over and over again. I have addressed meetings of the suppressed branches within a short distance of the town of Tipperary, where you have 200 policemen and 700 soldiers, and those meetings have been held in the absence of policemen. I have addressed meetings of my constituents, under these circumstances; the priest has been in the chair and reporters have been present. Yet if I were to ask a question as to whether such a meeting had been held, either the Chief Secretary or the Attorney General would get up and assure the House that no such meeting had taken place, although I might have been present at it. The fact is the Chief Secretary is like a child, he shuts his eyes in the dark because he is afraid. He does not want to know that these meetings are held, he declines to admit their existence until something occurs which raises the fears of his own supporters, and then he is obliged to admit it, and to alter his policy. I daresay the right hon. Gentleman will declare that he has not altered his policy from the beginning, and that he has not changed his course of conduct. But I should like to point out to him one instance in which he has changed his policy, in deference to the public opinion created in this country, because his policy was inconsistent with the enlightened notions of the people of this country, and inconsistent with their ideas of punishment. The right hon. Gentleman stood up in this House last year, and, in reply to speeches which were made in opposition to his policy, in regard to the treatment of prisoners in Ireland, he admitted that owing to the manner in which prisoners were treated in Ireland, and owing to the impression which, he said, was made on English audiences by public speakers upon the subject, he admitted that a case had been made out for inquiry into the treatment of prisoners throughout the three Kingdoms. But although an inquiry was instituted the right hon. Gentleman did not await the Report of the Committee, but he directed the Prisons Board to make fresh bye-laws, which conceded every one of the main demands made on behalf of prisoners in Ireland for what we believe to be political offences. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of one of his speeches to-night, asked us to turn our backs on the twopenny-half-penny questions which he said were contained in the Votes we have just passed, and to turn to what he called the dramatic points which remained to be argued under the Vote. He might well style them dramatic, for there is a great drama being enacted in Ireland at the present moment. There are evictions going on in the presence of policemen and soldiers. People who are compelled to break the law are hauled before the Magistrates, who do not administer their duties according to the law, but who prefer to follow the instructions from Dublin Castle. The Chief Secretary may laugh at this, but does he mean to say that it has not taken place? Why, we can prove that it has, out of the Magistrates' own mouths. For instance, on one occasion Colonel Carew said he did not care about the law, or about evidence; he had his instructions from Dublin Castle. What are the Magistrates in Ireland doing? Why, last year 15 of these young men were brought before two of these Resident Magistrates, Messrs. Frewen and Meldon, in the town of Tipperary, and were charged with riot. The Resident Magistrates retired to consider the evidence, and they returned into Court and declared that the case against one of the defendants was dismissed, while, with regard to the other 14, they said they could not, on the evidence produced by the Crown, convict them of riot; but in order to put a stop to such proceedings they would direct the defendants to find bail to be on their good behaviour for 12 months, or to go to gaol for two months. Here are men absolutely declared by the Magistrates to be innocent of the charge preferred against them, yet, in order to carry out the instructions from Dublin Castle, they are compelled to give bail for their good behaviour, or else go to gaol for two months. What was the offence of these 15 young men—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This does not properly come under this Vote. It is a question which should be raised under the Vote affecting the present Magistrates.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: My contention is that these Resident Magistrates were acting under the instructions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary of Ireland. They are servants—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order! This matter cannot be entertained under this Vote. Questions affecting the general policy of the Chief Secretary may be taken, but the action of the Resident Magistrates must be discussed under the Vote affecting them.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I have repeatedly brought this question before the House. I have asked the Chief Secretary to explain upon what principle the conduct of the Resident Magistrates can be justified. I have received from the right hon. Gentleman very unsatisfactory answers, and now I think it is incumbent on me to prove my contention that he is responsible, because he backing up these Magistrates in an un-constitutional manner, and in a manner which ought to be questioned in this House. I want to prove that my constituents have been treated by these Resident Magistrates, under orders from the Chief Secretary, in such a manner as to meet with the condemnation of the House. I think I am entitled to raise this question, because the Chief Secretary's salary is under discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This subject can only be raised on the Vote for the Resident Magistrates.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I wish to bring a charge against the police on this question.

Mr. J. O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN: The action of the police must be questioned on the Vote for the police. On the Vote for the Chief Secretary's salary only questions of general policy can be discussed. The action of any especial Department of the Executive in Ireland must be raised on the Vote affecting that particular Department.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I submit that when the Chief Secretary moved the Closure the other night he made a statement to the effect that the police Vote and the Vote for his salary were very much the same thing, and they both involved the same question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that was what I stated. What I intended to convey was that some of the questions which were raised on the Police Vote should have been raised on this Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! What occurred on that occasion does not affect this Committee. We cannot go into this question now.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The difficulty is to decide when a Resident Magistrate is acting as an executive officer, and when he is acting as a Judge. Take the case, for instance, of Mr. Cecil Roche, who sometimes sits on the Bench, and who at the same time may be conducting the actions of the police, and, while so acting, may be inciting them to murder people. On what Vote are we to question such conduct?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! When the Vote including his salary comes under discussion it will be open to the hon. Member to raise this question.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I submit that these are questions of general policy. The Chief Secretary justifies the action of these Resident Magistrates. Still it does not matter to me when I bring these matters forward. I can do it to-morrow just as well as to-day, and I will, therefore, in obedience to your ruling, Sir, pass on to another subject. I want to know from the Chief Secretary why it is that the men who shot down Heffernan in the streets of Tipperary have not been proceeded against. It was stated in the course of the Debate on the matter that the man in charge of the Force who committed this desperate deed had ordered the crowd to disperse. But I wonder is the Chief Secretary aware of the fact that it transpired in the evidence that the rules of the Force on this occasion had not been complied with by this officer. According to those rules the crowd should first have been charged with batons, but, as a fact, this young policeman recklessly ordered the men under his command to fire, and he added instructions that they should aim to kill. I think the facts in this case should have induced the right hon. Gentleman to take further action. The Coroner, when the issue paper was handed to him by the Jury, said that they had found that the man Heffernan came by his death by a gunshot wound received on the 5th instant in the public streets of Tipperary, and that he died on the 7th. The Jury found a verdict of wilful murder against the District Inspector and a constable, and they further found that the constable fired the shot by the direction of the District Inspector. The Jury further added a rider calling upon the Government to take immediate steps to prevent a repetition of such occurrences, because they believed that such events would lead to anarchy and crime. Before the proceedings of that inquest closed the Crown Prosecutor stated that he had never seen an inquest conducted with more ability or greater impartiality than had been the case on that occasion. But what has been the result of that verdict? What has become of the officer who ordered the shot to be fired, and what has become of the policeman who fired the shot? I suppose the officer has followed the example of the District Inspector who distinguished himself by invading a non-proclaimed meeting, and calling upon the Force under his command to draw their swords, and charge the crowd and disperse it, with the result that they wounded no less than 30 or 40 men, without any warning and without reading the Riot Act. That Inspector, who was afterwards found guilty of assault by a Bench of Magistrates, but the informations concerning whom were subsequently quashed by the Government, was promoted to a Resident Magistracy, and I believe that every one of the men under his command on that occasion received a pecuniary reward, while in the case of this poor man Heffernan, who was murdered in the streets of Tipperary, I believe the District Inspector has received promotion. Indeed, the police have discovered that the wise path to promotion in Ireland, under the existing régime, is by doing acts of violence to the people of the country, and by committing outrages upon personal liberty. And while I am upon this point I may as well allude to one or two other matters of general policy. The Police Vote, I know, has been passed, but some of my constituents in Tipperary are being persecuted by the police. I have had brought under my notice the case of a man named Burke, who has been in the habit of earning his livelihood in the streets of Tipperary by mending boots and shoes. A short time ago it was brought under the notice of this House that he had been deprived of his livelihood, because the police surrounded the place where he worked, and by making it appear to the people generally that the man was one of them, his customers were scared away. I have received a letter calling particular attention to this case, and from that letter I gather that the man had to leave his usual post for working owing to the action of two or three policemen, who constantly stood by him and pretended that he was doing work for them. The consequence was that he lost his customers. He left the main street, and for nine weeks he was unable to get any work. He applied to the Board of Guardians for relief. Ultimately, he went back to his old place, but he had no sooner taken up his position than three policemen presented themselves and prevented any of his customers approaching him. I think this is one of the cases which ought to be inquired into by the Chief Secretary. It shows the manner in which the people of Tipperary are treated by the police—a manner which is not calculated to maintain the peace of the town. If a dog persistently attacks a man the latter is entitled to take steps for his own protection. I look upon the police of Tipperary as being nothing better than a dog, and I think the people there ought to be protected from this vicious system of espionage, following, and shadowing, and if they are not so protected they will be justified in using any means that can be devised to protect themselves from such an obnoxious policy. I should like to deal with one other question arising out of the recent difficulties in Ireland. In the course of a discussion on the dock strikes—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That question is pertinent to the Police Vote, and indeed it was discussed upon that Vote.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: We are discussing the policy of the Chief Secretary, and I must say that I find it very difficult, now that the Police Vote has been passed, to keep within the very narrow limits in which you are confining us, and I do hope that before these Votes are finally passed we shall have some opportunity of condemning the action of the Chief Secretary for the persistent persecution of the people, and for the miscarriage of justice by the Resident Magistrates. I cannot help remembering the conduct of these officials. For instance, Colonel Turner was in charge of a Military Force at some evictions on the Ponsonby estate, and at the very scene of those evictions, while the people were writhing under the injustice of being driven from the homes which they had built, and from the farms which they had reclaimed by means of their own capital and labour—while they were writhing under this injustice, in the very midst of sorrow and tears, this Colonel Turner ordered the bagpipes and bands of soldiers under his command to play up their national airs and their merry tunes, in order to drown the wails of the people thus driven from their homes. We intend to do all in our power to bring these facts before the people who constitute the Court of final appeal, and in the very short period which will elapse between the close of this Session and the opening of next Session, we shall utilise all the time at our disposal in order to make these facts public.

(5.5.) MR. MAC NEILL: I would much prefer to discuss this matter more on the general aspects of policy than—as I am compelled to do by your repeated rulings, Sir—direct myself to the personal conduct of the Chief Secretary. A Chief Secretary who, with his high position and limited knowledge of the country, finds himself in possession of despotic authority over an entire country—into which he, perhaps, has never put a foot before being invested with that authority—has one or other of two courses to pursue. The moment he arrives at the seat of his administration he finds there a number of gentlemen, his officials. If he throws himself unreservedly into the hands of these gentlemen, everything, so far as he is concerned, will be rendered pleasant for him. There will be plenty of one-sided information given to him for the confusion of his opponents, and everything will go smoothly so long as he is content to view all matters with other eyes than his own. In the case of the present Chief Secretary, this system has been adopted, and it is now too late to alter it. If, three and a half years ago, he had put his foot down and taken an independent course, and had said, "I will examine things for myself; I will not take a one-sided view of every prosecution in Ireland," things would not have gone so smoothly. No doubt his servants would have been courteous, but they would not have liked it; and if he had made mistakes, they would have been secretly delighted and would have been ready to say, "Well, you would not be advised by us, and now you must put up with the consequences." If the right hon. Gentleman had brought fresh eyes to the Administration, however, the results, so far as Ireland is concerned, would have been very different. At present he is simply dealing with officials who are actuated by the fear of the loss of their posts, and he gives them a power-of-attorney over his voice, his conscience, and his influence in the House. He has thrown himself entirely into the hands of the Castle officials, and as far as answers to questions are concerned the right hon. Gentleman is nothing more than a telephone between the officials and the House of Commons, and his salary might well be cut down to the cost of the telegrams. In answering supplementary questions, of course, he displays great ability, resource, and cleverness; and no one would admire him more than I should every afternoon if these questions and answers were a mere dialectical game—a mere game in a drawing room—but it becomes a very serious thing when we reflect that on these matters depend not merely the personal triumph of some smart repartee, but the lives and happiness of the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman, I think, fails to realise that Irish politics are something more serious than a highly intellectual game. As I have said, the right hon. Gentleman has not taken the trouble of seeing things for himself. He has simply placed himself in the hands of persons who are interested, and there is one feature in the right hon. Gentleman's administration which is in complete contrast with every other administration in Ireland. Other Chief Secretaries have spent the greater portion of their time in Ireland, but last year the right hon. Gentleman was only in Ireland for six or seven weeks out of six or seven months that he might have spent there. I have had the curiosity to make a note of the dates, and I find that Parliament last year rose on the 30th of August, but that the Chief Secretary did not put in an appearance in Ireland until October 24th. He was away during that period of excitement, when, if he was any good at all in Ireland, his presence would have been most valuable. He was away during the rise of the Tenants' Defence Association, during the founding of the Smith-Barry Syndicate, and the transactions which took place in Maryborough. And when he came to Ireland, he only remained until the 16th November, reappearing on the 16th December, and remaining until the 30th January. Where was he in the intervals? Why, he was in England or Scotland governing Ireland by correspondence with men whose words, as we contend, are thoroughly unreliable on all matters affecting Irish administration. It is no exaggeration when I say that the Castle officials are practised in falsehood. They seem to be continually undergoing a competitive examination to see who is the boldest and most effective liar. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is a man of intelligence; he knows in this dialectical game of question and answer on which side the truth lies, but he sticks to his official information. He has received his official instructions, and he sticks to them. The hon. Member for Dover, the Chief Secretary's secretary since he has assumed his present post, has made some references to Irish history. I would remind him and the Chief Secretary that in Grattan's Parliament, when a very respectable gentleman had committed the error of making his position in Parliament the medium of publishing slanders and falsehood, although he did not know that the words he had used were slanderous or false, and had given his authority for them—which the Chief Secretary never does, except to say that he has got his information from the police—Grattan got up and declared that the informant of the hon. Member was a gross, public liar, and in the most vigorous terms condemned the misconduct of the Member who was capable of giving expression to the slanders put into his mouth by officials. We can imagine from that what Grattan would have said if he could have heard the Chief Secretary day after day, relying upon the words put into his mouth by the Castle officials. The Chief Secretary I have always regarded as a man of great ability, but, at the same time, I am sure he is too much of a philosopher to believe in political miracles. Yet it would be a political miracle if the right hon. Gentleman were anything but what, under the circumstances, he ought to be and is, namely, an example of gigantic ignorance as to the primary facts of Irish social life. Twelve months ago the right hon. Gentleman got up on the Police Vote and said that within a few months the relations between the police and the Irish people would be as harmonious as the relations between the police and the people in any country on the face of the globe. How have those predictions been realised? Why, on the very eve of the murder of Inspector Martin the right hon. Gentleman, in the only speech he ever delivered in Ireland—a speech delivered at a ghastly banquet of place hunters whose names would never have been known if the Nationalist Party had not got hold of them and published them—actually congratulated his audience on the excellence of the relations between the police and the people. The right hon. Gentleman did the same thing only a few evenings ago, having unfortunately for himself neglected to read the Dublin newspapers which contained the best possible evidence as to the nature of the relations existing between the police and the people of Ireland. Those newspapers contained a report of an action brought before the Lord Chief Baron by an individual against a police constable in reference to a transaction which took place at Charleville last year, and at the trial Mr.

Carson (who is to be the successor of the Irish Attorney General in the representation of Dublin University when the right hon. and learned Gentleman is elevated to the Bench, and who is known in Ireland as "Balfour Junior") got up and said that the police were described by reporters for telegraphic summary purposes as "Balfour's Bloodhounds." And this is a Force which the right hon. Gentleman says is a popular Force. Let us test his knowledge of popular sentiment from the little speeches he sometimes makes in England and Scotland. Last year, speaking in Scotland, he brought a charge against Father M'Fadden. He said Father M'Fadden was a gentleman who had constantly used his clerical position to the detriment of his parishioners.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Hear, hear.

MR. MAC NEILL: "Hear, hear," says the Donegal Investigator. I will not say anything about him, but will merely state what Father M'Fadden has done—and I must say, from a knowledge of the facts, that I believe the right hon. Gentleman when he made that statement about the rev. gentleman was in ignorance of what he was talking about, or probably only received his information from the hon. Member for South Tyrone. Father M'Fadden is a priest who has established schools in an extensive parish, who has obtained no less than £8,000 from America to relieve the temporary wants of his parishioners, and in a country where illicit distillation is greatly in vogue has in an increasing parish an increasing number of teetotalers. This gentleman has been a constant benefactor to the poor people of his district, and yet we have a Chief Secretary with a salary of £5,000 a year not disdaining to attempt to take away the character of such a devoted priest by making charges that he would not bring to trial even before one of his packed juries. Such are the statements the right hon. Gentleman is induced to make on the information supplied to him. The hon. Member for Mayo said the other day that he had been struck by a policeman's baton. Up started the right hon. Gentleman with the statement that the hon. Member must have been misinformed. The hon. Member had not been struck; the police had told him so.

Mr. Mac Neill

In connection with the case of the boy O'Donoghue, who was murdered at Timoleague in cold blood, the attention of the Chief Secretary was directed by one of the Members for Cork to the fact that drunkenness had taken place amongst the police in the town. The right hon. Gentleman confused the case with what had occurred at Portumna, and had no idea that the men had been murdered by his constables in cold blood. When it is said that the police disturb bonfires, the right hon. Gentleman replies that they have a right to do so, such things being an obstruction, but he ought to know that there is nothing to obstruct in Irish villages at night time. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's action towards Irish officials, when one of the people is promoted amongst his fellows, and popular honours are conferred upon him, he becomes at once a marked man by the Dublin Castle sentry. In the case of the late Lord Mayor of Dublin, at the opening of a Commission, although it had always been customary for this civic functionary to attend and take his seat amongst the Judges, the custom was departed from on that occasion because the Lord Mayor was a Nationalist. In the same way, the Lord Mayor of Wexford, because he had been convicted under the Coercion Act, was removed from the list of ex officio visitors of the Enniscorthy Lunatic Asylum. And by these means the right hon. Gentleman expects to establish law and order in Ireland. There are few criminals in Ireland, but we give little thanks to the right hon. Gentleman. When real crimes are committed, the police take little pains to investigate them. There was a burglary at Pill Lane, in Dublin, within a few yards of the police barracks, and a man was nearly killed, but the perpetrators of the outrage were never brought to justice. Has the right hon. Gentleman, who came into power to strike oil for the landlords, done so much as strike terror into a single tenant? Has Mr. Olphert got a penny of his rent after the awful persecution his people have been subjected to? The right hon. Gentleman has unroofed no fewer than 300 houses on that estate, and has made houseless no fewer than 1,500 people. He has arrested no fewer than 150 people. He has, through his agents, placed the handcuffs on peasants, who have been put into an open boat and taken to be put on board a gunboat, though the captain refused to take them unless he received the keys of the handcuffs. He probably thought the administration of the right hon. Gentleman was, to use a phrase which has become Parliamentary, damnable. Now as to Mr. Olphert himself. I have here a secret circular. It was dated August 8th, 1889, and signed by Robert McClinton, D.M. In it the writer invited contributions to a fund which he was trying to raise on behalf of Mr. Olphert, and said it was plain that the battle at Falcarragh was one between law and order on one side, and communism and anarchy on the other. He added that Mr. Olphert could not without assistance continue the fight, as he had received no rent for three years. Two days before that letter was written a most remarkable admission was made by the Chief Secretary with regard to the battering ram. Of all Governments this is the Government of what is called the even keel. They announced that they would preserve strict and equal laws between landlord and tenant; they would see that neither side took advantage of the other. But they supplied the police with the battering ram, which was employed by the landlord to destroy the houses in Falcarragh, and the Chief Secretary justifies the use of that instrument. On the 6th of August, 1889, the Chief Secretary said in this House, "I am perfectly ready to defend the use of the ram." [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] Well, it has won more elections than all the sneers of the right hon. Gentleman put together. The cost of the ram does not appear on the Estimates, because it was paid by the Association of Landlords, presided over by Lord Courtown. That Association gave it to the Chief Secretary, and he gave it to the police to work. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to contradict my statement. The Chief Secretary said, "I am prepared to defend on any platform in England the use of the instrument." I have here a model of the ram. [The hon. Gentleman exhibited the model.] It was made out of the piece of the beam of the real ram I have been speaking of. On one occasion the ram was broken, and the wood out of which my model was made was picked up. Now, I will lend the right hon. Gentleman the ram to lecture with on any public platform he chooses, and, what is more, I and other Irish Members will undertake to be present in order to preserve the peace. The right hon. Gentleman might use the ram on the occasion of his next lecture at the Church Congress, which lecture might very appropriately relate to the siege of Jerusalem. Now, the right hon. Gentleman was new in Ireland until he accepted the office of Chief Secretary. That was his misfortune and not his fault. He was only three days in office when Captain Plunkett was in the law room at Dublin Castle. The right hon. Gentleman was present and advised Captain Plunkett to send that awful telegram to Youghal, "If resistance be offered do not hesitate to shoot the people." The right hon. Gentleman defended the telegram. He said—

"The sergeant of police would have been guilty of grave dereliction of duty if he had not fired to kill. It was contrary to every received regulation that an armed force dealing with a crowd should fire deliberately over the heads."

Since then no fewer than 14 men have met their death at the hands of the police, and not one of the men who caused these deaths has been one hour in custody. The police have fired to kill. They have followed the right hon. Gentleman's advice, and 14 men have been slain by them. No fewer than 1,000 men have been injured. In consequence of your ruling, Sir, I am not able to speak of the Resident Magistrates except in direct connection with the right hon. Gentleman. I ask if it is worthy of a gentleman in the Chief Secretary's position to bring up to the Castle the dependent Resident Magistrates—men whose salary is everything to them—and to confer with them. He has repeatedly denied that he has spoken to these men in reference to pending coercion cases. But what right has he to bring these men up to the Castle? He is the hero, and they are nothing more than the valets. His conduct in this matter is not that of a statesman. He cannot deny that the men have been to the Castle, and a few days afterwards they have proved themselves the Government's puppets. Lord Londonderry, immediately on leaving Ireland, made a speech at Stockton, and in that speech he said his experience during the past three years had convinced him it was utterly hopeless to even attempt to govern Ireland except by exceptional powers. That is the testimony of the late Lord Lieutenant, the former head of the Irish Administration. Is that the establishment of law and order? But even the Orangemen of Ireland are discontented. Three years ago some of my own constituents presented an address to the Chief Secretary, in which they described him as brave and magnanimous, but recently Dr. Kane commented very adversely upon the right hon. Gentleman's proceedings. In the colonies, too, the right hon. Gentleman's conduct meets with the disapproval it deserves. Sir George Grey, a very distinguished New Zealand minister, has condemned in the strongest language the Coercion Act, and said that the people in the distant parts of the Empire were determined to render help to the Irish people in their time of trial. This is a matter which appeals to human nature. We wish to defend the poor, to re-establish in our own country our own Constitution, our own laws, and we cannot longer tolerate the gentlemen who administer the affairs of our country.

(9.50.) Mr. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): The Chief Secretary has often boasted of his marvellous success in the government of Ireland; but I venture to say he has failed, and is bringing destruction to his own friends. Let me to-night call attention to some of the methods he is employing in Ireland. He has encouraged the landlords to proceed on a wild enterprise of eviction against their tenants. In giving this encouragement he is only luring them on to their own ruin. I think it is right the Committee should be put in possession of the facts relating to this encouragement, and that the British taxpayers should know into what illegal channels some of the money of the Treasury goes. In 1886 the present President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and in a Debate on the Estimates in that year his attention was called to the practice of evicting landlords applying for and getting extra police for protection duty and making a profit out of the transaction. The method by which these landlords made a profit was to charge for their cars which the police used. The then Chief Secretary promised to take care that no landlords, and no persons receiving police protection, should make a profit out of the transaction. He went further, and promised that those who sought police protection should be required to contribute something towards the cost. I want to know how much has ever been required from any landlord towards the cost of the police that have been given to them for their protection duty. How much has the Chief Secretary received from Lord Clanricarde for the army of police placed at that nobleman's disposal during the last four years? I presume I am within the mark when I say Mr. Tenner, Lord Clanricarde's agent, has as many as 100 policemen at his command. These men are paid out of the British Treasury. They are doing no service to the State, but are, in fact, Lord Clanricarde's lackeys. I desire to know, also, whether Lord Clanricarde is being paid barrack rent for the old castle in Portumna? If so, on what ground is such rent being paid? There is another case worthy of notice. There is a great number of evicted houses in the town of Tipperary. The ordinary police force in the town is something like 30, but now it is 150. Extra barrack accommodation is therefore necessary. Such accommodation has been provided by the use of three evicted houses on the estate of the hon. Member for South Huntington (Mr. Smith-Barry). I want to know if the hon. Member is getting a rent for those evicted houses. The policemen are really doing bailiff-duty for the hon. Member, and I want to know whether the hon. Member is being paid a rent for the houses in which his ordinary tenants would not stay. These are very pertinent questions to put four years after the promise of a Minister of the Crown that no evicting landlord should make a profit out of the protection afforded him. We charge that the entire resources of the Government in Ireland are handed over to the landlords, and we charge that everything that it is possible for the landlords to do the Government are prepared to support. We charge that so perplexed has everything in Ireland become, that the tenants can have no protection of their own; they dare not combine, while the landlords may combine to their hearts' content. We charge that the police are handed over as lackeys to the landlords. There was a curious illustration of this only last week, when I was in the town of Tipperary. We have heard a great deal about the shadowing by the police of certain persons in Ireland. As Father Humphreys was leaving his house, the two policemen told off to keep watch over him, at once proceeded after him, but the agent of the estate was at that moment leaving his office, which is opposite to Father Humphrey's house. The agent called one of the policemen back and ordered him to go round to the stables and order his carriage. And this policeman left his duty which he was specially charged to perform and went round to the stable to order the carriage as directed. Well, another matter I have to call attention to is this: Statements are constantly made on the other side of the House upon the number of farms that are being taken. Over and over again it has been stated that a number of evicted farms have been taken, and that the country is settling down to peace, happiness, and contentedness. But when we ask for more definite information, we are met with the answer, "No; to give you names would be to subject persons to moonlighting and outrage." If we deny that any body of tenantry have broken from the Plan of Campaign, the right hon. Gentleman says—"Yes, a certain number of tenants have paid their rent, but we cannot give their names lest these people should be subjected to outrage and perhaps murdered." Now, I asked a question a few weeks ago in reference to the conduct of a policeman down in Portumna, going about on the Clanricarde property with a list from which he was telling the tenants who had paid their rents. Now what does the right hon. Gentleman mean? Here is a policeman going about the country giving the people just that information which, according to the right hon. Gentleman, is calculated to rouse the people to frenzy and lead to the perpetration of outrage and perhaps murder. Are we to understand that he wants an outrage campaign started at Portumna? He must defend his policeman for this conduct, going about and making known the names of paying tenants, or else he must condemn the police for doing that which he, in this House, said would be attended with danger and possible loss of life to paying tenants. Another instance I give of the manner in which the authorities in Ireland give themselves away to the landlords. I asked a question a short time ago about the two emergency men of Lord Clanricarde's who were caught in the act of stealing turf from the cabin of an evicted tenant. The evidence was too conclusive, but the men were dismissed because the tenant has his remedy by civil process. Now, will the Committee be surprised to learn that these turf thieves were on the occasion accompanied and actually guarded by policemen—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Much of what the hon. Member has been saying would have been pertinent to the Police Vote, but does not properly belong to this Vote.

MR. SHEEHY: The manner in which I wish to apply it is this: I assume that the Chief Secretary is responsible for the government of Ireland and for the handling of the constabulary, to a certain extent, and I assume that these universal practices could not take place if they had not his sanction and support.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not enough; the administration of Ireland is divided into several Departments, and upon each there is the opportunity for debate. Matters of policy are cognate to the Chief Secretary's Vote, but the hon. Member is raising a matter which is pertinent to the Constabulary Vote.

MR. SHEEHY: The Chief Secretary defends the action of the police in this House. He gives us answers to our questions, which answers we have not the opportunity of replying to until we have these Votes before us in Committee. But I will not press the matter if you say, Sir, that it should be raised on the Constabulary Vote. But I may be permitted to draw the attention of the Committee to the manner in which the Chief Secretary uses his position as representative of the landlord class, to give all the support he can to the landlords of Ireland as against the tenants of Ireland. This is the charge we bring against him, and I regret that I have transgressed the Rules of the House in bringing forward instances. But I am satisfied with having put these few facts before the Committee, and I will leave the Committee to judge if the right hon. Gentleman is earning his salary by an honest use of the power in his hands.

(10.37.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: This Vote, I understand, is challenged because, under the administration of the Chief Secretary, there are certain districts in Ireland where very sad things are occurring and where the Police Force is used in a way in which it is contended that it ought not to be used. If we were to take the statements given by hon. Members below the Gangway, one would imagine that the whole of Ireland is in a state of confusion and disorder. I do not think that it is possible for the Committee to accept any such statement. As a matter of fact, the whole of Ireland with the exception of certain well-defined areas, is in a state of profound peace and quiet. I quite admit that there are areas which have long been subject to the Plan of Campaign which are in a state of disturbance, such as Youghal, Woodford, and Tipperary, but I traverse the statement that the whole of Ireland is in that state. On the contrary, I repeat that with the exception of these districts Ireland is in a state of profound peace, and I am glad to say is prosperous. Now, I want in the short space of time I shall occupy, to direct attention to one of these areas to which I have referred, where a considerable number of people are subject to intimidation, from which I think that the Government ought to strain every nerve to protect them. I had some doubts whether this matter would more properly come under the Police Vote, but I made up my mind that it would come more appropriately under the Chief Secretary's Vote. I take the case of Tipperary. I heard the hon. Member for East Mayo state that what is going on there is simply the same thing that goes on in a Trade Union strike in England, and he drew a comparison with the dockers strike in London.

MR. DILLON: No; the comparison and the contrast I drew was between the action of picketing in the dockers' strike and in the Leeds gas strike and the practice of shadowing in Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What I complain of is that there are people in Tipperary who have been coerced, and for whom no adequate protection is found. It may be urged that the action of the League is the same as that taken in a Trade Union strike, as far as picketing is concerned. The first objection I urge against that is that in the case of the dockers' and the gas strike the people conceived that they had a grievance to strike against. I submit that it is impossible to prove that the people of Tipperary consider that they have a grievance. On the contrary, I am prepared to prove by documents and by evidence that the people of Tipperary conceived that they had no grievance, but were coerced into this fight, and therefore the cases are not upon all fours. In the second place, the dockers were allowed and were free to strike, but they were not free to intimidate others who did not wish to strike. My complaint is, that the claim is put forward by hon. Members below the Gangway that those who strike should be free to intimidate those who do not wish to do so. Now, I wish to bring several cases under the notice of the Chief Secretary, for he alone has the power to put this matter right. I wish to bring several cases to his notice where I think the people have been grossly coerced and abused. And, first, I take the case of the Presbyterian minister of Tipperary and his family.

THE CHAIRMAN: So far the hon. Member appears to be leading up to an arraignment of the police. If that is so, he will not be in order; but perhaps before the hon. Member enters into details, he will state what his line of argument is.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am going to bring under the notice of the Chief Secretary, the responsible Minister for Ireland, certain cases of individuals in the town of Tipperary who are being injured and fired at, and I am going to urge the Chief Secretary to give them adequate protection. I conceive that this would be in order, and it would be very hard if those people were debarred from having their case stated.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have prevented hon. Members arguing the other side of the question, and I think that inaction as well as excessive action on the part of the police should be discussed under the Police Vote.

Mr. Sheehy

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask if the hon. Gentleman voted for the Closure the other night?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I stated, probably before the hon. Member entered, that I had some doubt whether I ought to bring on this matter under the Police Vote, but I considered it would be more pertinent to this Vote. What I wish to bring under the Chief Secretary's notice on the Vote for his salary, is the position of five or six individuals who have not received adequate protection from the right hon. Gentleman. If I am not at liberty to do that, Mr. Courtney, I will immediately resume my seat, but I invite a direct instruction from you whether I should be in order.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think it ought to be brought on upon the Police Vote.

(1045.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Member for South Tyrone seems to have been "hoist with his own petard." His grievance is against the Chief Secretary, who has, no doubt, misled him. The Chairman of Committees knows his duty, but the Chief Secretary distinctly led us to believe—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Chief Secretary is not the controlling power. As I have already said, the hon. Member is not entitled to go back on that matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I was only about to remark that the right hon. Gentleman has deceived his follower into the impression that the one speech would do for either Vote. I see the area of the right hon. Gentleman's misrepresentation is spreading, and has affected even the hon. Member for South Tyrone. However, Sir, accepting your ruling, I address myself to the general policy of the right hon. Gentleman and his dealings with Ireland. The fourth year of the administration of Her Majesty's present Government has now been reached, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has now any other policy than shadowing and coercion? The right hon. Gentleman told us here the other night that we ought not to put so many questions to him. He said if we will insist on indulging in that luxury, he can only give us official information placed at his disposal. But, said the right hon. Gentleman, "It is open to you to avoid being galled by my statements, and you may avoid being troubled by my answers by not putting questions." Why did not the right hon. Gentleman go further, and suggest that if we come here at all, we should spend our time on the Terrace or in the Smoking Room? Yes, we have asked many questions, but in no single instance has the right hon. Gentleman attempted to give a satisfactory statement in answer to questions. I deny the right hon. Gentleman's statement that he has given the House all the information sent him by the police. My belief is, from comparison of facts and replies to secondary questions, that the right hon. Gentleman deliberately inverts the information he gets at the Irish Office, and does not give us even the information supplied by the police. His manner and his method have been reduced to a system. His first object is to insult the Irish Members, and his next to irritate and annoy the questioner, and thirdly, he endeavours to provoke a laugh on his own side of the House. If anybody was to ask him whether on a certain date the sun shone in Ireland he would begin with his accustomed formula, the Constabulary report to him that from the complaints made as to the potato blight or the inability of farmers to pay rent or from the natural humidity of the soil it was very doubtful indeed whether on a certain day the sun shone in Ireland. But we intend on this Vote to ask the right hon. Gentleman some questions even at the risk of getting some very unsatisfactory replies. What has become of his great drainage scheme? During 1887-8-9 we heard a great deal of the enormous damage which was done to Ireland through want of drainage of the Shannon, the Barrow, and the Bann, and we were told that all Ireland wanted was arterial drainage. But nothing has been done to promote that great drainage scheme. Then the right hon. Gentleman had another great policy, which was that of light railways. I supported that scheme in the innocence of my heart. But where are the light railways? Not a pick has been put into the ground, and not a barrow-full of earth has been turned. There was another great policy of the Government, and that was the conferring of University education on the Catholics of Ireland. I ask the Chief Secretary what has become of that now? Has the money for light railways been diverted to erecting a Catholic University, or has the money for the drainage schemes been used for that purpose? Nothing of the kind, and the speeches made by the right hon. Gentleman at Manchester, Leeds, and also at Glasgow and Edinburgh, where he tried to convert the Scotch people to his views, a difficult task for the author of "Philosophic Doubts," have had no result at all. No, while declaring that the Catholics of Ireland were entitled to University education, the moment a ripple of dissent appeared among the right hon. Gentleman's Protestant friends and the Orange lodges of Belfast, the Catholic University passed out of the policy of Her Majesty's Government like the baseless fabric of a vision. To-day another blow has struck their hearts; the Land Purchase Bill has been dropped. That fourth blossom of the four-leaved shamrock of the Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government has been withered and blighted by the heat of July. It was on the Land Purchase Bill that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord uttered his famous "Certainly, Sir," and that "it never, no never," would be dropped. And now we hear it is gone the way of the Tithes Bill and the Compensation Bill. What has become of that other great branch of Conservative policy—the extension of Local Government to Ireland? The Unionist Party came in on a number of planks somewhat unskillfully nailed together. The points of some of the nails appear to be sticking out, and are making the seats of some Members of Her Majesty's Government rather uncomfortable. What has become of the great policy of extending Local Government to Ireland which was promised in the Queen's Speech? We all know how ardent a supporter of Local Government the right hon. Gentleman is. We do not ask him inconvenient questions as to the unhandsome corpses of murdered Irishmen, which ought not to come between the wind and his nobility; but we do ask him what has become of his policy in regard to light railways and Catholic University education. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would be much better pleased if we were to confine ourselves to questions upon which he can begin with the prelude to his well-known litany, as to what the established Authorities have reported to him. But those Authorities are not responsible for the non-passage of the Local Government for Ireland measure, announced in the Queen's Speech, nor for the dropping of the Land Purchase Bill, the Drainage Bill, and a number of other dropped schemes and broken pledges of the Government. The person responsible for these things is the right hon. Gentleman himself, who has a seat in the Cabinet, and who is put forward as the spokesman of the Government on all occasions such as this. We want to know on what cry the Conservative Party propose to go to the country at the next General Election? [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh now, but by-and-bye they may have to laugh on the wrong side of their mouths. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman hopes that he and his Party may keep together for a considerable period longer. [Colonel SAUNDERSON: "Hear, hear!"] That statement is received by the feeble duty cheer of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, which, however, does not obtain the resonance which might have been expected from the other supporters of the Government. I claim that we ought to be allowed, after the Session which is about to close, to go about and inform our constituents what they have to expect from a Conservative Government. If I go to Ireland to address my constituents on subjects relating to rent, or to shadowing by the police, I shall have to do so at the risk of having my head batoned; but what I desire is to inform the Irish people of all the good things that are in store for them. I do not desire to say a harsh word of the Government. On the contrary, I desire that the Government will, so to speak, fill my bag with gifts, so that when I go back to Ireland I may be able to eschew all the troublesome subjects relating to battering rams and prison clothes and ejections, and the other nasty topics which are so burdensome to the right hon. Gentleman. These are the subjects the right hon. Gentleman desires to avoid. They have been referred to by him as "squalid details." Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman includes the Resident Magistrates among these squalid details, I can have no objection. What I desire to know is, what is the programme of the Government, and what it is they propose to do in the next Session to make good the promises and pledges they have broken in the past? I will give one slight illustration of how little confidence is to be reposed in Her Majesty's Government, even by those who profess to be their great supporters, in Ireland. There is at present a belief in Ireland that the Attorney General for Ireland is about to vacate his seat, in order to secure his well-deserved reward as the occupant of a seat on the Irish Bench. But that appointment will inevitably create a vacancy in the representation of Trinity College, Dublin, hitherto supposed to be the one secure paddock in which the Government palfrey might amble at will. Among the persons composing the electorate of that ennobled and enlightened constituency, which is said to contain all the wealth and intelligence and education of the community—even in that calm and peaceful abode of learning and erudition—a rift has occurred. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has written a letter in favour of the candidature of Mr. Carson, but the landlord party have put forward a candidate of their own, Mr. Lowrie, so that the present Government, who have declared that one of the main portions of their Irish policy is to be found in the Land Purchase Bill, are now being opposed even in Trinity College by a Representative of the landlord interest. Thus the Government are met by a declaration that the constituency of this hitherto pocket borough will support not the Government candidate, but the candidate of an independent party. Well, Sir, we claim to know what satisfaction are the Irish people to have in future. We have had four years of Conservative policy in the administration of Ireland, and we are told that during that time Ireland has progressed. The right hon. Gentleman made a speech the other day, in which he spoke of the enormous prosperity of the Irish people, and he was backed in that by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). I find, however, from statistics that in all those matters which may be taken to denote the condition of the wealth and prosperity of the people there has been instead of an advance a decline and falling off. Whether we take the imports or exports, or the money in the savings' banks, I assert that in every single item which may be regarded as an index of the prosperity of the country there has been a distinct decline. For example, if you take the tonnage entering the Port of Dublin, and if you go from that to the figures given in the Returns of the Registrar General, every single index points to a fall.

Mr. T. M. Healy

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): Will the hon. Gentleman give the entries for the Port of Belfast?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Belfast, Ireland?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes. But let me point out to the hon. Gentleman that Belfast is increasing, and I am delighted to hear that it is increasing. But increasing Belfast does not compensate me for decreasing Ireland. Much as I like Belfast, I love Ireland more. An infinitesimal increase in Belfast is no compensation for the steady decline over the rest of Ireland of every element that constitutes the prosperity of the country. I will give the tonnage of the country as a whole. I find from the Registrar General's Return that the inward bound tonnage increased from 2,000,000 tons in 1841, to 3,200,000 tons in 1881, and to 6,000,000 tons in 1887. That proves that articles of commerce formerly manufactured in Ireland are now bought elsewhere. It is the outward bound tonnage which shows the true prosperity of the country. It is needless to quote the figures, but any hon. Gentleman who thinks he can traverse my statement need only refer to the Registrar General's Returns, or to the figures of Mr. Grimshaw, during the past 12 months, and he will find my assertion, that Ireland under a Conservative Government has declined in prosperity in every single element that constitutes prosperity, is a correct assertion. What have we got upon the other side of the ledger? We have got the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and the increase of his police. The cost and number of the police go on steadily increasing. The population keeps falling off. The number of prisoners in gaol goes on increasing. The Chief Secretary tells us that the number of outrages is decreasing. The number of emigrants going to America continues at the same rate, and the country which some years ago had a population of 8,000,000 has now a population of 4,000,000. When the Chief Secretary tells us that the people of Ireland are more attached to law and order I challenge his statement, and invite him to use the police whose duty it will be to gather the Census Returns to ascertain the opinions of the people with regard to his administration. The right hon. Gentleman in the past has been famous, as I have shown over and over again, for creeping out of his pledges made to this House. It is idle to taunt the right hon. Gentleman with broken pledges. When we remind him that he promised appeal, he invariably replies that that was disposed of last year. If we show that he makes a statement this year of a different character to that which he made last year, his invariable reply is that this is 1890 and not 1889. The right hon. Gentleman has had four years' experience in his administration, and, now that there is one great English Party in the State opposed to the other great English Party on the question of Ireland, I ask him what are his hopes for the future. For the first time, Mr. Courtney, the Irish people are encouraged and are enabled to look forward to an amelioration of their condition. As a statesman the right hon. Gentleman must know that his policy will be reversed if he is beaten at the polls. What epitaph will be written on his policy, and upon his statesmanship? Can he look back with any satisfaction to the fact that practically he himself has borne the whole burden of this entire experiment of coercion in Ireland for the last four or five years, and that when it is reversed the verdict will be a verdict expressly against him and his policy, and that it will be forever practically impossible for any future Conservative Administration ever to return to the lines which have been rejected? Therefore, his entire policy is dependent for success at the polls at the next General Election. But if we, the Irish Members, are beaten at the polls, we will carry on the contest as before. Defeat will mean very little to us. The Irish have been like a toad under the harrow for centuries. But it is essential to the Chief Secretary and his Party that they should succeed at the polls. What is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman for the future? The Liberal Party have put a distinct policy before the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman has brought forward a policy of land purchase as his sole policy. And what is the verdict upon that in the North of Ireland? Nothing more clearly denotes the feeling of the North of Ireland than the Resolutions that have been passed with reference to compulsory purchase. They know very well that the tenants of the South and West of Ireland will be able to carry out the purchase, because they know that in the South and West the tenants can squeeze the landlords out. The hon. Member for North Armagh makes speeches in Ulster during the July fever. Do you find him praise compulsion? No. "King Billy" is trotted out as of yore. The feuds of 200 years ago, dead and buried, are revived; the bands play "Protestant Boys" and "Croppies lie down." But will this fill the stomachs of the frieze coats who have votes? Even in the loyal corner of Ireland the policy of the right hon. Gentleman is fruitless and barren. The hon. Member for South Tyrone will go about talking of the Land Purchase Bill, but what is the good of introducing that measure to the loyal farmers, if the loyal landlords will not sell to the loyal farmers? The loyal landlords are very glad to get the loyal farmers' pounds, shillings, and pence, paid quarterly or half-yearly as the case may be. If the right hon. Gentleman objects to squalid details, and does not like the corpses of Mitchelstown brought between the wind and his nobility, we are entitled to soar to the higher regions of Conservative statesmanship to track the pathless waste for some glimmer of the pilot balloons which are supposed to be sailing through the azure. Let the Chief Secretary throw his grapnels into the sure ground of Conservative statesmanship, and, throwing aside all these miserable details about plank beds and prison clothes, leaving the gaol corpses in their quicklime, let us have from him some statement about that basis of Constitutional statesmanship upon which his glory as a future Governor of Ireland is to rest.

(11.0.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I confess to have listened to this Debate with feelings of considerable satisfaction, and even of complacency. This is the occasion on which all the pent-up wrath which gathers in the bosoms of hon. Gentlemen opposite is legitimately poured forth upon the Chief Secretary, whoever he may be. But to-night the particular allegations that have been brought against me have chiefly had reference to ancient wrongs. They are grievances that have been trotted out year after year, and Session after Session, and, as far as the 12 months are concerned which have elapsed since we last passed this Vote, very little that is new has been brought forward against the Irish Government. The hon. and learned Member for Longford has travelled over a wide field of Irish politics. He has discussed among other things the diminishing prosperity of Ireland under the present Administration. I think the discovery which he made is one confined entirely to himself. I have heard this subject discussed by persons of very different views—by politicians and statisticians; but never till this evening have I heard it suggested that during the last three years the wealth and the prosperity of every class in Ireland have done other than increase in a most remarkable and satisfactory manner. When I heard his amusing paradox I listened for the method by which he would sustain it. He said—

"It is true that the imports into Ireland have doubled during the last three years, but, at the same time, the exports have diminished."

But on what does the prosperity of Ireland depend? On what does the comfort of the people depend? Does it depend upon what they send to other people, or upon what they import for their own consumption? Has it not been agreed by all political economists for the last 30 years that their welfare depends upon the imports?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will give the right hon. Gentleman the figures of the Registrar General. During the period of five years from 1851 to 1855, just after the famine, the annual value in Ireland of the crops was £58,537, and of the stock £39,348, making a total of £97,885. In the five years 1884 to 1889 the annual value of the crops was £35,952, and of the stock £55,839, making a total of £91,791, or a decrease of £6,000.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; but what has that to do with the argument which was addressed to the Committee based upon what the hon.

and learned Gentleman said? I take the hon. and learned Gentleman's own argument. He said, "Your imports have increased; but what of that when your exports have diminished?" I say it is very important that the imports have increased to the extent which the hon. and learned Gentleman indicates. It is a conclusive proof—if proof were required of so obvious a fact—that the prosperity of Ireland during the last three or four years has greatly augmented. The hon. and learned Gentleman asks what is our policy—is it coercion and coercion alone? He says, "Where are your Railway Bills, your Drainage Bills, your Land Purchase Bill, and your Local Government Bill?" And the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded to ask, in anxious tones, what he was to say to his constituents as to the good things given to them by the English Government. It would be a great impertinence on my part to suggest a speech to the hon. and learned Gentleman, who is one of the most fluent and prolific of the orators who address the House. But I think I could give him the headings of such a speech. [An hon. MEMBER: Early marriages.] He might say, "The Government have brought in Drainage Bills for Ireland. I regret to say that your great rivers produce much damage in the districts where the floods occur. But the Drainage Bills were brought in by a Conservative Government, and we, therefore, were glad to accept the assistance of the English Radical Members in obstructing these Bills and in preventing them from becoming law. We admit the disasters that will consequently accrue to you, the population of Ireland, but your sufferings are in the cause of Home Rule, and you must bear them cheerfully." Then the hon. and learned Gentleman can say, "The Government have also brought in a Bill for making railways in the poorer parts of Ireland. The Bill was framed in terms more liberal than any English Government have ever given to Ireland. We did our best to stop it; we did succeed in embarrassing the Government; but unfortunately they have been able to pass it. Unfortunately there seems every chance that the Government may be able to carry out these great and beneficial works in Ireland. They would benefit you, but you ought to regret that, because if the Bill had been rejected, and if the railway which they propose to give, and which you could never give yourselves, had not been built, the cause of Home Rule might have been furthered." The hon. and learned Gentleman may go on to say, "The Government have brought in a Bill for carrying out a policy which we advocated in earlier days—a policy of land purchase. They propose to give, in the first instance, a sum of £33,000,000 upon English credit, money which could never be raised upon Irish credit, and this sum, as it is repaid, will be re-lent, if Parliament desire it, to carry out that policy." "We all know," he may say, "that agrarian discontent is the very backbone of our policy in Ireland. This policy of land purchase may diminish that discontent, and therefore in the interests of Home Rule we have used the whole powers of our minority, a minority which rules the Gladstonian minority, and have been enabled triumphantly during the Session of 1890 to reject the Bill which, however beneficial to you and whatever peace it might have brought to Ireland, might have indefinitely postponed the consummation of your political wishes in the direction of Home Rule." Now, it seems to me that the hon. and learned Gentleman might well make such a speech to his constituents as I have just sketched the outlines of.

MR. MAC NEILL: Why do you not go and make it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not an Irish Member, and I have not to address an Irish constituency, but I was under the impression when I was interrupted that I was doing my best to supply the hon. and learned Member for Longford with materials for a speech to his constituents, a speech setting forth the views and desires anxiously expressed by him and his colleagues. Now, the hon. and learned Member for South Donegal denounced me this evening for, among other things, depending for the information I give to the House upon official sources. When a Minister is asked for information on particular matters he is bound to give official information, and if persons want information from other sources, say the daily Press, let them go to the daily Press for it. I do not wish to repeat the argument I used on Monday night; I wish to put the matter on a broader issue. Is there any real, any substantial difference between hon. Gentlemen opposite and us upon any of the leading facts of contemporary Irish politics? I admit, of course, that there are controversies as to whether a particular policeman did this or that, as to the treatment of this or that prisoner in gaol, and as to the sentences of this or that Resident Magistrate in cases of boycotting. But is there any substantial difference between hon. Members opposite and us upon the real and more important facts in Ireland? Is it denied, for instance, that the Plan of Campaign exists on many estates in Ireland, and that the plan is an illegal conspiracy?

AN IRISH MEMBER: That is a thing of the past.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is very extraordinary that hon. Members opposite cannot control themselves and desist for a short time at least from interruption. I have no difficulty in controlling myself while hon. Members are speaking. I assert, then, that it cannot be said that there is any difference of opinion between us to the facts that the Plan of Campaign exists on certain estates in Ireland, and that it is an illegal conspiracy, that boycotting exists, and that boycotting is illegal, that intimidation exists and is illegal, and that meetings are called in Ireland which, by the common law of England as well as Ireland, are illegal. It is not denied that hon. Gentlemen are using what has been described as the land war to interfere with the rights of property in Ireland, property which its possessors hold by laws common to England, Ireland, and every civilised country. These facts cannot be denied. The only men who have been mentioned to-night as bad landlords in Ireland, or as obnoxious to hon. Gentlemen opposite, are Mr. Olphert and Mr. Ponsonby. It is admitted that an illegal conspiracy exists on the estates of both these gentlemen. We do not differ, then, as to the fact that by these means—by these illegal conspiracies, by this illegal intimidation, by illegal boycotting—it is sought to carry out a political object in Ireland. It is admitted. Now, every man, English or Irish, has an absolute right to hold what views he pleases upon the subject of Home Rule. He has the right to advance those views by what means he pleases so long as they are legal means. But to attempt to advance those views by the illegal methods to which I have alluded is not and cannot be tolerated by this Government, and I believe could be tolerated by no civilised Government in the world. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down talked as if the present régime, as he described it, was going to end with this Government, whose demise he anticipates will occur at the next General Election. I take his hypothesis. I will assume, for the sake of argument, that the present Government comes to an end at the next General Election, and I ask whether the Government who are going to succeed them will tolerate illegal conspiracy? I ask whether they are going to tolerate the Plan of Campaign, whether they are going to tolerate boycotting and intimidation? Let the gentlemen who think they are going to succeed us at the next General Election, get up and say that that is so. If it is not so, what right has the hon. and learned Gentleman to draw a distinction between the policy of this Government and a policy which he thinks will be pursued by our successors? So long as you mean to maintain civilisation in Ireland, under Home Rule or British rule, or any other rule, you will, whether you like it or not, be forced to carry out the policy of the present Government—a policy which is not yet, thank Heaven, a monopoly of the Conservative or Unionist Party, but is approved by every civilised country. And if he asks me what would be the epitaph written over the policy of this Government when our existence shall be brought to a summary termination, the answer I give him is this—"While we held office and power in Ireland we did our duty." We protected the weak; we defended the rights of every citizen; we saw, in so far as in us lay, that every man who desired to fulfil his lawful avocations should be allowed to fulfil them, in spite of the action of a political party, and the fact that we did so to the best of our power is the best epitaph that can be given us, and the only epitaph, so far as I am concerned, which I desire to have written over the administration of the Conservative Government.

(11.22.) MR. DILLON: We have just listened to a speech which I venture to say will bring home to the mind and heart of every Nationalist in Ireland the feeling and the sense of the coming triumph of our case. The Chief Secretary has asked whether if the Liberal Party come into power they will tolerate boycotting and criminal conspiracy and intimidation in Ireland. I will answer that question, and I think I can answer it conclusively when I tell the Chief Secretary that on the day when the Liberal Party come back to power, the very advent of that Party into power will do what all the Coercion Acts of ten generations have not been able to do, namely, to exorcise from Ireland for ever the spirit of conspiracy of outrage and of crime. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he has protected the weak. Why, it was only a day or two ago since we heard a wail from the right hon. Gentleman that, notwithstanding all his police shadowing and despotism, intimidation rages triumphant in Tipperary. After four years of coercion in Ireland we have the hon. Member for South Tyrone standing up in the House this evening and appealing to the right hon. Gentleman to protect certain people in Tipperary from intimidation and boycotting.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I rise to order. I object to any discussion on my speech which I was not allowed to make.

MR. DILLON: I congratulate the hon. Member, who has just perpetrated one of the finest of Irish bulls. What did the right hon. Gentleman say in the course of his eloquent peroration? He said their consolation would be when they were driven from office that they had done their duty in Ireland, and that they had endeavoured to protect the weak. But, Sir, it is we who have been endeavouring to protect the weak against frightful odds—against the armed forces of the Crown, prostituted by the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of a class who, with their ancestors, have been for generations the persecutors and oppressors of the weak in Ireland. Our organisation placed in the hands of a defenceless and helpless tenantry the means of resisting an intolerable oppression. The idea of protecting the weak entertained by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh is planting his foot on the neck of the people—

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I rise to order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I certainly have not expressed any such view.

MR. DILLON: The hon. Member's view is to wage war to the death with three-fourths of the people of Ireland. I maintain it is we who have the right to boast that we have protected the weak, and the statement of the right hon. Gentleman to-night will have the effect of making still more popular our organisation; for has not the Chief Secretary spoken of the landlords as the weak class, and has he not admitted that the policy of the Government has been to champion them? Now, the right hon. Gentleman is a very self-satisfied man, and I have no belief that anything we may say against the Government will have the slightest effect. I congratulate him on having a mind of that character, because it is a very necessary qualification for anyone who has to work the present system in Ireland, and I have always said that I do not think there could be a more ideal Chief Secretary than the present Chief Secretary. I think he has made the Irish Government more unpopular than all his predecessors have succeeded in doing. In this respect I feel a considerable debt of gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman, because he is playing our game in some ways in Ireland more effectually than we are playing it ourselves. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have a notion that we have no complaint to make against him. I have heard a good many complaints made against the right hon. Gentleman this evening, but I have noticed that whenever a case is made out against the right hon. Gentleman, and he is unable to dispose of it, he always says it is a matter of the most trifling importance. About a week ago, at the Crystal Palace, the right hon. Gentleman declared that the importance of the Licensing Clauses of the Local Taxation Bill was greatly exaggerated, and that, in his opinion, they constituted a matter of the most trifling importance. We may be permitted, I think, after the Barrow election, to hold a different view, and the Conservative Party throughout the country holds a different view. I now come to some of the complaints I have to make against the right hon. Gentleman. My first complaint is of the character and tone of the right hon. Gentleman's answers to the questions we put to him in this House. The right hon. Gentleman, when charged on this point the other day, said that if we did not like the tone and the nature of the information which he gave in his answers we had an easy remedy, and that was to abstain from asking questions. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) pointed out, we have an easier remedy than that, and this is to stay at home in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial side.] I am extremely obliged to hon. Gentlemen opposite for that cheer; but in 1886 when it was proposed that the Irish Members should stay in Ireland, in order to transact the business of their country, Member after Member of the Tory Party rose and said that they would never consent to it. I recommend this fact to the attention of the Committee and of the people of the country, that the Irish Members are now considered to be a nuisance, and out of place in this House; but that when it comes to be a question of going home to Ireland, and attending to the business of our country in Dublin, we are told that our presence in this House is necessary for the unity of the Empire. Do hon. Members opposite suppose that by dragging us from our homes, and then insulting us, they are contributing to the unity of the Empire? This statement of the Chief Secretary that if we do not like his answers we can refrain from asking questions is an excessively impertinent and insolent one. I go further, and say that it is utterly unworthy of a Minister responsible for the Government of a country like Ireland. Surely the Irish Members are entitled, as the Representatives of the people, to ask questions dealing with the administration of their country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not wish to interrupt, but I was speaking not of the tone, but of the substance of my answers. The hon. Member surely knows that when a question is asked of a Minister the Minister, of course, gives the information which he obtains from official sources.

MR. DILLON: I was coming to the question of the substance of his replies, and I think I shall show the House that in his speech just now the right hon.

Gentleman absolutely and completely gave the go-by to all the complaints we have made in that regard. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether there was any real, substantial difference as to contemporary facts in Ireland between him and the Members of the Opposition. A more extraordinary question has never been asked. The question rather ought to be, "Can you find any fact on which we agree?" The right hon. Gentleman says that the facts in regard to the contemporary state of Ireland are admitted on all hands, and then he plunged into a long string of statements of opinion. But we have not asked the right hon. Gentleman to state whether the Plan of Campaign is in force on estates in Ireland, whether boycotting is illegal, or whether intimidation prevails. Those are questions of opinion. The objections we have to the substance of his answers are to this effect, that when we bring forward statements of fact, involving certain conduct on the part of the police, the gross misconduct of Magistrates and other officials in Ireland, we receive false and misleading information in reply from the right hon. Gentleman. We have convicted him, over and over again, out of his own mouth, of making statements that were inaccurate. In reply, the right hon. Gentleman says he can do no more than give the official information placed in his hands. This seems to me to be the reductio ad absurdum of the whole process. In reply to a question incriminating a Magistrate in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman reads out, without inquiry or investigation, an answer concocted, perhaps, by the Magistrate himself, or by some of his subordinates. By this method of procedure the right hon. Gentleman declares to the country his incapacity to be at the head of an Administration like that of the Irish Government. Where a serious charge is brought against the officials of a district in England no Minister would dare to burke that charge without some investigation. When an Irish Member charges an offence against some official in Ireland, giving all the particulars, the Chief Secretary telegraphs to the district where the offence is alleged to have been committed, and the official, or his comrade, sits down and invents any lie he likes, and the right hon. Gentleman reads it out to the House of Commons, and absolutely refuses to make any further inquiry. Take the case of Mitchelstown. When I brought forward that case, gave my own experience, and produced two English Members of Parliament to corroborate all I said, and several independent English visitors, besides several newspaper correspondents, the right hon. Gentleman read out to the House the account furnished by the Magistrate in charge, Captain Segrave, and deliberately refused an investigation. He then, and on a subsequent occasion, made himself the champion of Captain Segrave. What was the result? After some time we discovered Captain Segrave to be a man of a character so scandalous that the right hon. Gentleman himself was obliged to dismiss him.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me. Captain Segrave was not on the spot during the riot.

MR. DILLON: Captain Segrave was in command on that occasion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member accuses me of having given my account of what occurred at Mitchelstown on the authority of Captain Segrave. I did not. He ought to have been on the spot, but he was not.

MR. DILLON: The account was given on the authority of Captain Segrave and his comrades. Captain Segrave, I am informed, was on the spot before the shooting, and he was certainly on the spot immediately afterwards. The right hon. Gentleman, in the Mitchelstown Debate, and on subsequent occasions, championed Captain Segrave, who was afterwards proved to be a man who ought never to have been appointed to the magistracy, who was absolutely incompetent, and of a shockingly bad character.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was not Captain Segrave's account that I gave. Of course, I gave the official information at my disposal, but my account was largely based on the account in the Freeman's Journal.

MR. DILLON: I am perfectly content to leave that circumstance to the judgment of the Committee. Then there is another case—a charge of moonlighting was made against a constable, named Palmer, one of the 150 armed constables who are trying to keep order in Tipperary. One night Palmer left the barracks in a state of intoxication. He met some girls dancing round a bonfire, and, having grossly insulted them in the foulest manner, and struck two of them across the breast, came to the house of an old widow, and, after smashing every window, tried to burst in the door. Failing in that, he went to the next house and smashed some windows; but the owner of the house, who was a courageous man, jumped out of bed, and succeeded, with the assistance of his dog, in holding the constable till help came. The man was caught red-handed moonlighting. Surely if ever there was a case in which care ought to have been taken to bring the offender to justice this was one. But what was done? On the opening of the Inquiry before a Bench of Magistrates to-day, the District Inspector said that rather a long look would have to be made for Palmer, as he had a telegram from him stating that he had left Queenstown yesterday.

THE CHAIRMAN: As this is a matter affecting the conduct of the police it should have been discussed on the Police Vote.

MR. DILLON: I would point out, Sir, that it is not a question of the conduct of the police. It is a question of the conduct of the Executive Government. The man to whom I am referring is no longer a policeman, for he has been dismissed. The question is, Is he to be allowed to escape from justice because he has been a policeman? I charge the Executive with having allowed this man, caught red-handed in a felony, to escape from justice because he has been a policeman. Evidence was taken in the case, and the Magistrates, I suppose by way of a joke, indicted a fine of £1. One of the things we have to complain of is that, when specific cases of violence by the police are brought before the right hon. Gentleman, he has always replied that the sufferers have a remedy at law. What remedy had the sufferers in the case to which I have just called attention? The police in Ireland are constantly violating the law, and the Executive systematically refuses to punish them, and when people seek a legal remedy the Executive places in the way every obstruction which a complicated legal machinery renders possible. I say this deliberately, that if the police in Ireland have committed a great many acts of violence their conduct is largely due to the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's answers to questions. The right hon. Gentleman says if we do not like the tone of his answers we had better not ask questions. I say we are entitled to ask questions, and we are entitled to get civil answers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry to interrupt, but I never attempted to discuss the tone of my answers. What I have referred to is the substance of them. For the tone of my answers I am, of course, responsible, and I have not made any excuses for it.

MR. DILLON: We complain of the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's answers. I think Gentlemen opposite will admit that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman is irritating in its character, and the tone of his answers aggravates the position. Hon. Members opposite affirm that the Irish Members in this House are on a footing with the English and Scotch Members. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes; that is your theory, but your practice does not accord with it. An Irish Member in this House does not obtain the same justice as an English or Scotch Member. We are met by the Chief Secretary with gibe and insult, and a tone and character of answer which is never adopted by any English Minister. I think this is cause for complaint. It is still more a cause for complaint when we see reflected in the tones and the acts of his subordinates the spirit he displays at that Table. I never feel the least difficulty in restraining myself when I am attacked by the right hon. Gentleman. But it is a totally different matter when we cross the Channel. The gibes and insults of the Chief Secretary in this House may irritate some of my Friends; but it is a totally different matter when they are translated, as they are in Ireland by his underlings, into the batons and bayonets of his police, and the short sentences and hard labour of his hireling and profligate Magistrates. With the honourable exception of a few men, who are not allowed to sit on Crimes Act Benches, there is not a Resident Magistrate in Ireland who does not read and study every word spoken by the right hon. Gentleman, and hence the insolent remarks and offensive tone of the right hon. Gentleman mean, to our people, additional suffering.

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [8th July] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

CLASS III.

Resolution read a first and second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

*(12.3.) Mr. H. GLADSTONE (Leeds): When this Vote was before the Committee the other day I raised a question as to the Charleville shooting case, and was surprised when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said he could not accept the statement of myself and the hon. Member for North-East Cork that no further action would be taken against District Inspector Concannon. I have now received this telegram—

"Action Nolan against Concannon won't be proceeded further with.—Wm. J. Fitzgerald, plaintiff's solicitor, Mallow."

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will take that as authoritative. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what course he proposes to take with regard to the police who were guilty of wantonly and illegally shooting at an innocent, unarmed, and orderly crowd? There were about 70 citizens on the platform of the railway station that night. Four shots were deliberately fired with intent to wound or kill. The right hon. Gentleman told us to-night that the epitaph he desires to be written on his administration in Ireland is that he defended the rights of every citizen. How does the Chief Secretary propose to vindicate the rights of those citizens of Charleville, and what course does he propose to take with regard to the expenses of the police in the trials in Dublin?

(12.5.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Now I know, for the first time, that no further proceedings will be taken, I shall, of course, examine into all the facts connected with the trial.

(12.6.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: The right hon Gentleman must not suppose that the matter is to be disposed of in that way. He tells us below the Gangway that we need not ask him questions. He has been asked a question now, not by an Irish Member, but by the son of an ex-Prime Minister and of a future Prime Minister, and we have heard what answer he has given across the floor of the House, on the pretence that it was never the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to examine into the brutal and blackguardly conduct of Concannon, or to bring his mind to bear on the declaration of Chief Baron Palles, or Mr. Justice Murphy. That is a specimen of the right hon. Gentleman's answers to questions on a matter of the most vital importance in regard to Ireland. What, under these circumstances, can the obscure Irish Members, who are taunted with poverty, and with not being good enough to sit in an assembly of this kind, what are mere creatures like us to expect? Sir, we shall insist upon having something like a definite statement before the Report of this Vote is agreed to. The Lord Chief Baron told the Jury that the gathering was not an illegal assembly. The Jury were unable to say whether, as a matter of fact, the injury to the plaintiff was inflicted by Concannon's bullet; but it was admitted that the police fired upon this unarmed and inoffensive crowd, with the view, as they swore, of taking life. The Jury were told that they were not entitled to consider whether the police were justified in firing, but it is a question for the Government and for the House. If it had been a case of batoning the people in Trafalgar Square, the Home Secretary would not have professed in the House of Commons that he had not considered what had been said by any London Magistrate, or he would not have held his place 40 minutes. We have a right to know whether Concannon's expenses are to be paid by the Government or not. There is no device too mean or contemptible for the Government to resort to. In the case of Father Kennedy, who obtained a verdict for £100 against the police, for breaking into his house, application has been made for a new trial, which cannot be argued until November, solely in order to put the case over the present year's Estimates. We know that the police expenses will be paid in that case, and that Concannon's expenses will be paid. The Government will not have the face to put them in the law charges, but they will pay them out of the Secret Service Fund. If a policeman were to stab the Leader of the Irish people in Sackville Street, Dublin, and the Government did not back up the man and pay his legal expenses, that moment the entire system would crumble away. The right hon. Gentleman is tied to a system which I do not hesitate to describe as an infernal system. I denounce that system which puts into the hands of every drunken braggadocio who is in the service of the Irish Government the right of firing off his weapons as he will, knowing that the greatest intellects at the Irish Bar, and the virtual Leader of this House, the rising hope of a stern unbending power are bound to defend him through thick and thin. As the right hon. Gentleman tells us he cannot answer to-night, we tell him we cannot give him this Vote to-night. We shall be prepared to discuss the Vote as soon as the right hon. Gentleman is in possession of information, and, in the meantime, I have the honour to move that the Debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

(12.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already addressed the House, and I suppose I should be out of order if I discussed the arguments put forward by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will withdraw the Motion if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to discuss what I have said.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I only speak by the leave of the House, and what I say shall be put in the most uncontroversial language. I do not think the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. Gladstone) could complain of the tone of my answer to his question, though, of course, he has a right to complain, if he likes, of the substance of it. Let me remind the House of the exact position in which we stand. I have learned to-night, at a quarter-past 12 o'clock, from a telegram sent not to me, but to the hon. Member for Leeds, that the case which all the Irish papers have agreed in stating would be proceeded with has come to an end, and I am now asked, at 20 minutes past 12 o'clock, to state the exact course the Government intend taking in reference to it. It is perfectly true that I have read the charges of Mr. Justice Murphy and Lord Chief Justice Palles, but not with the care I should have done had it been a question of taking judicial proceedings. It is quite true, however, that both those learned Judges appear to have said that the meeting in question was a perfectly legal one, and that there had been no probability of a rescue being attempted. But what course should be taken on these facts I must absolutely decline to deal with at five minutes' notice. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. Healy) has said that if the Home Secretary had been asked a similar question he would have given a reply at once. I am perfectly certain that my right hon. Friend would have absolutely declined, unless he had time to weigh the facts and to consider the whole of the circumstances, to decide what course should be taken with regard to the costs. It would be a great dereliction of duty on my part if, after a Debate which has now gone on, as far as I am concerned, since four o'clock this afternoon, and which in my case was preceded by a no less heated Debate between 12 and 3, I were to say I was in a condition to give a judgment to the House which may affect the future of all the policemen concerned. I am sure the House will see that, in refusing to give a decision now, I am not only acting with no discourtesy to the hon. Member for Leeds, but I am taking the only course which every impartial Member of the House will not condemn.

(12.24.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): To a large extent I agree with the observation of the right hon. Gentleman that it is not to be expected from him that he should be prepared to state the course that the Government will take in this matter, which admittedly is one of considerable importance, at five minutes' notice. But if it is impossible for the Government to determine what course they will pursue in reference to the matter at this short notice, certainly the House of Commons cannot be expected to part with their control of the subject until the decision of the Government is announced. The matter was brought forward with every particularity and circumstance by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, on Monday last, and all the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary then said, was, that he could make no further statement respecting it because it was sub judice. The right hon. Gentleman appears now to know no more about the circumstances of this important case than he did on Monday last.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was not over.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not care whether it was over or not. It was the right hon. Gentleman's duty, in my opinion, during the four days that have elapsed, to make up his mind on the prima facie case, at all events, and to acquaint himself with the circumstances, so that he might have been enabled to say more to-night than that he will make inquiry. It is monstrous to ask the House of Commons, by passing this Vote, to part with the whole subject, and to leave it entirely to the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman whether we are ever again to have an opportunity of discussing it.

(12.27.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I say I believe the question would more properly come up on the Law Charges Vote?

MR. T. M. HEALY: As a matter of order, I wish to say that we were told by the right hon. Gentleman, as a reason for closing the Vote the other night, that we could discuss everything we wished to discuss on the Police Vote upon the Vote for his own salary. Now he tells us we can discuss on the Law Charges Vote what we want to discuss on this Vote. We have to reckon with the Chairman of Committees.

(12.28.) MR. J. MORLEY: I submit, with all respect for the right hon. Gentleman, that this is a topic which concerns the conduct of the police. It is not a point which entirely affects the law charges. This is the way that Irish subjects are always dealt with. Any occasion is fit to discuss a charge except the present occasion. On Monday the right hon. Gentleman could not deal with it because proceedings were then going on. To-night he cannot deal with it, first of all, because he has not yet received the necessary information, and secondly, because we are able to discuss it at some other time. Why was the Vote closed on Tuesday night? I can understand what may have been in the minds of the Government, but, having availed themselves of the Closure on Tuesday, it is rather too bad to come down now and say that this Vote must be passed without the question being raised upon it. I feel this so strongly that, whatever my hon. Friend the Member for Longford has done, I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. J. Morley.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not wish to insist on the Vote. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman has taken this course, but, perhaps, it would be better if I put off the Vote.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 214.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

COURT OF CHANCERY OF LANCASTER
BILL [LORDS].—(No. 353.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee, read.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I object.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I trust my hon. Friend will not object. The Bill is desired by all commercial communities in Lancashire as well as by the legal profession.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 167.)

Order for Bill, as amended, to be considered read.

DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. BRUNNER: I appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his objection.

DR. TANNER: I protest against important Bills being proceeded with at this time of night. I shall continue my objection.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

NEW LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL.
(No. 249.)

Order for Committee read.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In view of the opposition of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, I beg to move that the Order be discharged. This is a Bill for the promotion of temperance in Ireland; but it is objected to by the temperance advocate, the Member for South Tyrone.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I may be permitted to say I oppose this Bill because the 3rd clause makes it a Licensing Bill.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) ACT
(1886) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 342.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I hope my hon. Friend will not object to this Bill going through. This is a very small Bill indeed; it is merely to secure that the 28th of May shall be the uniform removal term.

DR. TANNER: I have laid down a rule, otherwise I should be very glad to withdraw my objection.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I appeal to the hon. Member to let the Bill go through. It is important that a uniform date should be fixed, and the Bill has the approval of the whole of Scotland.

DR. TANNER: I do not like to object to a Bill that the hon. Gentleman takes an interest in, but, having made a rule, I must adhere to it.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND)
BILL.—(No. 53.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I hope the Lord Advocate will now say what course the Government intend to take in regard to the fisheries proposals of themselves and myself?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Government Bill has not yet passed through the House of Lords. I may say the question has been considered by the Secretary for Scotland, and he does not think it would conduce to prompt legislation if the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman were adopted.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

MOTIONS.

LICENSING (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Vernon, Bill to amend the Licensing (Scotland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Vernon, Mr. Baird, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Haldane, and Mr. Williamson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 376.]

SHREWSBURY AND HOLYHEAD ROAD (ANGLESEY AND CARNARVON) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to make further provision concerning certain portions of the Shrewsbury and Holyhead Road, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 377.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Friday, 11th July, 1890.*LORD CARBERY (CLAIM TO VOTE FOR REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND).

Ordered and Directed, That a Certificate be sent by the Clerk of the Parliament to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, stating that the Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom has reported to the House of Lords that the right of the Lord Carbery to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland has been established to the satisfaction of him the said Lord Chancellor; and that the House of Lords has ordered such Report to be sent to the said Clerk of the Crown in Ireland: And it is hereby also Ordered, That the said Report of the said Lord Chancellor be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland.

THE CONDITION OF IRELAND.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in rising to call attention to recent occurrences in the town of Tipperary and on the Ponsonby Estate in the County of Cork, and to the action in connection therewith of the National League, said: My Lords, the condition of things which prevails, and has for some time prevailed, in and near the town of Tipperary is so remarkable that I think it deserves the consideration of this House and especially I hope that it will obtain due attention from the country. In Tipperary we see the extraordinary spectacle of a large number of tenants at issue with a landlord, who is admitted to be one of the best landlords in Ireland, and for whom the tenants themselves had before recent occurrences always shown the greatest respect. They are tenants not merely of agricultural farms, but also of urban holdings, and many of those who have urban holdings pay to Mr. Smith-Barry merely a small ground-rent and have erected valuable tenements with their own capital. None of the agricultural tenants have complained of the rents they are called upon to pay. Yet we see the extraordinary spectacle of men quitting fine shops, substantial houses, and good farms, ruining themselves and sacrificing their business for some reason which it is very difficult to understand. But one thing is plain, and it is that all this is done under the guidance of the local and the central leaders of the National League. The instrumentality of the National League is beyond all doubt and question; and it is very fortunate it is so in this case, because we are thus enabled to see the National League in its working, and to test how far the statements of its leaders which are made in Parliament are true; we are also enabled to examine the working of their organisation, which is conducted upon fixed principles and upon a regular plan. That plan I shall proceed to lay before your Lordships. I do not think it would be possible to get a more excellent illustration, of the methods of the National League than we have in this case. If your Lordships wish to understand this matter aright you must look at the question as a whole; you must not limit yourselves exclusively to what is now going on in Tipperary; but you must go back to the causes and to the origin of this dispute between Mr. Smith-Barry and his tenants. For that purpose it will be necessary to allude for a moment to what has taken place upon the Ponsonby Estate, near Youghal. When Mr. Ponsonby succeeded to the estate a great many years ago, it was well-known to be in a somewhat encumbered position. He has resided a good deal on the estate from time to time, and he is well acquainted with all the circumstances of his tenants. That their rents were moderate was shown by the fact that out of 237 tenants only some 70 served originating notices under the Act of 1881, and that out of those 70 only 27 went into the Courts, the remaining rents being settled by private agreement. The average reduction taken over the whole estate was rather less than 13 per cent. In 1885 Mr. Ponsonby gave reductions of 10 and 20 per cent. to his judicial and to his non-judicial tenants respectively; and in 1886 he made the same offer. But by that time the Plan of Campaign had been organised. On the 14th of November in that year a meeting of his tenants was held, at which Mr. Lane, M.P., and Dr. Tanner were present, and at this meeting reductions of 25 and 35 per cent. respectively were demanded. As that was not acceded to, the Plan of Campaign came into force on the estate, and from that time to the present not a penny of rent has, I believe, been paid upon that estate. Mr. Ponsonby made several attempts to arrange with his tenants, into the details of which I need not go; and, finally, in November, 1888, he authorised a former agent to accept a sum of £110,000 in full for the purchase of the estate. The tenants, through their representative, Canon Keller, offered £106,000, but also claimed to deduct Government charges amounting to some £16,000, which made the offer about £88,500 net. That offer Mr. Ponsonby's Trustees found it impossible to accept. It was at this point Mr. Smith-Barry, and others associated with him, appeared upon the scene. They saw that an attempt was being made to commit a very great act of injustice upon Mr. Ponsonby; they saw that this was an attack made upon a single landlord who was supposed to be in such circumstances that he was unable to resist it, and that it was intended to break him down by the sheer force and pressure of the principles of the Plan of Campaign. Therefore, Mr. Smith-Barry and others determined that they would help Mr. Ponsonby in this matter, and they purchased the estate. But before doing so they insisted that a fresh offer should be made by Mr. Ponsonby to his tenants, and that accordingly was done. By a circular of April 5, 1889, Mr. Ponsonby offered to every tenant, all then owing nearly, or quite, four years' rent, on the payment of one year's rent, either that their future rent should be fixed by agreement or through the agency of the Court, and that 3 per cent. should be paid by them on the balance of arrears, which should remain; or, if the tenants preferred to purchase, he proposed to sell to them under the terms of the Ashbourne Act at a price which would greatly diminish the present payment and would have made them owners of their holdings in 49 years. But all those offers were rejected, and the consequence was that in June of last year Mr. Ponsonby began to carry out evictions upon his estate. Now at this point I would ask your Lordships to note a fact which seems to me very important. It is this: that in the eyes of the National League

it is perfectly right that Members of Parliament should go down to estates with which they have nothing to do, and of which they know nothing, to incite the tenants to join the Plan of Campaign or to take any other course they choose to advise; but if any friends of a landlord who is attacked attempt to assist him, that is a monstrous act of tyranny which must be immediately avenged by the National League. Mr. Smith-Barry, as I have said, is one of the very best landlords in Ireland. It is admitted that he takes the greatest interest in his estate and in those who are upon it, and he has expended large sums of money upon it in the same way that many of your Lordships have done in England and Scotland and Wales; and if we wish for any testimony to his character as a landlord, Sir Charles Russell selected him when speaking before the Special Commission, and said that he was a good landlord, and that he (Sir Charles Russell) was glad to be able to mention him as an instance of a landlord who was not merely considerate in the matter of rent, but as a landlord who took an interest in the condition of his people, and in all that concerned them. His tenants have said precisely the same thing in a memorial which they brought to Mr. Smith-Barry in London last year. If you want further evidence, you have the evidence of Mr. Healy. Mr. Healy has said that Mr. Smith-Barry could not be fairly described as a rack-renter. Mr. Parnell has stated in a speech, and it has been repeated over and over again in the other House, that Mr. Smith-Barry prevented a settlement on the Ponsonby Estate. That is not the fact. The difference between the landlord and the tenants was no less than £20,000 out of £110,000. Mr. Smith-Barry did not have any dealings with Mr. Ponsonby or his estate until his offer had been definitely refused by the representatives of the tenants. The next thing that is said is that Mr. Smith-Barry's tenants rose of their own free will to assist Mr. Ponsonby's tenants. Now I shall ask your Lordships to listen to the manner in which this agitation on Mr. Smith-Barry's Estate arose. The agitation on Mr. Smith-Barry's Estates was started in the first place by Mr. Lane, M.P., in a letter to the Freeman's Journal of the 11th of March, 1889, in which he said that—

"If Mr. Smith-Barry devoted his rents to fighting the 300 and odd tenants on the Ponsonby Estate who nobly took the van in the last struggle to obtain justice for Irish tenants he might find it would not be to his advantage."

In a letter to Mr. Townsend, Mr. Lane, M.P., again pointed out that—"Sooner or later every one connected with this interference would regret their co-operation in it."

The next thing was a speech of the Secretary of the Youghal Branch of the National League, saying—

"It was time that Mr. Smith-Barry was taught a lesson, and he hoped the Tipperary tenants would consider the position of their brethren on the Ponsonby Estate."

Then, on the 28th April, Mr. Lane, M.P., again speaking at a place close to Tipperary, denounced Mr. Smith-Barry and said—

"We will make man-hunting a dear amusement to him."

On the 2nd May there was another meeting close to Tipperary; Dr. Tanner was there, and he called upon—

"The men of Tipperary to boycott Mr. Smith-Barry in every possible manner."

Another Irish M.P., Mr. John O'Connor, was also present, and spoke to the same effect. Then the next thing was that, on the 5th May, 1889, another meeting of the Tipperary League was held in the Town Hall of Tipperary, which, by the way, Mr. Smith-Barry built for the town and allowed public meetings to be held there at any time without any charge. On the 30th May again the National League of South Tipperary held a meeting, and Mr. O'Neill, who had been sent from Youghal by Canon Keller, spoke against Mr. Smith-Barry. Then, on the 23rd June, Mr. O'Brien attended a meeting at Tipperary of Mr. Smith-Barry's tenants, and delivered a speech, in the course of which he said—

"The tenants can, and I venture to promise they will, combine to warn Smith-Barry that if he is determined to create desolate homes on the Ponsonby Estate, his tenants may possibly be driven to leave him a desolate rent office of his own in Tipperary. I ask you to appoint a deputation to wait on Smith-Barry. What I ask you is, and I make no secret about it—I ask you, the Tipperary tenants of Smith-Barry, I ask you to appoint a deputation, who in the name of the whole body of tenantry, will be prepared to wait upon Mr. Smith-Barry, and upon Mr. Horace Townsend, and to address them in perfectly civil, but in perfectly determined, English. Let them say, 'We have given you no trouble upon your own estate; we want peace if we can possibly have it, but we are not going to stand idly by—it would be a crime and an eternal scandal if we did stand by—while our hard-earned money was used to inflict this abominable wrong upon our brother tenants.' Let them say to him, 'Give up this diabolical work—withdraw from this syndicate. Stand no longer between a settlement for these unfortunate tenants and their landlord.'"

And further on he said—

"And having said this much, I don't think that the deputation are bound to take Mr. Smith-Barry or Mr. Horace Townsend any further into their confidence as to what further course of action they may think it necessary to take. Possibly upon some future day—some future rent day—we may have an opportunity of consulting and of meeting here again, and of asking Mr. Smith-Barry once for all whether he has made up his mind to accept the same measure from his Tipperary tenants that he is meting out to-day to the Ponsonby tenants."

Mr. O'Brien was as good as his word, because on the 24th June he, accompanied by several Nationalist Members of Parliament, went round to all the shops in Tipperary with a memorial to Mr. Smith-Barry to the above effect, and a great number—nearly all—of the tradespeople signed it. At the same time, a gentleman was sent to Cashel to obtain signatures for it on Mr. Smith-Barry's Estate there. On the 26th June Archbishop Croke wrote approving of the combination, or as Mr. O'Brien had called "blessing their banners." My Lords, this is the manner in which this agitation was begun. It was begun not by the tenants themselves at all, as I have shown your Lordships, but by Mr. O'Brien and a number of other Nationalist Members of Parliament, and it was kept alive and fomented through the agency and instrumentality of the National League. On the 3rd of July the memorial to Mr. Smith-Barry was presented in London; and on the 10th of July Mr. O'Brien appeared at Tipperary on rent-day and made speeches announcing the Tenants' Defence League, and, no doubt, did everything he could to prevent the tenants from paying their rents. On the 9th of August Mr. O'Brien again went to Tipperary, when a resolution proposed, if I remember rightly, by some member of the National League, was passed at a meeting by which the tenants agreed to tax themselves 10 per cent. to raise a relief fund for the Ponsonby tenants, and to deduct 25 per cent. from Mr. Smith-Barry's rents—that is to say, the 10 per cent. they were going to subscribe for the Ponsonby tenants, with 15 per cent. more for themselves—and at the same time making a strong protest against the use that they alleged was being made of what they termed “their hard-earned money.” I ask your Lordships to consider what is the meaning of that term “their hard-earned money.” That expression shows that Mr. Smith-Barry’s tenants and the National League look apparently upon rent not as a payment due in exchange for advantages received, but as their own hard-earned money that was being extorted from them by their landlords, and which is to be spent only in such manner as I suppose they themselves shall approve. On the 24th of August the interests of a number of the tenants on the estate who had refused to pay their rents were exposed for sale, but out of five tenants’ interests that were exposed for sale no fewer than four were bought in. At the next sale of tenants’ interests, which took place on September 4, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Condon, and Mr. Gill, the Nationalist Members of Parliament, appeared on the scene, and still out of 20 tenants’ interests put up for sale no less than 13 were bought in. Yet, in the face of these facts, we are constantly being told by the Irish National leaders that the tenants act and have acted of their own free will in the matter. Well, what followed immediately? As a consequence of some of the tenants having bought in their interests, or paid their rent, their windows were smashed and pickets were placed at their shops, black lists were made containing the names of all those who had paid, and they were boycotted in the most determined manner. This treatment had its effect. It had such an effect upon the tenants that by October 17 the greater number of those who had bought in their interests or had paid their rent had made their submission to the National League, and, finally (I wish to tell your Lordships the story as shortly as I can), all the conditions imposed by that body were accepted, and those tenants were replaced in the good favour of the National League. The local branch of the National League thereupon passed the following resolution:—

“That, having read with satisfaction the apology of those tenants who purchased their holdings at Thurles on September 4, and their pledge to act in the future in complete unison with the general body of their fellow-tenants, we suggest to them that as the next gale of rent becomes due on November 1, on that date they should notify formally and publicly to Mr. Smith-Barry their determination, as now expressed to us, not to pay their rents and to allow their holdings to be sold unless he has by that time retired from the Ponsonby Syndicate and granted his Tipperary tenants an abatement of 25 per cent., and we hereby resolve that upon their doing so the past shall be forgiven, and they shall be admitted into the ranks of the combination.”

That was the condition of things on the Smith-Barry Estate at the end of October; and since that time many further outrages have been perpetrated upon this estate, an account of some of which was read to your Lordships the other night, and with regard to which I shall have one or two further remarks to make. The representatives of the National League in the other House of Parliament have stated over and over again that no intimidation has been practised upon the tenants, but that what has been done by the tenants of the Smith-Barry Estate has been done by them of their own free will, and they have protested that the National League is simply carrying out the will of the whole united country. I will ask your Lordships to listen to one or two cases of intimidation which I have before me. The noble Lord the other night, among the instances he gave in reply to my request for information, referred to the case of Mr. Holmes, a Presbyterian minister, who was boycotted for dealing with a boycotted trader; his daughters went into the town of Tipperary to purchase some goods and they were insulted, and, I think, stoned. Another case was that of Mr. O'Neill, a draper, who had the finest shop in the whole town of Tipperary; was compelled to close his premises after two months' boycotting, and his business, the goodwill of which was stated to be worth at least £10,000, has been entirely destroyed, and he has been obliged to remove, leaving his shop in a ruined and ruinous state, and go into an old butter store. Another case is that of a man named Duggan, an ironmonger, who for a long time stood out and refused to comply with the demands of the National League until about 10 days ago, when he at length surrendered on a bomb being thrown at his door, which exploded, fortunately without doing very much damage, but which so much alarmed him that he sent in his submission to the National League. And now I will call your Lordships' attention to a meeting which took place in Tipperary on the Sunday before the 4th of the present month of July on which date a report of it appeared in the Tipperary People. I think it is the very best evidence that your Lordships can have of the manner in which this agitation is conducted, because it is the report of a meeting of the Tipperary National League, Father Humphreys, the parish curate, of whom we have heard a good deal, was in the chair, and Mr. John Cullinane, who is, I believe, the local organiser of the Land League, was present with a very large number of other members of the League. I wish to read to your Lordships what Father Humphreys said as bearing upon this question of intimidation. He said—

"It is my pleasant duty to absolve from public censure three of our Tipperary tenants. One is Mr. McCurtin, of Killane. His offence has been going into a boycotted shop. He has expressed the most sincere sorrow for having done so, and he has promised not to repeat the offence, and we take that as a sufficient guarantee for his good conduct in the future. The other is Mr. Hogan, in the main street. He incurred public censure."

—mark the term, "incurred public censure," my Lords. And for what? For sending a messenger to buy sugar at a boycotted shop.

"He says he did not know the shop in which he got it, but still public opinion pounced down very promptly on him, and on the very day that he became aware he had incurred public displeasure, he closed his shop and gave it up."

That is an instance of a man who, having sent a messenger for sugar, who happened to buy it at a boycotted shop, thought it necessary not only to repent of having done so, but to close his own shop and leave it.

"The next is the case of Mr. Joseph Duggan. He has sent us this note addressed to the Secretary of the Irish National League in Tipperary, pledging himself to fulfil the conditions."

The following is the letter:—

"Dear Sir,—I wish to fall into line with my fellow tenants on the Smith-Barry Estate, and to do so, first, by proceeding against Mr. Smith-Barry for an account due by him to me. Secondly, by clearing my farms—that is, by clearing all the cattle off them—before July 20, and serving notice of surrender before November 1 by taking immediate steps to procure premises, and removing from these in which I am at present carrying on business. Trusting that this will meet approval,

I am, dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

JOSEPH F. DUGGAN."

Observe what Mr. Duggan has thought it necessary to do. Not merely does he leave his shop, but he also surrenders his farm, and he promises further to procure other premises. That is an expression which your Lordships may not understand, but which becomes plain from what is stated a little later. Mr. Humphreys says—

"There is one point in the surrender of Mr. Duggan, to which I specially call attention. He pledges himself to provide at his own expense accommodation for himself and his family in New Tipperary. The outlay of the tenants has been very heavy in the past, but this circumstance shows that the outlay is coming to a close."

Therefore, Mr. Duggan is to be compelled to purchase premises in New Tipperary; which means that he is to be obliged to pay part of the expenses which the National League have gone to in erecting these new buildings in the place which they call New Tipperary. Then Mr. Humphreys concludes his speech with this—

"I think we should now accept these conditions and remove the public censure from this gentleman. We should never exercise any form of coercion upon our fellow-countrymen except when it is absolutely necessary."

Out of Father Humphreys' own mouth the case of coercion and intimidation is demonstrated in direct opposition to what has been said elsewhere. In fact, his testimony was in direct contradiction to what was said on this subject by members of the National League in the House of Commons. Then Mr. Cullinan addressed the meeting, and so on. I need not detain your Lordships further with that. But I have a report of another meeting of the same sort, which took place on Sunday last. I will only detain your Lordships one moment by reading a sentence from it. Father Humphreys said—

"I have to announce to you to-day two more surrenders. We are most happy to receive these surrenders."

And then he puts the coercion question a little clearer. He said again—

"We do not wish to exercise coercion over anybody excepting as far as is necessary."

Therefore, wherever it is necessary, the National League are prepared to coerce any tenant who chooses not to fall in with their behests. Now, my Lords, that is the state of things existing at present on the Tipperary Estate. It is bad enough, but still I do not suppose that we can expect anything much better from the National League. What I do regret very much, and what I do think is a matter of much more serious importance, is that in this country one of the two great Parties of the State have associated themselves with the National League and supported it both in and out of Parliament. The Liberal Party at this moment, I regret to say, consider every question which comes up for discussion, every such matter as this Smith-Barry case, and other similar cases, only from the National League point of view. For instance, when a meeting is suppressed, as was the case a short time ago, on the 23rd May last, in Tipperary, they do not inquire who are the people who called the meeting, or what are their antecedents, whether they are such as would lead the Government to suppose that they are likely to induce the tenants to commit themselves to acts which are illegal and wrong; what they do is to take very much the same line as the Nationalist leaders themselves, and say, "Why is this meeting stopped; why are Members not allowed to address their constituents?" If Father Humphreys is "shadowed," the priest whose speeches I read to you just now, the Liberal Party do not consider what Father Humphreys has said or done; whether he is, or is not, declaring that he will exercise coercion over the residents in Tipperary; but what they say is that "It is a monstrous outrage to "shadow" Father Humphreys, and that on no account ought he to be interfered with." I regret to say that Mr. Gladstone, in considering this Tipperary matter, was most struck with the position which Mr. Smith-Barry has taken up. There was a letter written to him lately, in which it was pointed out that a widow lady who held a farm under Mr. Smith-Barry had her windows smashed and her whole staff of labourers and dairymen frightened out of her service without notice, so that if the agent of Mr. Smith-Barry had not come to her help she could not have milked her 40 cows.

The Earl of Camperdown

Mr. Gladstone, in reply, when his attention was called to this, said—

"I am afraid your views and mine are widely apart on this subject. I could not enter into the matter without entering into the deplorable and exasperating conduct of Mr. Smith-Barry in resisting the settlement of the Ponsonby Estate; but if the windows were broken that was an unfeeling outrage which I should be glad to see punished."

But what Mr. Gladstone put in the forefront of the case was Mr. Smith-Barry's conduct in this matter. That is what strikes him most. But is it true that Mr. Smith-Barry has resisted a settlement on the Ponsonby Estate? The Nationalist Members have said so; but is it true in fact? It can be proved by letters and documents that he did nothing of the kind; that the difference between Mr. Ponsonby and his tenants was the large difference of £20,000, and that at the time when Mr. Smith-Barry interfered there was no prospect or possibility of a settlement at all. I wish I could stop there, but there is another matter to which I feel I must call your Lordships' attention. As I regard Mr. Gladstone as the leader of the Home Rule Liberals in the other House, so I regard Lord Spencer as the leader of the Liberal Home Rule Party in this House, and I regret to see that Lord Spencer, in the last speech of his which I have read with regard to the National League, used language which appears to me to deserve notice in this House. He was speaking at Wolverton on the 1st March, and he said—

"I do not say for a moment that the Land League and the National League have always carried out their agitation in a legitimate way; they may have gone too far and followed illegal paths. I deplore that, and always have deplored it; but I maintain that they had some justification for their agitation, on the ground of the serious grievances which existed not only in regard to the Land Laws, but also in regard to the Government of the country. It is not for us, therefore, to criticise too minutely the methods which have been followed, although we may deplore some of the results which have followed their action."

Now, my Lords, I must say that I cannot conceive any language more likely to encourage the National League in the courses they have taken than language of that kind. Ah! my Lords, is there any use in deploring outrages if you say at the same time, "We ought not to examine too minutely or closely into the methods which are followed by the National League?" On the contrary; is it not a distinct encouragement to them? It is not as if these things were said by one of their own members; it is not as if they were said by Mr. Dillon or Mr. O'Brien or gentlemen of that kind, but coming from the noble Earl who has been Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, at a most important time, and under most important circumstances, I must confess that I, for one, at all events deeply regret the use of language of that description. My Lords, I gladly turn away from that. There is another argument which has been used in this matter, and which, I think, requires an answer. There are many persons belonging to the Liberal Party who point to Tipperary, and say, "How much does the position of affairs in Tipperary speak in favour of the present administration of law and order?" If Tipperary were the whole of Ireland, there might be something in that argument; but I will appeal to any Irishman—and there are many Irishmen present—to the declarations which have been made by public men, and by public men who are not on the Unionist side—I appeal to all who know Ireland, and who are interested in Ireland, whether the general condition of things in that country, in spite of what has occurred in Tipperary, is not much more favourable than it was two years or even one year ago. I have mentioned to your Lordships a few facts; I have restricted myself to facts and to speeches which I hope your Lordships will duly note, and which I hope will be duly noted throughout the country; and I am quite confident that if the public will only consider things as they are, if they will look at the existing facts, and will not be led away by rhetorical statements and figures of speech, the administration of Ireland and the people of Ireland will never be handed over to such a body as the National League.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY:

My Lords, my experience of your Lordships' House has led me to believe that noble Lords on the Front Opposition Bench are singularly reluctant to discuss Irish affairs in this House. On the contrary, my experience leads me to believe that they unfortunately prefer proceeding to country towns and there addressing packed audiences, who are ready to cheer to the echo any sentiments submitted to them, than to bring those sentiments forward in your Lordships' House when face to face with Members of the Irish Executive, anxiously waiting—indeed, I may say, almost courting—inquiry into their administration of Irish affairs. Consequently, my Lords, it is with no surprise that, on the present occasion, I see no noble Lord on the Front Opposition Bench rising to express any opinion either with regard to the present state of Tipperary, which has been so fully discussed by the noble Earl opposite who has just sat down, or with regard to the action of Her Majesty's Irish Executive in recently suppressing the meetings proposed to be held in both Tipperary and Cashel. I confess, however, that I had expected from the noble Earl, who, on two occasions, had the great honour of representing Her Majesty in Ireland, some expression of opinion. The right hon. Baronet, who occupied the position of Chief Secretary to the noble Earl during two years of his second term of Viceroyalty, displayed no such reticence in another place. On the contrary, he lost no time in bounding to his feet and denouncing the action of the Irish Executive Government in the severest and strongest terms, in suppressing what he was pleased to term as "liberty and freedom of speech in Ireland." I can only characterise that performance of Sir George Trevelyan as one of consummate audacity; for this was the man who, during the two years that he occupied the post of Chief Secretary to the noble Earl, had suppressed no less than 45 meetings in Ireland; and he justified his action in suppressing those meetings in a speech delivered to his constituents during the time he occupied the post of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in which a passage occurs which I shall take the liberty of quoting to your Lordships. He justified his action by declaring that those speeches, which were made for the purpose of denunciation, were "just as much a part of the machinery of murder as the sword-cane and the pistol." This was the same man who, about three years ago, declared—

"He was not going to leave the Liberal Party because a certain number of people told him he must use fair words regarding the violent utterances and lawless actions of those who are conducting the Plan of Campaign in Ireland."

Now, I am fully aware that for suppressing those meetings, as I have said, Sir George Trevelyan suppressed them, the noble Earl opposite was primarily responsible. [Earl SPENCER: Hear, hear!] I consider the noble Earl was fully justified in his action in suppressing those meetings, because he knew full well that meetings held in disturbed districts, where violent and incendiary speeches were made, were invariably followed by disastrous results to the peaceable inhabitants of that part of the country; and I say the present Irish Executive would be unworthy the name of an Executive Government, let alone a responsible Government, if they had allowed those meetings to be held in Tipperary and Cashel when precedent and experience had taught them that such meetings were invariably followed by misery, discomfort, and on frequent occasions, I regret to say, outrage and danger to the peaceful and law-abiding inhabitants of the district, whose only fault was that they declined to subscribe to the unwritten law of the League; that they wished to pay their just debts, and enjoy those legal rights which are open to every one of Her Majesty's subjects in every part of the United Kingdom. I should like to ask the noble Earl has he forgotten the crime and cruelty that followed the speech—now a very famous one—delivered by his friend Mr. Parnell at Ennis some years ago, when he called upon the people of Ireland "to shun as a leper" anyone who "dared to break the unwritten law of the League?" and, if the noble Earl will allow me to refresh his memory as to the effect of such expressions as "making a man's life not a happy one," and that "wherever he goes his lot shall not be a happy one," I would refer him to the Report of the Judges of the Special Commission, which the noble Earl has alluded to, and from which I notice, by-the-way, he, in his speeches in the country, draws some curious deductions, but which he is exceedingly reticent in referring to in your Lordships' House, where he will find it declared that outrage and crime have followed the speeches of members of the League. To quote the words of no less a person than Mr. Gladstone, they have left their marks indelibly traced in blood." And now, my Lords, let me ask you, Who are the people who deliver these speeches and preach these doctrines? They are the former bitter foes—at the present time, I regret to say, the intimate friends—of the noble Earl opposite. They are men who have promulgated illegalities, who have promoted sedition, who have advocated intimidation, and whose violent language has invariably been followed by crime and outrage of the worst description. I read, some months ago in a newspaper, a parody of a song which had been nightly sung in one of the most popular of the London theatres, which describes so accurately the characteristics of those men, the friends of the noble Earl opposite, that I will ask your Lordships to allow me to quote from it—

"The Irish World and such like slime

They all disseminated;

They never denounced the scoundrels prime:

They caused the causes that caused the crime,

And knew they were doing it all the time

Whenever they agitated."

Such, my Lords, are the men—and it is indeed a pitiable thing to see—with whom the noble Earl and his Colleagues are at present hand-in-glove, and by whom, I think I may venture to use the expression, they are led by the nose; and let me remind you that this body of men have by no means forgotten the treatment, the very proper and just treatment, they received at the hands of the noble Earl and the Members of the present Opposition; but are secretly laughing in their sleeves at them and glorying in the knowledge that they have reduced to a state of abject subjection a fragment of the once great Liberal Party. In the course of the Debate which took place on the Irish Land Purchase Bill, introduced in March last in the House of Commons by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, I noticed that Mr. Gladstone applied the epithet "chivalrous" to Mr. Parnell. Now, the Irish may be said to have many faults, though I do not admit it, particularly in the North; but I think if there is one characteristic of Irishmen it is that they possess a very keen sense of humour, and I think it must have been with a grim sense of humour that Mr. Parnell heard himself described as "chivalrous" by Mr. Gladstone, the man who but a few years ago, at Leeds, described him in the following terms:—

"For nearly the first time in the history of Christendom a body of men has arisen who are not ashamed to preach in Ireland the doctrine of public plunder. . . . I will frankly take the case of Mr. Parnell as exhibiting what I mean when I say the state of things in Ireland is coming to a question between law on one hand and sheer lawlessness on the other. . . . Mr. Parnell says if the Crown of England is to be the link between the two countries it must be the only link; but whether it is to be the link at all is a matter on which he has not, I believe, given any opinion whatever. . . . Mr. Parnell is very copious in his references to America, but in all his references to America he has never found time to utter one word of disapproval of or misgiving about what is known as the assassination literature of that country."

My Lords, when I read that expression "chivalrous" as applied to Mr. Parnell by Mr. Gladstone I could not prevent my mind reverting to a paragraph I saw in one of the public journals some few months before, which informed the public and the world that Mr. Parnell had paid a visit to Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden Castle. I could not help imagining what must have been Mr. Parnell's feelings on that occasion. When he crossed the threshold of Hawarden he must insensibly have been reminded that the last threshold he crossed—I will not say at the invitation, but rather at the bidding, of Mr. Gladstone—was the threshold of Kilmainham; and when a short time later, he enjoyed, as I suppose he enjoyed, the hospitality of his host in the shape of dinner, he must have been insensibly reminded of that banquet held not far from this spot when Mr. Gladstone, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of his audience, announced that he had that very morning arrested Mr. Parnell and sent him a prisoner to Kilmainham Gaol. But, my Lords, if such were the feelings of Mr. Parnell with regard to Mr. Gladstone, what must have been the feelings of Mr. Parnell when he found himself taken, in every sense of the word, by the hand by the noble Earl opposite—the noble Earl, whom Mr. Parnell had not hesitated to accuse of "conspiring with informers for the purpose of obtaining victims to what he called law and justice, by any and every means, whether they were innocent or not"—the noble Earl, whom Mr. Parnell's followers did not hesitate to denounce in the most vehement, violent, and malignant manner, and who even went so far as to attempt to blacken his unspotted character by allegations of so horrible and disgusting a nature that I am somewhat reluctant to allude to them in your Lordships' House? I confess it was with considerable surprise that I read the denial of the then Chief Secretary (Sir G. Trevelyan) to the statement of the hon. Member for Tyrone when that hon. Member asserted that charges of a horrible character had been brought against him, for I shall never forget, if I live to the age of 100, that day in the House of Commons when Sir G. Trevelyan, stung to the quick by a more than ordinarily insulting and disgusting epithet from one of his now friends, his then greatest foes, turned upon those foes, and, with a face livid with passion and a voice trembling with rage, declared, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of every part of the House, except that part occupied by the Nationalist Members—"I may be Chief Secretary for Ireland, but I am an English gentleman." I would ask the noble Earl, will he corroborate the statement of his Chief Secretary, and deny that charges of a grave and horrible character were brought against him? Will the noble Earl follow Sir G. Trevelyan's example and contradict me when I say he was charged also by his Parnellite friends—

"With having struck murderous blows at the people under his charge, with having stopped at nothing—not at secret torture, not at subsidising red-handed murderers, not at sheltering black official villainy with coat of darkness, not at police quartering, blood taxes, the bludgeoning of peaceful meetings, the clapping of handcuffs and convict jackets upon Members of Parliament, Mayors, and editors, not at wholesale battue of hangings and transportations by hook or crook, not at burying the proofs of his victims' innocence in their graves."

Those charges were made in United Ireland on June 13, 1885. Will the noble Earl deny that? Will he deny that even more horrible charges than those were brought against him by the Nationalist Party? The noble Earl will not. His temperament is either less forgiving or his memory more accurate than that of his Chief Secretary. Before I resume my seat there is one point on which I should like to say a few words. It is not altogether directly connected with the present question, but I shall perhaps be allowed your Lordships' indulgence for a few moments. When, four years ago, Mr. Gladstone flashed upon an astounded country his suddenly-devised scheme of Home Rule, the answer invariably given to us Unionists by our political opponents was that "Home Rule is necessary for Ireland, for Lord Spencer says so, and Lord Spencer has had nine years' experience of Ireland." With that argument I at once join issue: It is impossible—nay, I go further, and say it is absurd—to maintain that the noble Earl's present advocacy of Home Rule is derived from his practical experience of Ireland during the two occasions on which he was Lord Lieutenant of that country. During the whole of that time the noble Earl was diametrically opposed to Home Rule of any kind; and in support of this statement I will quote from a speech delivered by him at Bristol on November 14, some few months before he assumed the office of Lord Lieutenant for the second time, a passage which, I think, accurately expresses his then opinions with regard to the Home Rule question:—

"We must tell the Irish plainly that no Party in England, whether Conservative or Liberal, will put up with anarchy; and, what is more, that they are beating the air if they agitate for repeal of the Union. We hold that the continued union of Ireland with this country is of vital importance to us. We feel like the Americans, when the integrity of their country was threatened, and if necessary we must shed blood to maintain the strength and integrity of this country."

[EARL SPENCER: Hear, hear.] On entering upon his second term of office in Ireland the noble Earl succeeded to extraordinary powers of the most severe and stringent character. So severe and stringent were those powers that they enabled him to arrest on suspicion, and without trial, and to commit to prison, powers which remind me more of the lettres de cachet of the days of the Bastille than anything else in modern history. It was while in the enjoyment of extraordinary powers that the noble Earl, together with his Colleagues, went out of Office in June, 1885; but that he still held that extraordinary powers were necessary for the government of Ireland was shown by a speech which he delivered in your Lordships' House in January, 1886, when he denounced the Government of the noble Marquess, which had only been in office for a very short time, for not renewing some of the most important provisions of the Act of 1882. We now find the noble Earl advocating Home Rule for Ireland, though I believe I am correct in saying that from the moment he left Ireland in June, 1885, he has never again set foot in that country. Therefore, though I admit that the practical experience of the noble Earl in regard to Ireland, which is always, if I may use the expression, rammed down our throats, as to the strengthening of the law for the purpose of repressing crime and outrage, is great and invaluable, yet I equally maintain that the practical experience of the noble Earl with regard to Home Rule is worthless. I thank your Lordships for the indulgence which you have granted me. I do not address your Lordships as the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or as an Irish landlord, but as one of the Loyalists of Ireland—a body of men whom I regard as true and loyal supporters of the Crown and the Constitution in Ireland, but whom the noble Earl opposite has not hesitated to designate and describe as a miserable and despicable minority. I will not say behind the noble Earl's back, when addressing an Ulster audience, what I will say to his face in your Lordships' House; that I would infinitely prefer to be the most humble and lowly member of that loyal and patriotic body of men than occupy the present political position of the noble Earl opposite, who has renounced and repudiated every opinion he held during the time of his Lord Lieutenancy in Ireland; who has torn from his bosom those feelings which prompted and directed him to discharge his arduous and difficult duties so ably, so firmly, and so nobly, and who would now sacrifice—indeed, I should be justified in using a far stronger term with regard to the noble Earl's proposal—to hand over that loyal minority to be dealt with at the tender mercies of a disloyal majority. He would sacrifice those to whom he looked in times of difficulty and trouble, and to whom he knows very well he never looked in vain. The noble Earl is now subservient to the mandate of a body of men who were truly described by the Attorney General of his day as being steeped to the lips in treason, and by his own Prime Minister as marching through rapine and plunder to the dismemberment of the Empire.

*EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I am afraid that I shall not be able, nor should I desire, to deliver so exciting an oration as that which we have just heard from the noble Marquess the late Viceroy of Ireland; but I feel it necessary to rise on this occasion to answer some of the appeals that have been made to me in exceedingly strong language by the noble Marquess and by the noble Earl behind me. The noble Marquess found fault with me for not bounding to my feet at once at the conclusion of the speech of the noble Earl who has brought this matter forward. I will tell the noble Marquess why I did not rise to speak. I did not rise to speak because the noble Marquess was good enough, with the courtesy which belongs to him, to inform me before the Debate began that he intended to make an attack upon me. I, therefore, thought it was only right and necessary that I should wait until after the noble Marquess had spoken. I think he will himself see that I should not otherwise have had an opportunity of answering. I confess, however, that I did not intend to take part in this Debate, having another engagement. I came down to your Lordships' House in order to ascertain whether any personal attack was going to be made upon me, and, hearing that such was to be the case, I remained, at considerable inconvenience, and sent a message to say that I could not fulfil the engagement I had made. This is not the first time that the Front Opposition Bench in this House has been attacked for not raising or meeting discussions on the Irish question. I confess I think it would be very unwise of us in many ways to start discussions on the subject, because my belief is that such discussions would lead to no good result, and, therefore, we have not followed that course. Particularly, on one occasion, we were twitted for not having answered a noble Duke whom I am sorry not to see in his place to-night; but on that occasion it was thought better, as we were able to agree to the Resolution which the noble Duke proposed to your Lordships, that we should not take part in the Debate. On that occasion I came down perfectly ready to speak; but as that was decided, I had no opportunity of doing so. The noble Marquess has attacked me for not having raised discussions and made statements here, which, he says, I have made in other places. With regard to remarks which I have made in other places on the policy of the Government, I may say that, with very rare exceptions, I have studiously avoided attacking the Executive action of the Government. I am not aware that I have ever attacked their action in suppressing meetings, and I am sure I have never alluded to this subject of Tipperary or the Ponsonby Estate. I have studiously avoided doing that, because I have felt a certain delicacy in approaching those subjects which I had myself dealt with when I was in Ireland. If I were sometimes to indulge in discussions of the Executive action of the Government, I freely and at once admit that I should frequently have to differ ab initio from the action taken by the Chief Secretary in Ireland. I do not know whether the noble Marquess or anybody else considers they have been attacked by me; it is probably a matter of indifference to them whether I attacked them or not. But my own feeling has been that though I might have a strong opinion upon the subject, it would be better not to make an attack in regard to subjects of this nature. The noble Earl referred to a speech which I made in Wolverton, and criticised it very severely. I adhere absolutely to every word I said on that occasion. I believe the passage quoted is correct—he had the advantage of me in having the speech before him, as I did not know that I was going to be attacked, and could not refer to any reports—and I am not in the slightest degree ashamed of what I then said. I referred to the action of the Land League and the National League, and I said, as the noble Earl quoted, that I often deplored the action of those bodies. I adhere to that view. I have never defended the action of the National League, but I have always thought it right on those occasions to say what was just and fair, and I certainly did think, and I do think still, that there was occasion and justification for combination of a lawful kind in Ireland with respect to various matters. I believe there have been great grievances with regard to the government of that country. I believe there have been great grievances with regard to the Land Laws of that country. And in passing I may point to this: that no greater proof of the existence of grievances with respect to the Land Laws of Ireland could be found than by turning to the Report of the Land Commissioners, which shows what enormous reductions have been made in the rents by the official Judges in Ireland. That is a grievance which, I think, everyone must admit; and I, for one, consider that the Irish were perfectly justified, in a legal way, in combining, and in trying to secure justice with regard to rents. Certainly, I did not approve—on the contrary, I have always deplored—a great deal of the action of the Land League and the National League. I have deplored the action they have taken, and I have often had deeply to regret the consequences of what they have done; but I do not think we must hold those who took part in a union of this kind directly responsible for crimes that may have arisen from what they have legally done. I am quite aware that those who take part in an agitation, especially when a country is disturbed, ought to be doubly careful how they speak to an excitable people, but agitation and excitement afford no ground for saying that those who take part in a legal agitation should be accused of criminality or of participation in crimes which may arise; because it often happens in Ireland, as in this and other countries, that during periods of excitement the evil-disposed take the opportunity of committing crime, and there is no doubt that often very serious crime results from those conditions. Under those circumstances, I was justified in what I said at Wolverton, and again I say I adhere to what I stated on that occasion; and I think, when anybody who has any pretension to knowing anything of the subject, has the opportunity he should speak candidly and freely, admitting blame where blame should be attached, while admitting any justification for action that has taken place. Now, I will come to what the noble Marquess has said. He asks me whether I adhere to the policy which I was instrumental in carrying out in Ireland, and he referred to the suppression of meetings. He also referred to Sir G. Trevelyan's statement in the House of Commons with regard to that. I cannot at this moment exactly recollect what were the words used. I quite admit that a great many meetings—it may be, though I do not recollect, as many as the noble Marquess stated—perhaps he is right in saying 45—were put down by me under the special provisions of the Crimes Act of 1882. I admit that a great many meetings were suppressed under the special powers which then existed, and which do not exist now, as the noble Marquess knows. But I venture to say that I never stopped a meeting except in a district where violent crimes and outrage existed, or where the state of feeling was such that I was perfectly sure that crime would follow a meeting. I quite admit that at that time, when the country was in a very violent state of crime, when murders and murderous outrages were rife in the country, when they were perpetually being plotted and taking place, I was compelled to stop meetings. I had no hesitation in stopping meetings which I felt sure would, or thought were likely to, give rise to murder and outrage. But when Ireland became more quiet, in 1882 and 1883, I stopped fewer meetings as time went on, and at last I very rarely stopped any; and I am quite sure of this, that I never stopped meetings merely for the discussion of political matters or of general matters which might interest the people in the neighbourhood. I only stopped them when I was certain that violent crime and outrage, and probably murder, would arise from the excited state of feeling of the people. I know this: that I frequently discussed the question whether a meeting should be suppressed or not, and I never remember a single case where, having, after some doubt, allowed a meeting to go forward, I afterwards regretted that I had done so. Except in cases where murder or outrage are likely to follow, I am sure it is much more prudent to allow the fullest discussion of opinion in a locality than to cause the irritation and excitement which stopping a meeting causes. I say that at once, because that is the point upon which the noble Marquess challenged me, and that is the point—I have never said this before—where I think the policy of the noble Marquess and of the present Government of Ireland has been so radically and essentially wrong. I venture to say there is a very marked difference between the condition of Ireland now and the condition of Ireland when I had to suppress so many meetings. [Cheers.] The noble Marquess and others cheer that statement, and I know what that cheer means. It means that they believe they have been successful in their policy in Ireland. I might argue against that and bring forward proofs that it has not been so successful as they choose to say. The very fact of the necessity for bringing forward this Motion which my noble Friend has made proves that it has not been so successful, and it is plain that the condition of Ireland is not so eminently happy and satisfactory, when you find so powerful a League as the noble Earl has described defying, as it were, Her Majesty's Government in that country. But to return to what I was about to say. There is a vast difference between the condition of things when murders and outrages were rampant, and when no juries would convict, and that which now exists. I say that matters are not satisfactory even now in a great many places. From the cheers of noble Lords opposite one would suppose that the state of Ireland was eminently satisfactory, but the terms of the Motion itself show that is not the case. Speaking for myself, I have a very great dislike to this boycotting and intimidation, and I am afraid that a great amount of that kind of coercion still exists. I do not pretend that I have gone minutely into this subject of the Ponsonby Estate or into the action taken in Tipperary. I have myself a very great regard and warm friendship for Mr. Smith-Barry, and I can hardly conceive it possible that he would do anything unjust in any way. But, at the same time, if I were challenged to it, I should express the opinion that the course he has followed has not been wise or expedient, though it was perfectly within the law. Then we come to Tipperary. I do not myself like violent or extreme methods. The action taken by the National League in Tipperary is, no doubt, violent. I do not like the measures which have been adopted there. But, at the same time, if we except outrages such as the throwing of tin bombs, or whatever they are called, and actual intimidation, I doubt whether it can be shown that the mere action of Mr. Smith-Barry's tenants in Tipperary and the establishment of New Tipperary is actually illegal. Certainly I have not noticed any action on the part of Her Majesty's Government to make me think that that state of things is illegal. The noble Marquess referred to a great many matters, and he certainly went a long way beyond the terms of the question brought forward by the noble Lord. The noble Lord only called attention to the action on the Ponsonby Estate and to the action of the National League; but the noble Marquess certainly took a very wide latitude, and wandered over the whole condition of Ireland, and even alluded to a speech made by Mr. Parnell at Ennis long before I went to Ireland. It is not for me to defend Mr. Parnell or to defend Mr. Gladstone; but when the noble Marquess says that the Irish Members never denounced crime, he is going rather far, for, if my recollection is correct, that is one of the points which the Royal Commission gave in favour of the Irish Members. Well, now, I come to another fact. The noble Marquess quoted some words of Mr. Parnell's in which he accused me of having connived at or practically been guilty of something like murder, by allowing innocent men to be hung. That was a very terrible charge and was language perfectly unjustifiable. I cannot recollect whether my attention was called to it when the accusation was made; but when I heard it alluded to first in the House of Commons, when I was listening to the Debate, I was struck by its extreme unfairness. But what occurred? At the very moment it was made Mr. Parnell got up and withdrew what had been said, and stated that it had been made under a misapprehension. Practically, he made an apology for it. I think it only right to say that, as the noble Marquess has thought fit to allude to it. Then the noble Marquess alluded to other matters, paragraphs couched in the most violent language. I should have thought that the noble Marquess had got accustomed in Ireland to rhetorical statements and phrases; and many of the phrases which were used were rhetorical and very violent. I should have thought, also, he would have known how largely such statements ought to be discounted, though there are some statements which cannot be discounted, I admit. But some of those paragraphs contained assertions which I should look upon as rhetorical and attach no importance to. The noble Marquess alluded to another matter, which is one of a very painful kind. It is one that I rarely, if ever, allude to, either in private or in public; but it is one on which I confess I have very strong feelings. The noble Marquess states that I was accused, and Sir G. Trevelyan was accused, of something worse than ordinary crime, and I should quite admit that that would be more than a rhetorical phrase like most of those which appeared in the Nationalist papers. My Lords, I have always resented most deeply the words that were used with regard to a painful matter which I had to deal with when I was in Ireland. But it is only fair for me to say, though I have often seen vague references in newspapers, I cannot recollect that I was actually accused, or Sir George Trevelyan, of a certain crime. That I cannot recollect. But what I was actually accused of, and what I resented in the strongest possible manner, was that I connived at the crime and shielded those who were guilty of it. There is some difference between the two things. I dislike extremely alluding to this painful subject, and I very much regret that the noble Marquess thought fit to allude to it here. As he has done so, I have felt bound to say what I have said. My Lords, I have really been rather led into this discussion by the manner in which the noble Marquess has spoken. Instead of confining himself to the subject of the Motion, he has, as I have said, travelled over the whole ground of disaffection and crime in Ireland, and even into the question of Home Rule. I must apologise to your Lordships for having gone at such length into these matters, because it is rather irregular to wander so far from the original Motion. But I wish to refer to one other matter. The noble Marquess attacked me for advocating Home Rule. I accept fully the responsibility which may belong to me for having done so. The noble Marquess says that my opinion upon that subject is worthless. Very likely it is. I do not for a moment pretend, myself, that my opinion on a matter of that sort is paramount, or should be listened to by my countrymen beyond what is right and reasonable. But I will venture to tell your Lordships why I hold my opinion. I do not for a moment say that I advocated Home Rule when I was in Ireland. I did not. I was not then of opinion that Home Rule was possible, and I had not seen my way to it. I endorse now every single word which I said in the quotation which the noble Marquess made from a speech of mine made at Bristol. I disliked and still dislike anarchy, and I say wherever it is in the British Empire it must be put down. I never advocated, and never could advocate, repeal of the Union. I maintain that what we propose would be to strengthen the Union and not to repeal it. Therefore, I do not shrink from one single word that the noble Marquess read from my speech at Bristol. Then, my Lords, with regard to why I adopted Home Rule. It is going into very old and stale arguments, but they are true, and therefore I think I may put them very shortly. I maintain that we have exhausted the present system and principles of Government, as shown by the present administration; that these methods have failed, and that we were bound to find some other methods which would restore Ireland to a condition of tranquillity, and make it a safe instead of a dangerous part of Her Majesty's dominions. It is because I dislike anarchy, because I dislike crime, because I dislike outrage, and because I dislike boycotting, and things of that sort, that I wish to bring a real and permanent remedy for all these evils to Ireland. You will never do it as long as you go on with exceptional laws and coercion; you will only be irritating afresh the Irish people; and I maintain that the only chance is to throw upon the Irish people, as I am sure you can do, under safeguards, with perfect safety, the responsibility for the government of their own country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, I cannot but think that your Lordships are under much obligation to the noble Earl opposite and to my noble Friend behind me, the late Viceroy of Ireland, for having induced the noble Earl, Lord Spencer, who has just sat down, at last to take part in your Lordships' deliberations. Because over and over again the attention of the noble Earl has been directed to these matters, and to the way in which they struck many Members of your Lordships' House; but in vain have attempts been made to induce him to rise in his place in Parliament, vindicate his action, and express his opinion upon the present state of affairs in Ireland. Therefore, it is, I think, that much gratitude is due to those who have, on the present occasion, practically compelled the noble Earl to rise and give his views on the events which are now going on in that country. It is very difficult for any man, no matter what his ability, or however high his character, to defend startling incidents in his political life. From what the noble Earl has said he must be about the most forgiving and the most forgetful man in the community, for certainly there has never been a man in public life who has had so much to forgive, and who has apparently taken upon himself to forgive so freely. As to his powers of forgetting, they are unrivalled and marvellous, because he pretends that he has been converted to the principles of Home Rule, forgetful of the entire action of his life up to the moment of that conversion, and he asks your Lordships to credit—as, of course, your Lordships will—the extraordinary statement, that the whole time he was in Ireland, a man of strong speech, resolute action, and clear and decided policy, he was wavering in his mind—

*EARL SPENCER: No; I never said I was wavering in my mind. I said that I had not at that time seen any possibility of any proposal for Home Rule.

LORD ASHBOURNE: That will suit me a good deal better. Then it appears that the noble Earl, during two Viceroyalties, spread over many years—this man of strong speech and resolute action, not seeing any other policy possible that was worthy of a statesman, except that which he was pursuing, suddenly, after Mr. Gladstone had announced his change, gives up all the policy he had previously observed, suddenly finds out that the old policy was wrong, and that the new policy was alone feasible and possible, and so lets all his past life go to the winds. I ask your Lordships to believe that he was wrong when he turned his back upon that old policy, and that he was not right in the insidious conversion which he now finds it so difficult to explain. The noble Earl said that he felt a certain delicacy—very appropriate words I daresay—about starting discussions in this House—

*EARL SPENCER: I did not say that. I am sorry to interrupt my noble Friend. What I said was that I had a certain delicacy about directly attacking the action of the Executive Government in Ireland.

LORD ASHBOURNE: Of course, I accept the noble Earl's correction. I accept anything he tells us; but I have myself a tolerably clear memory. Still, to prevent any possible mistake, I jotted down a couple of words from the noble Earl as he proceeded, and I certainly took down the expression that he did not like to "start discussion." I appreciate that. There are many reasons why the noble Earl would not like to start discussion. No one ever asked the noble Earl to start a discussion on these matters, or thought it possible or reasonable that he would care voluntarily to invite criticism of his position and attitude. The point of criticism to which we have directed ourselves, and which we have always insisted on is, that when the noble Earl's attention has been called by others to these subjects, he has been silent to the criticisms of those who addressed him, that he has sat silently listening to the charges made, with all the force and authority of those who addressed them, not explaining his attitude or conduct. He has offered no explanation, and he has left your Lordships under the impression that he preferred to remain misunderstood rather than to rise in his place and to take part in this House in discussions on subjects which he spoke of on many platforms in every part of the country where he chose to get an audience. That is a matter which I think of some importance. On one occasion—the 12th of July, 1888, as nearly as possible two years ago—the Duke of Argyll obtained your Lordships' assent to a Resolution, and I invite your Lordships to remember that Earl Spencer has explained to-day his attitude of silence on that occasion by saying the reason was that he and his Friends then saw their way to agree to the Resolution of the noble Duke. The Resolution, which was agreed to by the House nemine contradicente, was as follows:—

“That in the opinion of this House Her Majesty's Government deserves the support of Parliament in securing to the subjects of the Queen in Ireland the full enjoyment of personal freedom in their lawful transactions, and in protecting them from the coercion of unlawful combinations.”

It is very singular that that Resolution, proposed only two years ago, when your Lordships had ample experience of the system pursued by the present Government, was such that the noble Earl could agree to. But that is the explanation which he gives to day for not then rising and taking part in his place in this House in the discussion then proceeding upon the Resolution proposed by the noble Duke. His attention has been pointed to-day, and not unreasonably, to a not unimportant phase of Irish life at the present time. The noble Earl who inaugurated this discussion, the Earl of Camperdown, has cited some important matters at present going on in Ireland, and your Lordships had a right to expect that the noble Earl would express himself in clear language with reference to them, for they are matters which should command the unqualified disapproval of all who consider them. There can be no doubt about that. But I noticed that when the noble Earl came to deal with these questions he picked his words with the most extreme caution, in order that he may not be quoted as an authority who disapproves of what is now going on in the localities referred to by the Earl of Camperdown. The noble Earl said he thought “the measures or the methods were extreme,” which is a very limited kind of reprobation. That is not the strong vigorous language he would have used when Viceroy, in describing the same state of facts. I venture to say, also, that is not the language which a man would use who desired to characterise intimidation, as it deserves to be characterised, in the language of resolute denunciation. The noble Earl also used this qualification, that though the action was extreme, he was not prepared to say that, excepting in as far as it was connected with outrage and intimidation, he had much to say against it. What does that mean? Why, the whole case made by the Earl of Camperdown was that intimidation was the head and front and centre of the whole thing, that if you take out the intimidation you leave nothing. Therefore, I venture to think it would have been much more worthy of the best traditions of the noble Earl's life, and most consonant with that period of his career when he showed that he knew how to govern and rule, if he had expressed himself with greater clearness and directness on this important matter. But he let slip a sentence which really went a long way towards explaining the state of things brought forward by Lord Camperdown. He said, in one part of his speech, that “There is a powerful League defying Her Majesty's Government.” If that had taken place—if that state of things had existed under the Viceroyalty of the noble Earl, if any one could have said there was then a powerful League defying Her Majesty's Government, what would he have thought was the duty of Her Majesty's Government in the matter? The noble Earl has given some explanation of his attitude in reference to the suppression of meetings. I will put this question to him. Did he ever, in either of his Viceroyalties, hesitate to suppress meetings when he was satisfied that such meetings would lead to intimidation in the neighbourhood, and to a disturbance of those who desired to fulfil their vocations peaceably, or that they might lead to outrage? I venture to say that he never did, and that in the case of every single one of the meetings he suppressed he was satisfied they would have led to intimidation, disturbance, and outrage, if permitted to be held. I hear the noble Earl apparently commenting upon what I am saying, but I do not quite follow. I would much prefer if the noble Earl thinks I am not accurately representing him that he would get up and tell me where I am wrong. I will put the proposition again, that in the case of every one of the meetings he suppressed he must have been satisfied, and was satisfied, that if permitted they would have led to intimidation, disturbance, and outrage. That, I think, is a state of things to be deprecated and prevented, if possible, by every one who desires to see order prevailing in the community. The noble Earl says that he never sought to interfere with meetings, save under exceptional circumstances. There was certainly a meeting in the County Down, I cannot recall the name of the place at the moment, which was interfered with by the noble Earl opposite. I do not at all criticise his action in reference to it, but that was a case where he did interfere to prevent a discussion that was sought to be carried on. As to the attacks upon the noble Earl, he said, in the closing part of his speech, that he regarded them all as rhetorical.

EARL SPENCER: Not all.

LORD ASHBOURNE: Well, excepting the extremely painful one that was referred to by the noble Earl.

EARL SPENCER: I have not said that all the attacks made upon us in the Press were rhetorical.

LORD ASHBOURNE: I do not press the point at all. I am quite aware that any one at all who holds such an important office, and who fulfils such important duties in a country, must be subject to a certain amount of criticism which is disagreeable. The criticism of the noble Earl in Ireland was certainly intensely disagreeable, and could hardly be covered by the mild expression "rhetorical." It accused him of almost every crime that was possible or conceivable in administration, or that could be committed by one placed in his high position. The attitude which the noble Earl now chooses to assume in relation to those who made the criticisms is a matter entirely for himself, and I will pass that by, but I think it would have been more satisfactory if the noble Earl, when his attention was invited to certain matters now going on in Ireland, and when he was asked to express an opinion with reference to them, would have expressed an opinion with clearness, force, and a freedom from ambiguity, which would have prevented the possibility of his words being used as the words of one who had not a clear view antagonistic to those who were practising methods of intimidation, which ought to be reprobated as leading to results both deplorable and disastrous.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I must say I think this Debate has been one of the most extraordinary I have ever heard in this House. One would have supposed my noble Friend Earl Spencer was on his trial before your Lordships for what he did many years ago, but the only ground that I can find on which he has been so violently attacked is that he has not expressed an opinion on certain matters at a certain time. I have yet to learn that any noble Lord in this House is to be called upon to take part in any Debate, or that, if he thinks fit not to do so, he is liable to attack upon that ground. But I must congratulate the noble Earl on what has taken place, because evidently the most extraordinary importance is attached to his opinion, and it would seem that unless Her Majesty's Government can obtain an expression of that opinion their position is one that is not altogether comfortable or satisfactory. That seems to me to be the general result of the discussion. The noble Marquess opposite told us that he did not speak as an ex-Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, but in his character of an individual Peer, and evidently as an Orangeman from the north, and I was very glad to hear it, because I certainly cannot congratulate him, as an ex-Lord Lieutenant, either upon the tone, temper, or matter of the speech he has delivered. I cannot conceive anything more unfortunate than that a noble Lord who was recently Viceroy of Ireland should make an inflammatory speech against a large portion of the Irish people. The full explanation was given by the noble Marquess himself that he did not speak as late Lord Lieutenant, but that he spoke as an Ulsterman. Much as I admire the sterling qualities of the population of the north of Ireland, there is one thing I do not admire in them, and that is their Orange faction, which, I believe, has done as much harm as any other faction has ever done to that country. The language the noble Marquess used was exactly the kind of language I should expect to hear from an excited Orange landlord of the north of Ireland. Now, there has been a good deal said about Mr. Gladstone, but I think we may consider that Mr. Gladstone is perfectly well able to take care of himself, and it is not necessary now to refer to what has been said about him to-night. In the first place, as to the Motion of the Duke of Argyll, two years ago, which was alluded to by the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down, and who commented upon the fact that noble Lords on this Front Bench had not spoken, my noble Friend has already explained that that was because there was nothing in the Resolution in which we could not acquiesce. I entirely share with my noble Friend Earl Spencer whatever may have been the responsibility of our acquiescence in that Motion, expressing, as it did, a simple truism, which no one can question, as to the duty of Her Majesty's Government at all times. I acquiesced in it then, and I should acquiesce in it now. What was expressed there is, I hope, the duty of every loyal subject of the Queen, that is to support Her Majesty's Government in all measures necessary to be taken for the purposes indicated in that Motion. But what is sought to be inferred from the Motion is a totally different thing, that is, that we approved of the particular policy of Her Majesty's present Government. That, no doubt, was what was intended by the noble Duke, but we looked to the words of the Motion, and we considered that in assenting to the Resolution we were simply assenting to what it was impossible for anybody to deny. Now, the conclusion I draw from this discussion, and especially from the speech of my noble Friend who opened the Debate, is, that there is a powerful League in Ireland formed for the purpose of defying Her Majesty's Government. If that is the case, I think the success of the policy of Her Majesty's present Government in Ireland must be exceedingly doubtful. I have, of course, no means of judging what takes place in that country, except by what I read in the newspapers; but I have no doubt, from what I have now heard from my noble Friend, who is a supporter of the Government, that there is a state of things in one part of that country, at all events, which is in a very high degree unsatisfactory. If that be the result of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, it seems to me it justifies the position we have taken. Our position is very simple. We have ceased to believe in a policy of coercion, and we assert that it will fail in the effect desired from it, however ably it may be carried out; and we certainly do not acquiesce in the mode in which the coercive policy of the Government has been carried into effect. As the discussion has been extended over the general subject by the noble Lords who have spoken, I may for a moment venture to say that I cannot conceive a system more detestable—I believe it has been called “damnable” in another place—than that of the “shadowing” pursued by the present Government in Ireland. I deny entirely that, as has been said, it corresponds with the ordinary watching of a suspected criminal by a detective. I deny that it is the same thing, and I say that if the system of shadowing or sending constables to spy upon and overhear what is said by a man who may be suspected of boycotting or something of that kind were pursued in this country no Government depending on a system so unjustifiable could exist for a week. If I were to go further on the present occasion I should say that the whole demeanour of Her Majesty's Government, as represented by the Chief Secretary, towards a large portion of the Irish people, is in the highest degree impolitic. Nothing could be more contrary to the interests of this country than constantly to insult a large portion of our fellow-countrymen—the people of Ireland. Not very long ago I had occasion myself to take part in the carrying out of coercive measures, though in a state of things very different from the present; but at all events, while carrying out strong and severe measures, because I considered it my duty to do so, I cannot reproach myself with ever having addressed one offensive word even against those whom I believed to be guilty of conspiracy against the Crown. And I did not do so because I do not believe it is in the interests of this country to provoke the Irish people against us, and I did not consider it my duty to aggravate the hostility which, unfortunately, has so long prevailed among the Irish people towards the Government of this country. Reference has been made to my noble Friend's policy in regard to the suppression of public meetings. What I understood the noble Earl beside me to say was that he did not interfere with meetings unless he thought it was likely they would lead to murder or murderous outrage. The noble Lord (Ashbourne) added intimidation, but the noble Earl did not say he interfered with them simply to prevent intimidation, but when they would be likely to lead to murder.

EARL SPENCER: Or murderous outrages.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: At all events he did not say intimidation also. That was the correction I desired to make. Then to return for a moment to the immediate subject of this discussion from which we have wandered so much, the immediate occurrences and present state of circumstances at Tipperary. I am free to confess that my sources of information are not such as to enable me to form a very definite opinion as to what is taking place there. I suppose it is one of the episodes, and a very unfortunate one, no doubt, in the long war which has gone on between landlords and tenants in Ireland. In the event of a controversy arising between a landlord and his tenants I should think for a neighbouring landlord to interfere as Mr. Smith-Barry seems to have done with what did not concern him is very unwise and is likely to lead to disagreeable consequences. Then as regards what my noble Friend said in his speech at Wolverton. I, of course, do not defend violent intimidation or outrage upon inoffensive persons, and what Earl Spencer said in his speech at Wolverton was simply that we must make allowance for causes which lead to agitation, and for occurrences which may be the consequences of an agitation otherwise not criminal in itself. Here I would make this observation, that that remark is applicable fully to Trades Unionism in this country. We do not, any of us, in this country now think that Trades Unions are to be condemned as bad in themselves; but I am quite certain that nobody who has followed their action can have failed to see that there have been many things done which we must blame. On the occasions of strikes taking place many things are done which we must strongly and entirely condemn. But it is not that we condemn the whole system of Trades Unionism and strikes, but only those particular occurrences. I do not compare Trades Unionism as we have it in this country with such combinations as we see in Ireland; neither do I compare such action as sometimes follows Trades Unionism with the outrages which arise out of the action of the National League in Ireland. What I say is that in both cases you must bear in mind that there may be agitations which may be perfectly lawful in themselves which yet lead to occurrences which all must condemn and deplore. My Lords, I will return to what I begun by saying. The whole moral of this discussion seems to me to be that there is a state of things in parts of Ireland which is most unsatisfactory, and Her Majesty's Government must feel that their policy in that country is far from having been successful. My noble Friend behind me was taunted with his change of opinion; he admits that change of opinion; and I admit a change in my opinion. The noble Lord says the change in the case of my noble Friend has been sudden and extraordinary. Well, I suppose all such changes are sudden and extraordinary in the view of those who condemn them, but that does not prove that the change of opinion may not have been wise. There are occasions when it is very unwise to persevere in a course of action which is proved to have failed, and when much more courage and wisdom are shown in changing to another set of opinions. Then we heard from the noble Marquess the old stale assertions about our acting in concert with Mr. Parnell. I am really quite ashamed to give the very obvious answer that when it was convenient to the noble Lords a few years ago to act with Mr. Parnell for the purpose of turning us out of office they did not stop to ask themselves whether Mr. Parnell and his friends were persons with whom they would like to associate themselves in political life, and I think for that matter the whole of that subject might very well be dismissed. The question now is not what may have been Mr. Parnell's opinions in time past, not what may have been Mr. Parnell's relations with this or that Party in time past, not those matters which formed the subject of inquiry before the Parnell Commission, but whether or not the policy which is advocated by the Opposition or the policy which Her Majesty's Government have pursued is the wise one. I heard a noble Lord make reference to "the fragment of the Liberal Party." I think that "fragment" is a very large and solid one; and I venture to tell the noble Marquess opposite that it is not likely to be very long before that fragment will have grown so large as to carry some measure of Home Rule into effect.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN) : I can assure your Lordships that I had no intention of taking part in this discussion, and I shall not do so at any length. In my opinion the Debate will add something to the delicacy of which we have heard so much, which noble Lords opposite entertain in either originating or taking part in discussions which are originated in this House. I rise chiefly for the purpose of alluding to one remark which fell from the noble Earl who has just sat down, who found fault with the noble Marquess behind me because he said that the noble Earl, Lord Spencer, did not use his authority sufficiently either in this House or in the country to denounce the outrages and malpractices to which Lord Camperdown has referred. The noble Earl opposite (Lord Kimberley) went on to say that noble Lords who sit opposite ought to be very much flattered at finding that the authority of Lord Spencer is so high in this House that so much value should be attached to his opinion. It is natural, however, that value should be attached to the opinion of anyone who has occupied the position of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for so long, as Lord Spencer has done, I believe eight years, and that he should expect to find that his utterances in public should be treated with extreme attention on this side of the House. But what we complain of is that the noble Earl is not reticent when he goes about the country making speeches in small towns before picked audiences of a particular political complexion, and makes statements before those Radical audiences, but when he comes down to this House and hears his sentences quoted against him, and his opinions canvassed, he has hitherto foreborne to rise in his place and offer any explanation or denial of the sentiments he is accused of having uttered. I am happy to say that to-night he has, by the energy of my noble Friend, if I may be excused for using a somewhat vulgar term, been "drawn" at last. I will, however, venture to say that the answers which he has given to the accusations of my noble Friend behind me are not such as will carry conviction to the minds of his doubting countrymen. The real object of the discussion which has arisen to-night has been not only to explain to us the circumstances of the Tipperary case, because that was done sufficiently by the noble Lord opposite, who opened this Debate, but to demand, as I think we have a right to do, that the noble Lords opposite, and those with whom they are accustomed to act in political life, should do something which shall discourage the operations of the members of the National League, among whom they number so many intimate friends and colleagues, politically speaking, in order to mitigate those horrors which are perpetrated by the National League in Ireland. In the long history of misdeeds and acts for which it is difficult to find an adequate epithet, I know none more worthy the consideration of the country than the story which has been so clearly unfolded by my noble Friend. We have here the case of a landlord who is, it is admitted even by his opponents, of the most benevolent and liberal character, and who had lived ever since he became possessed of his property on the most friendly terms with his tenants, who had spent large sums of money on improvements for the advantage of his tenants, and who, generally speaking, it has been admitted alike by his advocates and by his political opponents, was a model of what a landlord should be in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions. This is the man who has been fastened upon by the National League, simply because he chose to adopt a course which certainly will not, I think, meet with disfavour from my noble Friend opposite or of any of his friends, that is to say, to join the Landlords' League, to go to the assistance of a landlord in his immediate neighbourhood who he thought required such countenance at his hands. What followed, the noble Earl has described. I need not say I am not going to repeat all the sickening details of the outrages which followed, and of the state of things which supervened. It is sufficient to say here is a once flourishing town which has had its trade destroyed, its buildings emptied, its markets ruined, and its inhabitants driven out of its borders. All this disorder has been caused by action of the National League, of a character which has been described to-night, but which we cannot induce noble Lords opposite openly and honestly to denounce. I venture to think that a great deal of what has happened in Tipperary could by the perpetrators be directly justified by the speeches of the noble Lord opposite and his friends. I consider that we owe a debt of gratitude to the noble Lord opposite and also to the noble Marquess behind me for originating this discussion, and for giving us an opportunity of stating publicly, which I venture to do not only as a Member of the Government but as a Member of your Lordships' House, the abhorrence with which we view the action of the National League and the disappointment we feel at the want of success of the repeated attempts we have made to induce noble Lords opposite to dissociate themselves from those with whom they are allied, and who pursue that action for political purposes. At all events, I am glad we have had an opportunity of making clear to the public to-night that we, on our part, are determined to uphold law and order, and to do our best to prevent the recurrence, if possible, of those acts which have been animadverted upon, and that in the future, as in the past, we shall continue, in spite of the speeches of the noble Lords opposite, to endeavour to the utmost of our power to destroy the baneful influence of the National League.

EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I do not wish to detain your Lordships for many moments, but I desire to protest against the assumption of my noble Friend Lord Spencer, that the rents determined by the Land Commissioners, and above all by the Sub-Commissioners, are to be taken as fair. The appointment of the Sub-Commissioners, and I say now what I have repeatedly stated both in public and in private, considering their antecedents and the language they had used about landlords and rents in Ireland, and I speak as an Irish landowner—the nomination of those men by the Irish Government of the day was enough to intimidate all landowners, and to lead to their apprehending what was in the result only too well verified, most unfair decisions on a very large scale by the Sub-Commissioners. The Land Commissioners' names were submitted to this House and to the other House of Parliament, but the Sub-Commissioners were appointed solely on the authority of the then Irish Government, and the great majority of the apportionments of rents which were so triumphantly alluded to by my noble Friend Lord Spencer were practically made by the Sub-Commissioners, in whom, for the reason I have given as to the majority of them, or certainly a large number of them, no Irish landowner could feel the slightest confidence. While I am addressing your Lordships I think I may venture to say that the rebuke administered by the noble Earl to the noble Marquess for using inflammatory language was rather misplaced. The most inflammatory and severe language that he could use fell far short of the quotations that he gave from the language of the noble Earl's own colleagues. The "Gospel of Plunder," and "drifting through rapine to the dismemberment of the Empire," are words, I think, stronger than any that the noble Marquess in his admirable speech uttered on his own behalf. I rejoice that at last we have had some members of the Home Rule Party open their lips in this House, and I quite agree with the noble Lord Privy Seal that the reply of my noble Friend Lord Spencer to the attack of the noble Marquess was singularly inconclusive and unsatisfactory.

BARRACKS BILL.—(No. 163.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BROWNLOW: My Lords, this Bill, to which I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to-night, is essentially a Financial Bill, and I would remind your Lordships that it has passed through the other House not only without Division but with extraordinarily little Debate. I beg to introduce this measure to the notice of the House—first, on the score of military efficiency; secondly, on the score of the health and comfort of the troops, and of those who are dependent on them—their wives and families; and, thirdly, on the score of economy.

Up to the present time there has not been put forward any great scheme of concentration or of accommodation for our troops. In times past it appears that barracks have been built from time to time in various parts of the country probably to meet the exigencies of the moment, and the result of this system, or what perhaps I may better call want of system, is that many of these barracks are placed in the centre of towns where there are no facilities for drill or for musketry practice; some of them are unhealthy or unsanitary and dilapidated, whilst others of them are too small to hold a regiment. For the first time a thorough scheme has been prepared by the Quartermaster General for the concentration and for the accommodation of the troops. When I use the word "concentration" I do not only mean the concentration of large bodies of men as in our large camps, but also the concentration of single regiments, and also of several batteries of Artillery. Therefore, when I say concentration of troops, I mean their concentration in barracks sufficiently large to hold one regiment. The Secretary of State has been advised that it is very desirable that the Royal Artillery should be concentrated in groups of not less than two or three batteries. Something has been done in the way of that concentration, and it is hoped that there will be besides Aldershot, provision for concentrations at Newcastle, Colchester, Sheffield, Hilsea, and the Curragh. With regard to Cavalry concentration, that will chiefly consist of the small concentrations that I spoke of before in barracks large enough to contain a whole regiment, where at present a regiment is scattered and divided. The chief concentration of Infantry should, it has been decided, be as it is now at Aldershot. The advantages of many places which have been mentioned have been discussed. Salisbury Plain has been mentioned and Cannock Chase, but on the whole it has been decided that Aldershot has the greatest advantages. In the first place, there is a large space of land there already in the possession of the Government, there is a good soil, and there are various appliances on the ground, and it is also within easy reach of the Metropolis. It has, therefore, been decided to add to the number of troops already encamped at Aldershot

one battery of Artillery and six battalions of Infantry. But to carry this into effect it will be absolutely necessary to re-construct the whole of the Camp at Aldershot. The state of the huts is notorious. The wooden huts there were run up shortly after the Crimean War, and many of them are now 35 years old; the roofs are flattening down; the walls are bulging; many of them have been propped up for some time; and keeping them in even their existing moderate state of repair costs the country as much as £7,000 a year. It will be necessary to remove those huts, and in their place to build huts or barracks of permanent materials. Two lines in the North Camp have been already reconstructed, and it remains to re-construct the remainder of the North Camp, enlarging also the hospital and building some married quarters. The South Camp will also have to be re-constructed; the permanent barracks will also have to be added to, and further hospital accommodation will have to be supplied also in the South Camp. Besides this, arrangements have been made with the Home Secretary to take over the male prison at Woking, which, with a very inconsiderable outlay, can be made available as a thoroughly good barrack for one Infantry battalion within easy access of Aldershot. What I have said with regard to the huts at Aldershot applies to the huts at the Curragh; some of them are good, some of them very bad; and a great deal of re-construction is necessary there also. At Colchester, too, a good deal will have to be done, and at Shorncliffe the same. At Belfast it will be necessary to build a new barrack for one Infantry battalion, and to make improvements in the present barracks. It will be necessary there also to build married quarters. There the married men are now entirely lodged out, there are no married quarters at all, and the expense of lodging them out is large, besides which it is bad, as one can easily imagine, for the discipline of the men. In London the only barracks that I need mention as requiring looking to are the Regent's Park Barracks. They are in a perfectly sanitary state as regards the men, but they are very bad barracks as regards the horses. They will require a small outlay to put them into thorough order, and besides that, married quarters will have to be built. The site has not yet been determined upon, but Millbank has been suggested. At Manchester we have barracks in the middle of the town, built up to the very walls, and partly commanded by the windows of the houses in the immediate vicinity. We propose to pull down those barracks and to build another set on some other site which may be convenient for Manchester. That site has not yet been decided upon. At Portsmouth, too, it is well-known that the barracks were unfit. They have been condemned for years, and there have been repeatedly Reports made upon them as being utterly unfit for the accommodation of troops. They are, in fact, now pulled down, and the state of things which has been disclosed has amply justified the Reports that were continually being sent in about them. Then abroad, in the Colonies, the barracks both in Bermuda and Gibraltar are reported as being in a bad state, and some money will have to be spent upon them to prevent the recurrence of enteric fever. At Cape Town, also, the barracks are reported to be in a bad state. For Malta there is a very large scheme proposed which I need not enter into now; but the garrison has been considerably increased there of late years, the troops are greatly crowded, and it will be absolutely necessary to considerably increase the barrack accommodation. My Lords, I have not attempted to go into details; I have merely gone generally through the list. There are, of course, other matters in the Bill, but it would only weary the House for me to speak of them. At the same time, I trust I have said enough to persuade the House that it is high time this very large and important question was taken up and thoroughly gone into. However, there are one or two small questions of detail which I should like to enter into before I sit down. It is only fair and just to Her Majesty's Government that the country at large should be thoroughly satisfied that this large sum of money which is proposed to be spent will be properly and rightly expended, so that the country will have its money's worth. The Secretary of State has called in to advise him several gentlemen who are complete outsiders, and in no way connected with the War Office; Mr. Creed, the surveyor to the Land Commissioners; Mr. Pilkington, a well-known architect, who has had enormous experience in the erection of industrial and workmen's dwellings, also Mr. Roger Field, who is well-known as a distinguished sanitary engineer. All those gentlemen have given him excellent advice. But the Secretary of State depends even more upon the resuscitation of the Army Sanitary Committee. That was a body which was first brought into existence by one who has left behind him a greater name than any other Secretary of State for War, I mean Lord Herbert of Lea. But that Committee has lain of late years entirely dormant, and the Secretary of State has determined to resuscitate it. The President of the Committee will be the Quartermaster General; and I think the name of Sir Redvers Buller is in itself a guarantee of energy and thoroughness. He will be assisted in his work by the Deputy Inspector of Barracks, Colonel Locoek; in the Army Medical Department by the Surgeon General and an experienced Army surgeon, and there will also be another member appointed by the India Office. The instructions of this Committee are very wide indeed. The Committee has to report upon all sites and upon all plans of buildings; it is also to visit the buildings while they are being erected; it has to consider the Sanitary Reports from all Home and Colonial Stations; it has to receive all the Sanitary Reports from India; and, in fact, the instructions given to them generally are of the widest possible nature. I may tell your Lordships that the gentlemen forming this Committee have accepted this responsibility with great cheerfulness and with perfect confidence, and it is hoped that their co-operation may be of the greatest possible value. One word I should like to add, and that is upon the subject of Soldiers' Institutes. It is proposed in building new barracks and re-organising old barracks to form where it is possible institutes instead of the ordinary canteens. In doing this we propose to follow the system which has been adopted with very great success by the Commander-in-Chief in India, Sir Frederick Roberts. His system has been to separate the liquor-bar, which answers to our canteen, from the coffee-shop, or refreshment, or supper room, which would answer to what we should call in England the grocery shop and coffee room, and to separate that again entirely from the recreation department. We propose in those respects to follow the lines which have been so successfully followed by Sir Frederick Roberts. But we have one little difficulty which I will mention. In India, Sir Frederick Roberts has gone upon the system of handing over the temperance room entirely to the Army Temperance Society. But in England there are a great many Temperance Societies, and it is impossible for the War Office to hand over these rooms to any Society which is not entirely undenominational and unsectarian; but we trust that the various Temperance Societies in England will combine to form one Army Temperance Society, as there is in India, to which we may be able to hand over these Institutions. As regards the married quarters, I am quite sure that your Lordships who have cottages of your own for the condition of which you care will be the first to admit that of late years there have been enormous strides made in the housing of the working classes; and I am quite sure you will agree with me that the wives of our soldiers should have at least those comforts which they would have had if they had married civilians in that class of life from which our Army is recruited. It is, I know, said that England is on a level with other nations in the matter of housing her troops. That may be so, or it may not; but from an excellent Report which we have lately received through the courtesy of the German Government I should venture to doubt it—at least as far as that particular nation is concerned. Even if other nations choose to house their troops badly, that is no reason why we should follow their example. Other nations have their Armies supplied by the conscription; we, on the other hand, depend for our Army upon the system of voluntary enlistment; and I am sure your Lordships will agree that the men who enlist into Her Majesty's Army and agree to serve the State should receive every consideration from the Government. My Lords, I ask you to give a Second Reading to this Bill, on the three-fold ground of military efficiency, the health and comfort of the troops, and economy.

Earl Brownlow

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Brownlow.)

LORD SANDHURST: The noble Earl has said that this is in its character a Financial Bill, and that is, no doubt, the fact; but the consequences of the Bill will be of enormous interest not only to our soldiers themselves, but to all those who take an interest in Army matters. I can assure the noble Earl I do not rise in any way for the purpose of impeding the passage of this Bill, because I think he and his friends have grappled with a very difficult subject in a very bold and comprehensive manner, and I therefore most cordially welcome the Bill. I may mention that I have had some experience of the huts to which my noble Friend has referred, for I was quartered once at Shorncliffe in the winter time, and that experience is that as far as my particular hut went every device had, it always seemed to me, been made use of which could ensure as great an access of wind through it as possible, and nothing of any kind was ever done to exclude it. Now, if that was the case in an officer's hut, I am quite sure it was the same, if not worse, in the men's huts. Though I cannot say it did us any bodily harm, it gave rise to inconvenience and discomfort, and I think if that was the case with the officers it must have been ten times more so in regard to the men. In Dublin there are two barracks in particular, the Royal and the Richmond, parts of which are in a very unhealthy state; but besides those barracks there are one or two others, and the one which most predominates in my mind is the Linen Hall Barracks. I was there in 1886, and I was told they were very healthy; but, at the same time, they were in such a state that it was a positive slur and disgrace to the Department that they should have housed soldiers in them. I hope that we shall now be able to do without those barracks, or at any rate, if it is necessary to have soldiers in that part of the town, that the buildings will be re-constructed. There is, perhaps, one point in this scheme put forward by my noble Friend upon which it is possible a difference of opinion might arise, and that is in regard to the massing of a very large number of troops at Aldershot out of the drill season. No one can exaggerate the importance of Aldershot as a place for exercising troops in the drill season. They have the great advantage there of obtaining some experience of camp life, and being exercised in the duties of camp life, both men and officers; and it also gives the senior grades of officers opportunities of commanding large bodies of men. But there is this point which suggests itself to my mind: whether, in massing a large number of troops at Aldershot, there may not be a redistribution made of such a nature as will cause the Regulars to lose touch in some degree with the Auxiliary Forces and thereby lessen the interest which is taken in the Army by the public, and thereby endanger the success of recruiting. With regard to the quarters for the married soldiers, I am extremely glad that has not been lost sight of. The life of a soldier who has to live out of barracks with his wife is one of great poverty; they have very likely to live amongst unpleasant surroundings, and in extremely unhealthy houses. It has always been one of the greatest surprises to me during my experience of soldiering how the men could have managed to turn out as smartly as they did. One point is that the number of married soldiers has decreased considerably ever since the introduction of the short service system, and it may be worth the while of the noble Earl and his friends to take into consideration whether the sum that is set apart for providing married quarters may not be excessive. Upon the point as to the massing of Artillery I do not offer any opinion, and I have only ventured to make these remarks upon the two points I have mentioned rather to guard myself, because I have no doubt the noble Earl is acting in complete harmony with the military advisers of the War Office, against whose opinion I should be sorry for a moment to put my own. I am extremely glad to hear of the resolution which has been come to on the part of the authorities as to the Soldiers' Institutes, for I think that establishing those Institutes will tend to encourage sobriety among the younger soldiers. The re-appointment of the Sanitary Committee, too, is a matter upon which I have to congratulate the noble Earl, and also his announcement that the opinion of outside architects is to be taken. I should like also to impress upon him that when the contracts are made for the erection of the buildings the Director of Contracts should be enabled to see that the very best skill and materials are employed in carrying out the very great undertaking which the Government will then have in hand. With those few remarks I cordially support the Second Reading of the Bill.

*EARL FORTESCUE: Having more than 30 years ago had the honour of carrying through the House of Commons Resolutions affirming the expediency on grounds of true economy, and with a view to the greater efficiency of the Army, not less than of justice and humanity, of improving the sanitary state of our soldiers' barracks, and making better provision for the decent accommodation of our troops, I rejoice to hear from my noble Friend the admirable scheme, as it seems to me to be, which the Government are intending to carry out for the purpose of improving the barracks still further, and on a comprehensive scale. A great deal was done in this matter many years ago under the auspices of the lamented Mr. Sydney Herbert, but a great deal remained to be done. I particularly rejoice that more attention is to be paid to the accommodation of the married soldiers. I remember, among the great number of barracks that I visited, being shocked at finding the soldiers' wives divided in their quarters from a long dormitory full of young men, in many instances by nothing more substantial than a flimsy curtain. Nothing could be more miserably crowded and unsuitable than the accommodation for married soldiers which I remember seeing not in one but in many barracks which I inspected years ago. I rejoice heartily that the huts are to be superseded. I remember describing them to my constituents at Marylebone as combining the opposite disadvantages of permanent barracks and a flying camp, having the makeshift and uncomfortable character of the one, with the immobility and to a considerable extent—I may now say indeed to at least the full extent—the expensiveness incident to permanent barracks. I feel sure, not only as regards the comfort of the soldiers, but as regards real economy, the Government are well-advised in very largely substituting for the huts permanent and well-planned barracks. Years ago, also, when I was at Malta and Gibraltar, I took occasion to visit all the barracks in those garrisons of ours, and I was satisfied there was plenty of room for very great improvement in them. I heartily congratulate my noble Friend on the gratifying statement he is charged to make, and on the clearness with which he has made that statement to the House.

*THE EARL OF DUNDONALD: I only want to offer a very few remarks upon the Bill which the noble Lord has so clearly explained. I think Her Majesty's Government are to be congratulated upon dealing with the barrack question in the thorough manner they are doing. An immense amount of ill-health is caused in our Army by men being quartered in barracks built long before the present era of sanitary reform. With regard to the strategical advantages of massing men in such camps as Aldershot, I do not propose to offer to your Lordships any remarks beyond saying that they must be evident to all who consider how advantageous it is to concentrate your men in central positions, whence they can easily be despatched by railway to any point at which their services may be required. With regard to the statement made by the noble Lord that Lord Herbert of Lea's Sanitary Commission will be re-appointed, I am glad that has been determined on, and I hope their hands will not be tied by any particular and possibly inadequate amount of money being allocated for any particular barracks. I wish that Sanitary Commission had been appointed earlier, because some of the barracks which have been recently erected certainly present defects. I would refer to the Knightsbridge Barracks. There the floors of the barrack-rooms are made of the ordinary deal planking. Being constructed in that way in the ordinary manner, dirt, little pieces of breadcrumbs, and scraps from the men's dinners fall through the interstices, and remain between the boards. The only way of cleaning barrack-rooms beyond brushing them out is to use water for the purpose of scrubbing them out, not as housemaids clean boards with a piece of flannel and a pail, but very often by throwing the water along them. This ought to be very carefully done, but they throw down half a pail of water and swab the room out, and the consequence is that the water percolates through and collects under the boards in places. Very often in the old barracks it brings down the ceilings of the rooms below, and then orders are sent that the rooms are not to be swabbed out any more. That has taken place at the Regent's Park Barracks, and I hope the Sanitary Commission which is to be appointed will insist on the floors of future barracks being made of parquet lined with asphaltum, or some impervious material, so that the rooms can be properly washed out with water without the water percolating down into the rooms below through the boards and ceilings, or remaining between the interstices of the boards. The matter of the married quarters is a most important one, more particularly as affecting the London garrison, for in London married men have to pay much larger rents for their rooms than the men pay in country districts. Soldiers are given permission to marry after a certain number of years' service, upon having obtained certain good conduct badges, and having a certain sum of money in the Savings' Bank. When they are so qualified they are allowed to marry. But there is not sufficient accommodation in the barracks for the families of those soldiers who are allowed to marry under those conditions. Therefore, they are granted by Government a "lodging allowance." The allowance granted to a well-conducted soldier in a London garrison amounts to 4d. a day. That 4d. a day, I may inform your Lordships, is utterly inadequate to supply a trooper or a man receiving 1s. 9d. a day with a proper lodging for his family; and I do not think it is possible for a man to provide himself with decent accommodation under 6s. or 7s. a week at the least. Therefore, I say if the Government enlist men for long service, and allow those men after they have qualified themselves by good conduct to marry, they should, having placed them on the marriage roll, give them a sufficient allowance to house their families without drawing on their scanty pay. I do not know whether this Bill includes provisions for new ranges for the troops, but I think that matter is of almost more importance than providing for re-construction of the barracks themselves, because with the new rifle it is absolutely necessary that new ranges should be provided throughout many districts in England, as the new weapon carries about twice as far as the old rifle which has been hitherto in use.

*EARL BROWNLOW: One or two questions have been put by the noble Lord opposite, Lord Sandhurst, which I will answer as shortly as possible. He has spoken of the condition of the Royal Barracks at Dublin, and your Lordships can easily imagine that the Royal Barracks there will require entire overhauling and re-construction, and particularly new draining. It is also proposed to build new barracks near the Phoenix Park at Gormans town, and I hope they will be completed towards the end of next year. One word as regards the married soldiers. My noble Friend has pointed out that now we have short service there is a much smaller number of married soldiers than formerly, and that is certainly the case. The whole question was gone into two years ago, and provision has been made in that respect. But the diminution in the number of married soldiers is not quite so great as one might suppose. I have ascertained some particulars as to what the numbers of married soldiers are, which, with your Lordships' permission, I will quote. In an ordinary battalion I find there are 2 Warrant Officers, 25 sergeants and Staff sergeants, and 22 rank and file. Of course, the Warrant Officers, and the sergeants, and Staff sergeants, are not short service men. Therefore, I think the difference is not so great as might at first sight be imagined. Then the noble Lord said he hoped the Committee would have a free hand. I can assure him that the Committee will have a very free hand, and I have no doubt they will not hesitate for a moment to place before the Secretary of State any matter which they think ought to be brought before him with regard to the materials or construction of the barracks.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION BILL).—(No. 110.)

Amendments reported (according to Order); further Amendments made; Bill to be read 3^a on Tuesday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 199.)

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1867, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 169.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—(No. 158.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): I do not propose to detain your Lordships at any length upon this Bill. It is a Bill containing a considerable number of clauses—52 I think—but they deal entirely with matters of detail. I will just state that the object of this Bill is to extend to Municipal, School Board, and County Council elections for Scotland the provisions in force with regard to Parliamentary elections, and also to bring the law of Scotland into harmony with the law of England in that respect. I think your Lordships will agree that it is very desirable that object should be carried out, and this Bill proposes simply to do what I have stated.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) RATING BILL.—(No. 183.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, the object of this Bill, which has passed the House of Commons, is to prevent the recurrence of some difficulties which arise in the collection of the Poor Rate in Ireland. The rate is made several times a year, and the person to pay it is the person in occupation at that time, and that person remains liable, although he may have ceased to have anything to do with the premises. That is productive sometimes of great hardship, and this Bill proposes to give Boards of Guardians power to determine in their discretion whether a person in those circumstances is or is not liable, and in that case the person who has subsequently become tenant is liable. That is the whole of the Bill, with the exception of a provision extending to Dublin.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT BILL.

(No. 180.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL.

(No. 98.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order; Further amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 200.)

EDUCATION CODE (1890) BILL.

(No. 157.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION BILL.

(No. 166.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a on Monday next.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE BILL.

A Bill for extending the right of voting at Parliamentary, Municipal, and County Council elections in the United Kingdom, to duly qualified women, was presented by the Lord Denman; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Tuesday next. (No. 201.)

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter past Eleven o'clock.

Lord Macnaghten

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 11th July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE AMERICAN TARIFF.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state what action the German Government proposes to take in response to the representations of German traders as to the effect of the new American tariff; and if, having regard to the certain injury the proposed prohibitory rates will inflict on this country, advantage can be taken of the present friendly relations to develop free trade between the United Kingdom and Germany, as also between the United Kingdom and the colonies, as a set off against the hostile tariffs of America?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): It is not likely that any such representation as that proposed would be attended with success.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if the attention of the Government has been called to the public declarations of Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State at Washington, to the effect that he is willing to propose to free American ports to nations of the American Continent, giving free trade to the products of the United States; and if, having regard to the free market accorded in the United Kingdom to competing American goods for the past 40 years, while the heavy duties imposed on British goods have nearly extinguished the National Debt of the United States, Her Majesty's Minister can be instructed to invite the American Government to refrain from pressing the prohibitory tariff proposals now before Congress, and to give Great Britain and Ireland fair commercial reciprocity?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: We have reason to believe that the German Government do not propose to take any action at present in the matter of the United States Tariff Bill. I do not clearly understand what species of arrangement my hon.

Friend proposes in the second paragraph, but, as far as I can see, it would be inconsistent with the fiscal system of this country.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government by any of the self-governing colonies as to the termination of the clauses in the commercial Treaties with Foreign Countries, expiring in 1892 upon 12 months' notice, which preclude the colonies from extending preferential fiscal treatment to the products of other portions of the British Empire; and whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake that the Governments of these colonies shall be formally consulted before such clauses are renewed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I am not aware of any such representation. It is the practice to consult the self-governing colonies before any commercial Treaty is made applicable to them.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there is at the Admiralty any letter or other document, signed by Admiral Colomb, reserving or claiming to reserve the right of supplying his night-signal apparatus to Her Majesty's Fleet; whether the Admiralty have taken the supply out of Admiral Colomb's hands and put it out to public contract; whether Admiral Colomb is now reaping any pecuniary benefit whatever from the use of his system of signals in Her Majesty's Fleet; and whether, in 1867, when the apparatus and system of flashing signals were adopted by the Admiralty, Lieutenant (now Admiral) Colomb's patent secured him any rights whatever against the Crown?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): There was no such formal reservation, but Admiral Colomb was the sole contractor with the Government for the supply of his patented signal lamps. He was not restricted from supplying his lamps to the public or foreign navies. The Admiralty propose for the future to place their orders for this apparatus by public contract. I am not aware that the gallant Admiral is deriving at present any direct pecuniary advantages from the use of his system of signals in the Navy. The patent taken out by Admiral Colomb secured him no rights against the Crown.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office, during the continuance of Admiral Colomb's patent for signal apparatus, took the supply out of his hands and put it out to public contract; and whether Admiral Colomb is now reaping any pecuniary benefit whatever from the use of his system of signals in the Army?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It is not admitted that more than a small portion of the apparatus used in Army signalling is attributable to Admiral Colomb's inventions, and it has been held that his rights over that portion have been fully purchased by the award of £500 which was made to him. Beyond that payment in the past I am not aware that Admiral Colomb is reaping any benefit on account of the system of Army signalling.

THE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is out of his power, in the case of a pauper lunatic, being also an Army pensioner, to hand over the whole of the man's pension to his wife, with the guardian's consent, or whether he is bound, by the "Superannuation Act, 1887," Section 7 (2), to make a deduction of 4s. a week; and whether, in this latter case, he proposes to take steps to alter the Law?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The action of the present law is as stated in the question. My attention was not specially directed at the time to the effect which the legislation of 1887 would have; and I will now take an early opportunity of consulting the Treasury whether any remedy can be applied.

TRADE MARKS.

MR. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that at the Greenwich Police Court on 28th June, when Messrs. Kearley and Tonge were convicted for selling tea with a false trade description, under the name of "Pure Ceylon Tea, Blackmoor Vale Estate. Imported by Kearley and Tonge," it was stated in evidence that although there was no such estate in Ceylon as the "Blackmoor Vale Estate," the Registrar of Trade Marks had allowed the name to be registered; and whether steps will be taken to remove the name from the register, and to prevent the registration in future of names calculated to mislead?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Messrs. Kearley and Tonge are the successors to a firm trading as Heseltine, Kearley and Tonge, who were registered prior to the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act, as owners of certain two marks which exhibit as "added matter" the words "Blackmore Vale Estate." Under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Acts, 1883-88, it did not devolve on the Comptroller to satisfy himself that the words claimed to be registered as "added matter" were a bona fide address. Since the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, came into operation, however, the Comptroller has, under the directions of the Board of Trade, made it a practice in cases of the kind to require an explanation of the appearance in connection with a trade mark of an address or name of a place other than that given as the address of the person claiming the registration of the mark, and an application for another tea-label bearing the same words "Blackmoor Vale Estate" has been withdrawn in consequence.

THE ROYAL PATRIOTIC SCHOOLS.

MR. O. V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that, on the occasion of the presentation of prizes at the Royal Patriotic Schools, Wandsworth Common, on Tuesday, newspaper reporters were refused admittance; and what objection there is to such a matter of public interest being reported in the newspapers?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There was no desire to exclude the Press, but admission was by ticket, and probably the representatives of the Press who were refused admission had omitted to ask for them. In future all reporters who wish to attend will be provided on application with the necessary orders for admission.

MARGARINE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case stated by the Magistrate at the Wandsworth Police Court, "Crane v. Lawrence," which was to the effect that margarine (which was not labelled) not exposed to the view of the purchaser was therefore not exposed for sale, and consequently it was not necessary that the same should be labelled as required by Section 6 of the Margarine Act, it is the intention of the Government to take steps to amend the Act, so that it shall express the meaning of the Legislature?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): In the case referred to the purchaser at a retail shop asked to be served with margarine, and he was served with the article in a paper wrapper upon which was printed the word "Margarine" in all respects as required by the Statute. At the time of the purchase the margarine was placed on the counter behind a screen similar to those used in butter shops for the purpose of the butter, &c., being prepared for sale. The margarine when behind this screen was not open to the view of any of the customers, and in the case which came before the High Court it was desired to obtain a conviction because the margarine when not in the view of customers had not attached to it a label marked "Margarine." The Magistrate held that no offence had been committed, as a label upon the margarine when it could not be seen would be useless. The Queen's Bench Division held that the Magistrate was right. Mr. Justice A. L. Smith said—

"If the margarine is put in the shop for sale, and put in a place where it is visible to customers, then it is exposed for sale within the meaning of the Act and must be labelled, but unless it is thus exposed to view the Act does not apply."

I see no reason for considering that this decision is not in accordance with what was the intention of the Legislature, or that it affords any ground for an amendment of the Act.

POLITICAL MOVEMENTS IN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that in May the Agent to the Governor General for Central India issued a circular, directing that—"No Maharajah, Raja, Nawab, or Thakore, within the jurisdiction of the Central Indian Political Agency shall subscribe to the 'Amrita Bazar Patrika,' without the permission of the Agent or Sub-agent;"

and that

"If any of their subjects holds communication with the 'Amrita Bazar Patrika,' or any other newspaper hostile to the Government, they should make inquiry as to the name, address, age, caste, &c., of the party through the police, and communicate the result to the Resident's office in the course of a month;"

and that

"On the least intimation of a public meeting or a political movement taking place in their States, the police should make inquiry into the matter;"

and that

"If anybody is suspected of being an Agent of the Congress, or a secret spy of a Bengalee newspaper, he should be turned out from the State within 24 hours, and the fact should be communicated to the Political Agent; no matter about their States to be communicated to any newspapers;"

and requesting the Native Chiefs not to help the Congress movement, on the ground that "The future results of the Congress will be prejudicial to the interests of the Country, as it is an enemy to the British Government;"

and whether such circular was issued by his direction; and, if not, whether he will cause inquiries to be made on the subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir; the Secretary of State has no information of any such circular as that referred to in the question of the hon. Gentleman. The question of the hon. Member will be sent to the Government of India.

INDIAN AND COLONIAL POSTAGE.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the reduction in the rates of Indian and Colonial postage, as stated in his Budget speech, will take effect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am informed that the majority of the Australian colonies have agreed to the reduction, while New Zealand and the Cape Colony have given their assent, subject to certain conditions. Some important points have been raised by the Indian Government which are still under consideration. It is impossible to say when the negotiations will be finally arranged and a date fixed when the reduction of the rate will take effect.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, having regard to the fact that his explanatory Memorandum on the Indian Budget was last year issued on the 15th of May, if he will state the cause of the delay this Session in the issue of such Memorandum; and when will it be circulated to Members?

SIR J. GORST: What the hon. Gentleman is pleased to call an "explanatory Memorandum" is a personal statement which I have been in the habit of circulating for the last year or two for the purpose of shortening my speech on the Indian Budget. It was issued early last year—on the 20th of May, I think—because an earlier discussion of the Budget was expected. It will be circulated this year a few days before the Committee on the Indian Budget is taken.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in regard to what he says I am pleased to call an "explanatory Memorandum," he did in print not so describe it himself last year?

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman must give notice of that question.

CULTIVATING RYOTS IN JUMMOO.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will state the number of cultivating ryots in Jummoo; and how many of them are, respectively, Moslems and Hindus?

*SIR J. GORST: I am extremely sorry that I cannot answer this question. The last Census was held in 1873, and record has been taken since.

MR. BRADLAUGH : Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that he has less information now than he had the other night, when he made a statement upon the subject?

[The question was not answered.]

ADMINISTRATION OF CIVIL JUSTICE IN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that the administration of Civil Justice in India costs Rs. 2,14,27,000, of which all but the small sum of Rs. 140,000 is obtained by taxation of the litigants, and that Bengal litigants are taxed Rs. 140,000 more than the total cost of Civil Justice in the province; (2) whether complaints have reached him that the litigants of Bengal who pay more than the whole cost, are unable to get their cases tried, and the zemindars, whom the Government sell up when they do not pay by sunset the appointed amount, cannot obtain the necessary facilities for the recovery of their rents, and that the munsiffs are terribly overworked, and try cases in ill-ventilated huts, and there is much sickness among them in consequence; and (3) whether the Secretary of State will lay upon the Table the correspondence on this subject since 1870 between the High Court of Calcutta and the Government of India upon the requirements of the Bengal Judicial Service, the Government of Bengal, and the Government of India, and the Government of India and the Secretary of State?

SIR J. GORST : My answer to the first paragraph of the question is that the administration of Civil Justice in India costs approximately Rs. 2,14,27,000 and is defrayed by fees paid by litigants. In Bengal, there is a surplus. In Madras the receipts and charges balance each other; and in the rest of India there is a loss. The total deficit exceeds 12½ lakhs. My answer to the second paragraph of the question is in the negative. In regard to the third paragraph, if the hon. Member will put himself in communication with me, the Secretary of State will consider whether any Papers can be usefully laid upon the Table.

MR. BRADLAUGH : Does the right hon. Gentleman really mean that complaints have not reached him, because it appears on page 93 of the Blue Book on the Indian Financial Statement issued by himself this year, in the last paragraph but one from the bottom of the page, that there is a reference to this matter in the precise words of the question?

SIR J. GORST : The question was whether complaints have reached the Under Secretary of State. No complaint has reached the Under Secretary of State.

MR. BRADLAUGH : Have any complaints reached the Government of India?

SIR J. GORST : I am afraid I cannot answer that question without notice.

MR. BRADLAUGH : Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that a complaint made to the Vice-Regal Council and presented and circulated in a Parliamentary Paper to this House is a matter upon which he has no information?

SIR J. GORST : The question of the hon. Member was whether certain complaints have reached me, and my answer is in the negative. I do not know what complaints may have reached the Vice-Regal Council. If the hon. Member will give notice he shall have a proper answer to the question.

MR. BRADLAUGH : I beg to give notice that I will take the opportunity of raising the question fully on the Indian Budget.

MARITIME CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON.

SIR GEORGE BADEN - POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have yet received the full documents relating to the recent International Maritime Conference at Washington, and when the final Papers on the subject will be presented to the House?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : The Reports and Documents have been received and are being printed.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

SIR JOHN PULESTON (Devonport) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state when any reply may be expected to the Petition of the officers of the Inland Revenue, forwarded early this year to the Commissioners, for transmission to the Treasury?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Commissioners are at present engaged in an examination of the question.

THE SCOTCH FISHERY BOARD.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is true that the Fishery Board for Scotland has given notice of dismissal to their recently appointed naturalist, Dr. John Beard; and, if so, whether the rumoured reason of economy is the only one?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am informed that Mr. Beard has received three months' notice from 1st June, in terms of his agreement, so that the Board may, if the state of their finances render it expedient, be in a position to terminate his engagement. There is, as I understand, no other reason for the notice being given.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a great want of harmony exists between the Fishery Board and their officers?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No, I am not aware.

SIR JOHN WILLOUGHBY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Captain Sir John Willoughby, Royal Horse Guards, has been seconded for extra regimental duty; whether this duty is connected with the operations of a Chartered Company in Africa; if not, what is the nature of the duty; whether, during the period that he is seconded, he receives pay as an officer of the Army, and the time will count towards his pension, and under what Royal Warrant he has been seconded?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Captain Sir John Willoughby has been allowed to accept the position of a Staff Officer in the service of the British South African Company. While thus employed he will not receive any pay from the Army Funds; and if he retires on a pension, a reduction will be made in respect of such extra Regimental Service.

THE GUARDS.

MR. E. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if, in the case of the Guards in London requiring re-inforcing in the future, he will consider the advisability of ordering up a battalion from Windsor or the Tower, or some station near at hand, and thus avoid expense to the public?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The movement of troops is necessarily dependent upon the requirements of the War Office.

LIGHT SIGNALLING.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there is any objection to laying upon the Table of the House copies of the Correspondence between the inventor of the occulting system of light signalling, Mr. Charles Babbage, and the Admiralty, also that of Major General Babbage and the Admiralty?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave in the House last night in reply to the hon. Member for the Stroud Division of Gloucestershire. The sum proposed to be paid to Admiral Colomb is not a reward for the invention of flashing signals, but in further recognition of the services of the gallant Admiral in the introduction and application of a system of flashing signals for naval purposes. I do not think, therefore, that there would be any advantage in the publication of the correspondence referred to.

SAVINGS BANK CLERKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether 70 established clerks in the Savings Bank Department sent him, on the 5th of June last, a Memorial objecting to their being placed in the Second (or Lower) Division of the Civil Service; whether, no reply having been sent them, they forwarded another Memorial on the 3rd of July, to which no reply has been received; whether, notwithstanding these protests, he has presented the names of these officers to the Civil Service Commissioners for appointment to the Second Division; and when they may expect a reply to their Memorial?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The facts stated by the hon. Member are substantially correct. The clerks to whom he refers were appointed to the "second," not the "lower" division—no "lower" division exists—on April 16 last, and the arrangement is one which, in my opinion, is beneficial to their interests. It would not, in my judgment, be compatible with the public interest to take these officers out of the Second Division, and, after this answer to the hon. Member's question, I hope that no further reply to the Memorials will be necessary.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it not a most unusual thing for the head of a Department not to send a reply to a Memorial couched, so far as appears, in proper terms?

*MR. RAIKES: The matter has been explained more than once.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it the usual course?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not think it is unusual.

SCOTCH FISHERY HARBOURS.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the admitted necessity for improved Fishery Harbours on the coast of Scotland, the Government will consider the advisability of devoting part of Scotland's share of the taxation specified in the Local Taxation Bill to the construction of such harbours?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The suggestion of the hon. Member will be considered by Her Majesty's Government, together with very many other suggestions on the same subject.

THE ACT OF UNION.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will explain under what authority "Great Britain" only is now constantly employed in official documents, as in Articles I., II., and XI. of the Agreement with Germany regarding Africa and Heligoland, and in Consular Reports, although it was agreed under the Act of Union that the Power theretofore known as "Great Britain" should in future be known as the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland"; whether he is aware that the use of "Great Britain" in the double sense of "Great Britain" and of the "United Kingdom" is often misleading in matters of trade and statistics; and whether there would be any objection to issuing orders to persons negotiating on behalf of Her Majesty, and to persons representing Her Majesty abroad, properly to designate in their official communications the Kingdom over every portion of which Her Majesty's reigns?

Mr. Raikes

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Before my right hon. Friend answers this question I should like to ask him whether, having regard to the fact that the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland represents only one seventy-fourth part of the area of the Queen's Dominions, and contains less than one-eighth of Her Majesty's subjects, the style of the British Empire would not be more correct in Treaties and communications with Foreign Powers, than either Great Britain or the United Kingdom?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have always been of opinion that the United Kingdom implies the dependencies of the United Kingdom not properly dependencies, but subject to the Queen, wherever they may be found. If by any chance in any public document the United Kingdom is not specified, the phrase Great Britain used as a short title is by no means held to imply that Her Majesty's Government, or those who are acting on their behalf, are unconscious of the claim of Ireland to be included in her proper place in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

*MR. WEBB: Is it not a fact that the practice tends to lower the prestige of Ireland abroad?

[No answer was given.]

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that it is now acknowledged that the consent of France is necessary before effect can be given to the protectorate of Great Britain over Zanzibar, and that negotiations are now pending between Great Britain and France on this point, Her Majesty's Government will postpone further proceedings as to the Anglo-German Agreement Bill until the negotiations with France are concluded, and the terms on which France will assent to the protectorate are made known?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question of the hon. Member refers to matters on which communications are going on between Her Majesty's Government and the French Government, and I am, therefore, unable to say anything concerning them. But I am not able to give the undertaking suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

IRELAND—CORONERS' SALARIES.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the decision of the Judges in a case reserved by Mr. Justice Andrews at the Spring Assizes of 1889, for the County of Down, whereby they decided that the annual salary payable to every Coroner ought to be calculated anew in each year, according to the average amount of fees upon the inquests held by him, or his predecessor in office, during the five years then last past; whether he is aware that it was contended on behalf of the Coroners of Down, that the third section of "The Coroners' (Ireland) Act, 1881," which substituted an annual salary in lieu of the fees formerly paid to Coroners, provided, or was intended to provide, that the annual salary was then to be fixed once for all, on the calculation to be first made after the passing and pursuant to the third section of said Act, and an annual salary, so calculated, was paid to Coroners in Ireland from the passing of the Act up to the time of this decision; and whether, considering that this section of the Act was intended to prevent unnecessary inquests, and that it so operated before the decision of the Judges was given, and considering also that, by this decision, Coroners in Ireland have now a pecuniary interest in holding the greatest number of inquests in every year, he will make inquiry into the matter with the view to have their salaries fixed once for all, as was intended during the passing of the Act?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have considered the papers which the hon. Member has been good enough to send me bearing upon this question. I am disposed to agree with him that the construction which the Judges were compelled to put on the language of the Coroners Act, 1881, is probably at variance with the framers of that Act. I cannot promise to deal with the matter during the present Session, but I hope to consider it during the recess, which is now rapidly approaching.

SHADOWING.

MR. BYRNE (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Leinster Leader, of the 5th July instant, which states—

"That Mr. P. J. Healy, Baltinglass, still continues to be the subject of more persistent police surveillance. At Tinahely Fair, on Wednesday, the police were on his track wherever he went through the town in the transaction of his private business. Not only did they follow his every movement in the public streets, but when Mr. Healy had occasion to enter private houses to make visits to friends in the town, the police forced an entrance after him and refused to leave while Mr. Healy remained in the house;"

whether he is aware that this Mr. Healy was acquitted by two Resident Magistrates of any criminal act; whether he will cause the police not to interfere with this man in future; and whether he will consider the advisability of putting a stop to following persons into private houses?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that, at the fair held at Tinahely on 25th June, the movements of Patrick Healy were watched, there being reason to believe that he is engaged in conjunction with the local branch of the National League, in endeavouring to promote the boycotting of a man who took the farm from which Healy had been evicted. But that it is not the case that the police followed him into any private house, the only places they entered after him being licensed premises. It is the case that Healy was subsequently charged at Petty Sessions with having committed intimidation on the 21st May, and that the Magistrates dismissed the case. In doing so, however, they stated that the case was a very suspicious one, but that they had given the defendant the benefit of the doubt.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the reports in the Cork papers, from which it appears that two brothers, Edmond and David Kent, were at Fermoy fair on 6th instant, engaged in selling some lambs, when a constable came and "shadowed" David Kent for a considerable time; that this man, David Kent, then went and stood beside District Inspector Ball, and followed the Inspector about the fair, he himself being followed meanwhile by the constable; that District Inspector Ball spoke to Mr. Kent, and said, "If you persist in following me I will have you arrested;" and that Kent replied that he had been prevented from doing his business by the constable shadowing him, and that if the Inspector withdrew the constable he would not follow the Inspector; if it is true, as reported, that the Inspector thereupon ordered the shadowing constable to arrest Mr. Kent, who was kept in custody from 9 a.m. until 3.30, and then summoned under the Crimes Act; and whether he can state under what authority was Mr. Kent arrested, and why was he shadowed in the manner described?

*MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question. The matter is sub judice, and, therefore, I am unable to make a statement.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that James Fenlon, a National school teacher of Carlow Graigne, attended a meeting at Carlow Graigne on 1st June of this year, the meeting in question being held with the object of establishing a memorial to the rebels who fell in 1798, and that James Fenlon was member of the committee of said memorial; and whether attending such meeting, and being on said committee, incapacitates him from retaining his position as a National school teacher?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question, and that the matter is under the consideration of the Commissioners.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Have not the Irish people as much right to remember '98 as Englishmen have to remember the 5th of November?

[No answer was given.]

Mr. Flynn

MOONLIGHTING.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report in the Evening Standard of the 7th instant, that on the previous day, while the people were attending mass at Scartaglin, a party of moonlighters visited the house of a farmer, named Patrick Nolan, of Knockour, and severely beat a little girl, who was the only person in the house at the time; and whether any of the persons engaged in this alleged outrage on this little girl have been arrested?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that three men armed, and one of them partly disguised, came to Nolan's house on Sunday during Mass. The man's daughter was not beaten. She ran out of the house when she saw the armed party approaching. They fired shots into the house, breaking a clock and other articles. The motive is believed to have been to compel Nolan to leave the service of a person by whom he has been employed. No arrests have been made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Would the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to use his influence to get the newspaper that supports him—the Standard—to withdraw the blackguard attacks it has made on Members of this House?

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Is it not the fact that there was nothing but the statement of the child to warrant the story?

[No answer was given.]

POLICE PROTECTION TO LANDLORDS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is the practice of the Irish Government to give police protection to landlords who, instead of resorting to the ordinary legal processes, attempt to collect their rents by making distresses with their own bailiffs?

*MR. MADDEN: It is not the practice to give police protection in the circumstances mentioned in the question. Several applications for such protection have been refused.

MR. M. HEALY : If a landlord levies a distress on a tenant, and intimates to the Executive that he wants police protection, is such protection given?

*MR. MADDEN : No, Sir.

MR. M. HEALY : Is it not the fact that whenever a landlord makes a distress there is a policeman on the spot to see it carried out?

*MR. MADDEN : No, Sir.

CORK LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. MAURICE HEALY : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can now state what decision the Irish Government have come to with regard to the recent Report of their Inspectors, as to the overcrowding of the Cork Lunatic Asylum, and the necessity for additional accommodation for the inmates?

*MR. MADDEN : The Report of the Inspectors is receiving the careful consideration of the Board of Governors of the Asylum. The Report itself shows that at the date of the Inspectors' visit the contractor was at work on the foundation of an additional block of buildings. The Governors have directed the architect to furnish plans for the erection of additional baths, as recommended, and they have also referred to their architect the question of enlarging the laundry.

CHARGE AGAINST AN IRISH POLICE CONSTABLE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.) : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether a member of the Dublin Metropolitan Police Force, No. 39, F Division, named Richard Hewett, and at present stationed at Kingstown, is the same man who was arraigned before the Magistrates at Newbridge, County Kildare, in criminal charges on two occasions, namely, on the 6th December, 1888, and in July, 1889, and who was convicted and fined on each occasion; and, if so, whether Richard Hewett will be retained any longer in the Dublin Police Force?

*MR. MADDEN : The Commissioner of Police reports that this constable, before appointment to the Force, appears to have been fined for an assault which, he stated, was committed in his own defence. With a knowledge of the whole circumstances of his case, he was highly recommended for appointment to the Dublin Police by two local Justices of the Peace, by two clergymen, and by the local Constabulary Authorities. He also receives a good character from the officer under whom he is serving. It is, therefore, the intention of the Commissioner to retain him as a member of the Dublin Police.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in July last this man Hewett was charged with presenting a revolver at a man on a road near Kildare, and threatening to put the contents of six chambers into him? Is it also the fact that Hewett appeared to have been in a state of delirium tremens at the time?

*MR. MADDEN : I believe that the hon. Gentleman has been misinformed as to the facts of the case.

RAILWAY FROM STRANORLAR TO GLENTIES.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the resolution passed by the Board of Directors of the Finn Valley Railway Company, that they are prepared to work the extension railway from Stranorlar to Glenties at cost price, and, in view of his statement that the Government attach great importance to satisfactory arrangements for working being made, if possible, with existing railway companies, now that this company have proposed satisfactory arrangements for working this extension, the Government are now prepared to forward the Stranorlar and Glenties scheme?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The proposals are receiving consideration; but I am unable to say at present whether the arrangements will be found to be satisfactory or not.

MR. DALTON : Is not the company who have undertaken to make the extension exactly the same company who have undertaken to work the Killybegs extension?

*MR. JACKSON : No doubt it is the company that works the West Donegal line; but I think the hon. Member will see that the arrangements for working the line may be very different.

BUNINNADDEN BOYS' NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. LEAMY (Sligo, South): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland why it is that, since the 30th of June, 1888, the teacher of the Buninnadden Boys' National School has been denied the assistance of a monitor, although the average attendance during the year, which commenced on that day, was sufficient to entitle the teacher to that assistance; whether the average attendance at present is sufficient; whether the Commissioners have been frequently asked by the Very Rev. Canon MacDermot to appoint as monitor a boy who passed in the 1st stage of the 6th class at the last results examination; and will the appointment be now made?

*MR. MADDEN: The Commissioners of National Education report that the school is not one in which the Inspector would be justified in recommending the appointment of a monitor, as the teacher, who had to be censured upon the result of the two last annual examinations of the school for its very inferior condition, could not be considered qualified to instruct and train monitors. The average attendance is now sufficient, but this is one only of the conditions under which a monitor may be appointed. The Very Rev. Canon MacDermot has never asked the Commissioners to make the appointment, but the Very Rev. Canon Stenson, manager of the school, wrote a letter on the 6th instant to the Commissioners applying for the appointment. The candidate monitor, John Henry MacDermot, however, even if the teacher were thoroughly efficient, could not be appointed, for at the examinations he failed in spelling, in grammar, and in geography, and the ordinary scholar's course.

CAVAN, LEITRIM, AND ROSCOMMON LIGHT RAILWAY.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed by a body entitled the "Belturbet Railway Tax Committee," and supported by the Grand Jury of the County Cavan, calling upon the Government to relieve the severe pressure upon the cess payers on account of the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Light Railway by a further Treasury guarantee of three per cent. instead of two per cent., combined with a reduction of the interest guaranteed from five per cent. to three per cent.; whether he is aware that a strike against the extra cess has been contemplated in the district; whether he is aware that in parts of Leitrim the extra county cess on account of this railway amounts to 1s. 10d. in the £1; and whether, considering the burden on the people, Her Majesty's Government will propose any measure to meet the difficulty, or will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee, consisting of the Members from the district and the Member for North Armagh, with power to draw up a scheme, to be embodied in a Bill, dealing with the question?

*MR. JACKSON: I have not seen the resolution referred to, nor have I heard that a strike against extra cess is contemplated in the district. The burden is one which was voluntarily assumed by the district four or five years ago, with the object of obtaining railway communication.

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the Report of the proceedings of the Rathmore (County Kerry) Petty Sessions, on the 14th June and subsequent days, from which it appears that a number of men were charged with having assaulted the police, that two of the police assaulted (Constables O'Connor and Lett), who were at the time carrying rifles, admitted that they had been drinking previous to the occurrence, and that the two policemen, Burns and Cullinane, concerned in the case of the disturbance at Timoleague, County Cork, on the 3rd September last, in which Daniel Donoghoe lost his life by a revolver shot fired by Constable Cullinane, also admitted that they had been drinking previous to the occurrence; whether his attention has been called to the increasing frequency of cases of this kind, pointing to the spread of drinking habits among the Irish police; and whether any of the constables referred to were on duty on the occasions in question?

*MR. MADDEN: As regards the case referred to in the first paragraph, all the charges against the police were dismissed at Petty Sessions on the 7th inst., and the charges made by them against the defendants were sustained, and all the accused, with the exception of one, who was fined, were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, against which they have lodged appeals. The case against the two constables on disciplinary grounds will be inquired into by the Constabulary Authorities, as soon as it can be done without prejudice to the appeals pending. With respect to the case referred to in the second paragraph, although Constables Burns and Cullinane admitted that they had taken drink on the evening of the occurrence at Timoleague, it was proved that they were sober, both before going on duty at the time of the riot and after their return from that duty, and the Judge expressed a strong opinion in favour of the police. As already stated, the Inspector General reports that there is no ground for the suggestion that there has been a spread of drinking habits among the police. The four constables were on duty on the occasions in question.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the report that two constables were stoned on the evening of 6th July at Tipperary, whilst engaged in ordinary police duty; and whether any arrests have been made in connection with this case?

*MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that while two constables were engaged in arresting a man at Tipperary on the charge of being drunk and disorderly they were set upon by a crowd of some 200 persons, who struck the constables with stones, and kicked them, inflicting injuries of such a nature as to necessitate the removal of one of the constables to hospital on the following day, and to render the other unfit for duty for the present. One arrest has been made, and others are expected to follow.

ATHLONE UNION WORKHOUSE.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland on what grounds the Local Government Board refuse to sanction the appointment of Mr. Peter Keogh, as master of the Athlone Union Workhouse; what are the nature of the convictions alleged against Mr. Keogh; and, previous to their appointment to the position now held by the Magistrates, what was the judicial experience of those who acted as Magistrates on the occasion?

*MR. MADDEN: The Local Government Board have refused to sanction the appointment of Mr. Peter Keogh as master of the Workhouse of Athlone Union on the grounds (1) that he has had no experience whatever of the duties of the office, and (2) that he was convicted and fined for an assault in September, 1886, and was also sentenced to imprisonment for two months with hard labour in August, 1887, for taking part in a riotous and unlawful assembly. In the latter case, the decision of the Magistrates was affirmed on appeal by the County Court Judge. For the reasons mentioned above the Local Government Board do not consider Mr. Keogh a suitable person to fill the office of Workhouse master. The Resident Magistrates before whom the charges in question were heard were all Magistrates of experience, and two of long service.

TELEGRAPH STATION AT EYRIES.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial from the inhabitants of Eyries, County Cork, praying for the establishment of a Telegraph Station and Savings Bank at the village of Eyries; whether said Memorial has also been signed by 200 fishermen from Alklow and the Isle of Man; and whether, in view of the facts that Eyries has become a very important fishing and curing district, containing seven curing stations, the harbour of Ballycorane, which is convenient to Eyries, is frequented by a large fleet of foreign fishing vessels, and that the harbour referred to and the fishing stations are eight miles from telegraphic communication, he will take steps to establish a Telegraph Station and Savings Bank in the interests of the fishing industry of the district?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): The Memorial to which the hon. Member refers has not yet reached my hands, but I understand that it has been received at the Post Office in Dublin, and that careful inquiries are being made with a view to a Report being submitted to me on the subject.

CASTLEISLAND.

MR. GILHOOLY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the coastguards at Schull, County Cork, are compelled to give boat attendance to emergency men and policemen who reside at Castleisland; and whether it is considered part of their duties to do so; and, if not, will the boat attendance referred to be discontinued?

LORD G. HAMILTON: When no country boat is available and the immediate duties of the coastguard admit of it, on the requisition of the police for conveyance to any of the islands, it is the duty of the coastguard to give such assistance, and it has been given at Castleisland, but will not be given if country boats are available.

MR. GILHOOLY: I had intended to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether any moneys are due to the Board of Public Works, Ireland, on the farms from which Messrs. James Leahy, Jeremiah Nugent, and Michael Donovan have been evicted at Castleisland, County Cork, and of which Mr. Thomas Henry Marmion is now in occupation; if moneys are due on them what are the amounts; and what steps have been taken, if any, to recover them; but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question until Monday.

MR. HUME DICK.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can give the grounds on which Mr. Hume Dick has been given a seat on the Irish Privy Council?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the name was submitted to Her Majesty by the Lord Lieutenant, the Lord Lieutenant being of opinion that the gentleman is well qualified to be appointed.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY IN IRELAND.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been called to the resolution passed recently by the Cork Chamber of Shipping and Commerce, asking that the jurisdiction of the Local Court of Bankruptcy should be extended to the Counties of Cork and Waterford; whether the staff necessary for the Court as at present constituted would be quite adequate for the additional work thus provided, so that no additional expense would be involved; whether the Local Court is at present worked at a loss to the Treasury, but would pay its way if the two additional counties were added; and whether, in view of the close commercial relations which exist between the Counties of Kerry and Waterford and the City of Cork, and the great resulting advantage to the commercial community of the district, as shown by the excellent manner in which the Court has worked within its present limited jurisdiction, the Lord Chancellor will now, by Order in Council, bring the counties mentioned within the jurisdiction of the Court?

Sir H. Maxwell

*MR. MADDEN: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland informs me that his attention has been called to the resolution referred to in the question, and that the subject of the development of the local jurisdiction conferred by the Act of 1888 on this Court is engaging his careful consideration. He is, however, of opinion that it would not be wise to take the step suggested in the question until we have had further experience of the working of the Courts constituted by that Act.

THE QUIN BEQUEST.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY (Newry): I beg to ask the Attorney General what has been done in the case of the "Quin Bequest" to Newry?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am informed that the Chief Clerk's certificate containing the scheme for the Quin Charity will be completed in a few days, and that before the Long Vacation an order will be obtained directing funds to the value of £120,000 to be transferred to the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests for Ireland. The carrying out of the scheme will commence as soon as the £120,000 has been transferred.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the unfortunate state of affairs existing in the Post Office, he will not appoint a Committee, departmental or otherwise, to inquire into the grievances of the men?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Although the condition of affairs is unfortunate, and although the Government very deeply regret that a number of most valuable public servants should have placed themselves in a wrong position, they think it would not be for the public interest that the responsibility of the head of the Office should be interfered with under circumstances of this character by the appointment of a Committee.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): Might not this matter be referred to the Royal Commission on the Civil Service?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Commission is not now sitting, and it was not constituted with a view to dealing with questions of a character such as this. I trust the House will maintain the responsibility of the heads of Public Departments and call them to account if, in their judgment, they think they have done wrong.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I wish to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a letter from Mr. George Shipton in respect to the dispute now going on in the Post Office; whether his answer, as published in the Daily News, is correct; and whether, in view of the disorganisation of the Service, to the great inconvenience of the public, he will consent to receive from any other quarter representations of the real grievances of which the men complain?

*MR. RAIKES: I have not seen the Daily News, but I perceive that the answer to Mr. Shipton is correctly given in several of to-day's newspapers. I have nothing to add to the statements therein made.

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, although he has nothing to add to his letter, he will be willing to accept the intervention of a Member or Members of this House who might be authorised by the postmen to introduce a deputation to him personally, in order that he may personally receive the views of the men?

*MR. RAIKES: I have had the pleasure of receiving a deputation of postmen to-day, who, I think, are much better judges of their own affairs than the hon. Gentleman opposite.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the letter received by him from Mr. Shipton was not a letter authorised by the Representatives of the Post Office?

*MR. RAIKES: I have no knowledge about that. I received a letter from Mr. George Shipton, who, I understood, represented a body called the London Trades Council.

MR. CONYBEARE: In consequence of the unsatisfactory character of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, I beg to give notice that I shall ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House. ["Oh!"]

Subsequently,

MR. CONYBEARE said: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what was the result of the deputation of postmen?

*MR. RAIKES: I was waited on by a deputation of some of the postmen of the East Central district. They put before me various points, which I promised to consider after carefully listening to them, and I explained to them various matters as to which, up to the present time, I think they have been imperfectly informed. I think the interview is likely to lead to very good results, but in the circumstances of the case I do not think I should be justified in laying details of the conversation before the House on the present occasion.

MR. CONYBEARE: In view of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, Sir, which is of a very much more satisfactory nature than his previous one, I do not feel I should be justified in trespassing upon the time of the House with a Motion for the Adjournment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

In reply to Mr. SEXTON, Mr. HEALY, and Mr. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne),

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: I think it would be for the convenience of the House that we should proceed on Monday and Tuesday next with the Irish Votes in Supply. I propose to make a Motion on the subject of Wednesday sittings next week. I hope it will be possible to take the Report of the Constabulary Vote on Monday. If not, notice will be given.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange that the Report of Supply to which he has alluded will be taken at a convenient hour?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I will consider the question with a view to meeting it.

REVENUE, 1889-90.

Return ordered—

"Of all Taxes and Imposts from which the Imperial Revenue of the United Kingdom was raised, together with the gross Revenue, in the year ended the 31st day of March, 1890, with the cost and charge of collecting the same under each head, these charges being deducted and leaving the net amount of Revenue."

"And of the aggregate Revenue collected in each of the previous ten years (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 289, of Session 1889)."—(Mr. Jackson.)

CLASS II.

1. £26,394, to complete the sum for the Chief Secretary for Ireland—Offices.

(4.32.) Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): When I was interrupted last night I was pointing out the grave cause of complaint that we Irish Members have against the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary on account of the tone of his answers. I said that the acts of violence committed by the police in Ireland were in large measure due to the tone and temper exhibited by the Chief Secretary in this House. The complaints of the sufferers from police brutality at Cashel and Tipperary have been brushed aside by the right hon. Gentleman as contemptible, on the ground that no cases were treated in hospital. I proved that at least 30 or 40 men were struck down, and numbers of men came up to me who had had their heads broken open by police batons, and who had blood streaming down their faces. The right hon. Gentleman said they were trifling cases. What I complain of is that deliberately in this House, in words that have been read by every policeman in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the knocking down of peaceable citizens by blows on the head which caused blood to flow freely as trifling matters. I do not wonder that the Irish policemen draw their batons, and use them continually without the slightest compunction, when the right hon. Gentleman talks in that way. I put three plain and specific questions to the right hon. Gentleman as to the legality of the proceedings of the police on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman did not answer me on any one of those questions, and his only reply to me was a statement that every charge of the police in Tipperary on that day was provoked by some outrage of the character of stone-throwing. I proved clearly that in numberless cases there was nothing of the kind and no resistance to the police, but the right hon. Gentleman abstained from giving any expression of opinion which would have acted as a check on the police in future. On the contrary, he stated that the police were justified in everything they did. It is a remarkable and interesting fact that no prosecutions have been undertaken by the Government in consequence of the Cashel and Tipperary meetings. I believe the reason is that the right hon. Gentleman is afraid of the evidence that would have been given at the trials. A Debate in this House is bad enough, and he does not want to have sworn testimony as to the conduct of the police on those occasions. I think it constitutes a serious and great grievance against the right hon. Gentleman that during the three and a half years he has been responsible for the Government of Ireland, while he has always been ready to shed crocodile tears over the sufferings of land-grabbers who, it is alleged, are boycotted, he never has expressed any sympathy for the people whom the police dragoon and injure. Another charge which I have to bring against the Irish Executive is that they are in the habit of deceiving this House by means of cooked and unreliable statistics. The officials in Ireland, knowing what the right hon. Gentleman wants at any given time, supply statistics to order. I believe the statistics as to boycotted evicted farms are utterly unreliable and false. I do not charge the right hon. Gentleman personally with this, but I do charge his officials with it. No doubt since the year in which the Coercion Act was passed, there has been a diminution in the number of boycotted farms, but that is due to the fact of our having replanted dispossessed owners in their old farms. That operation has been going on all over Ireland. I was amused by reading the other day a letter from a League Secretary in the County of Louth with regard to the decrease in boycotting. He said—seeing that last week we had bonfires on all the surrounding hills to celebrate the re-instatement of the last evicted tenant in the last boycotted farm in our parish? What can we do, as we have no farm to boycott?"

This enthusiastic Secretary thought it was a matter of reproach to his parish that they had no boycotted farm in it. Well, then we are furnished with a list of boycotted individuals in Ireland, which swells or dwindles in accordance with the desire of the right hon. Gentleman. We have, on more than one occasion, pressed the Chief Secretary to give us the only means by which the statistics can be tested, namely, the names and particulars of each case. What was the answer? He would not give us the names of the persons because they might become known in the district, and be subjected to annoyance. Of all the grotesque arguments ever brought forward in the House that is the most grotesque. The boycotted farms and persons must be known in the different districts already. The fact is, there is a monstrous system of falsification and dishonesty practised in the preparation of these statistics. I have here a judgment of Mr. Justice Monroe, which affords an illustration of the extraordinary system which prevails in some parts. The judgment has reference to King's estate, in County Leitrim. The people of the district were very poor, and, on their own responsibility, resisted the payment of rent. The agent of the estate had under him a gentleman named Cooke. In the judgment it was shown that Cooke put in a claim for £76 4s., £44 10s. of which was charged for the use of two horses and carts in carrying provisions and coal to the men in the protection huts. Mr. Cooke alleged that the men in his employ were boycotted, and could not buy any provisions, and he was, therefore, obliged to take them provisions twice a week a distance of 16 miles. Two of the labourers alleged to be boycotted came up and swore that they could buy provisions, and that Cooke never brought them any at all. These labourers have been returned, I have no doubt, as boycotted individuals, but when the case came before the Court in Dublin it was found the whole thing was a monstrous and gigantic fraud, the sub-agent of the estate plundering his principal on the plea of having his men boycotted. That is a sample of what is going on. There are other cases in which men make a good income out of the hiring of their own cars to take their own police escort with them. Such a system is a disgrace to the Chief Secretary. We have no means of knowing to what extent the fraud has been practised. So long as the right hon. Gentleman pursues this system of secrecy in connection with alleged statistics this country and the House have every right to complain. I may be told that we Irish Members are very persistent in our questions. It has been constantly charged against us as a grievance that we ask so many questions, and that we pursue the Irish Minister so keenly. It must be recollected that we who represent four-fifths of the people of our country have no influence, direct or indirect, on the Executive Government of our country. To be a Nationalist means that a man is absolutely denied all influence on the Executive Government. It is only natural that an amount of friction should arise unknown to a nation like this. What is the philosophy and reason of the questions asked? Questions are the natural channel by which friction, which will arise in the freest nations, between the Executive and the people, is removed. In this country all minor cases of friction are adjusted peaceably in conversation between the Representatives of the constituents and the Ministers of the various Departments. We in Ireland have but one Minister, and that Minister represents but one-fifth of the people, and that one-fifth composed of an unpopular class. It is only natural, it is inevitable, that as long as you allow the Irish Members to appear in this House at all there should be evidence of friction, which is furnished by the number of questions we ask. Anyone who has considered the question in a broad and philosophic spirit will admit that one of the chief, if not the chief, functions of Members of this House is to act as links of connection between the Government and the people of the country. Now, after four years experience of the present system of administration, it is well we should take a survey of the general policy of the Government. The Chief Secretary boasted in the House yesterday, and he has boasted in the country on various occasions, of his great remedial measures, of the liberal policy which his Government has endeavoured to inaugurate in Ireland. I say that policy is a policy of bribery in regard to public works, a policy which has always been characteristic of Governments that were not free Governments. I know there was a certain amount of dissatisfaction amongst my Radical friends at the attitude of the Irish Members towards the Railway and Drainage Bills of the Government. Many Radicals thought we ought to have opposed those Bills. I have never maintained that very high level of public virtue. But I have never voted for such Bills without standing up and warning the House of the value of their action. I have never asked the Government to introduce such legislation, but I maintain that if the Government will persist in squandering these large sums, we, who represent very poor districts, are justified in voting with them. I noticed the other day that even the staunch and unbending Radicalism of the Liberal Representatives of London was not proof against similar considerations in regard to the subvention to the London Police. But while we in Ireland have accepted these grants of public money, we have not asked for them. We have warned the right hon. Gentleman, by referring to the failure, waste, and scandalous jobbery that have characterised these operations in the past, what will probably be their fate in the future. I have no doubt that, under the Light Railways Bill, railways will be constructed which will not pay for the grease for the wheels. I have no doubt jobbery will be rampant. I have no doubt the loyal minority are enthusiastic for the Light Railway schemes of the Government, because they know much of the expenditure will find its way into their pockets. Personally, I do not think you will get value for your money. I should be the last man to oppose a rational scheme of public works. We in Ireland need public works. We have needed them for long years, but I warn the right hon. Gentleman, and whoever may succeed him, that if you really want an economical and rational system of public works in a country like Ireland, you can only have it under Local Government, a Government which will be responsible to the public opinion of the country. I come now to another portion of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, the portion which I should like to describe as the Catholic University and the Rome Rule portion. It has been said against us, and used as an argument against our cause, and as against the establishment of an Irish Parliament, that an Irish Parliament would inevitably be a slave to the Pope, and subservient to Rome. I would like to know what Tory Member will now get up and use that argument. We shall hear no more about Rome Rule in Ireland, since the Government, finding their own efforts unavailing, invoked the aid of His Holiness the Pope of Rome, and appealed to religious prejudices to crush a national political movement. No more humiliating, more disgusting, political spectacle was ever exhibited in this generation than the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary standing before a Manchester audience and rebuking the Catholics of Ireland for not showing sufficient deference to the head of their Church. We understand how to show that deference, but I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that I and my co-religionists are as independent of Rome, and of the agents of His Holiness, in all political matters, as any Nonconformist on these Benches. I can tell him that we are far more independent in political matters of the Court of Rome than he and his uncle, who have debased the character of Englishmen by crawling to the Pope, and offering bribes to His Holiness to aid in crushing the Catholic people of Ireland, and to inflict an intolerable wrong. To some extent it succeeded, when an agent was brought from Rome to go among the people, and to trade on their reverence for the Church to crush their political aspirations. I do not think we shall hear much more of Rome Rule in Ireland, not even from the hon. Member for North Armagh, for I am told that at a meeting of an Orange Lodge a cheer was raised for Monsignor Persico and his Mission. A strange idea seems to have hovered in the mind of the Chief Secretary that he could buy the assistance of the Court of Rome, that when he found himself "driven to the ropes" he could come forward and offer to the people of Ireland a Catholic University. The right hon. Gentleman evidently thought that, by an alliance with certain Bishops and Monsignor Persico, he would be able to bribe the Irish people from their desire for liberty by offering us the long delayed measure of justice to the requirements of Catholic education. I tell the right hon. Gentleman we scorn his offer, and I never felt more confident that I speak the feeling of the Irish race, of Irish Catholic people throughout the world, when I tell him that we will not allow his Catholic University, or his promise, meant to deceive and corrupt certain Irish Bishops, we will not allow his promise to intervene for an hour between us and the goal upon which we have set our hopes, or allow him to use this to sow discord between us and English Radicals, now our fast and sworn friends. We scorn his offer; we want not a Catholic University, but liberty to regulate our own Irish affairs. We have been denied this justice for two generations; we can afford to wait for our University until we have Home Rule. When we have our own Parliament we shall have our University, but we have waited so long we can still wait for a year or two. By his promise and his intrigues the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in capturing two Bishops for the support of the detestable policy he is pursuing in Ireland. The right rev. Dr. O'Dwyer, Bishop of Limerick, has gone so far as to write one of the most infamous, cowardly, dastardly letters ever penned by ecclesiastical hand, and he does this as the servant of the Government of Ireland. I am not afraid, although I am an Irish Catholic, to characterise in its true terms that letter, which appeared in the Press of Ireland on the same day that a number of wretched people were evicted.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I rise to order. The hon. Gentleman may attack me; that is germane to the Vote. But in attacking an Irish Bishop, who has nothing whatever to do with it, the hon. Member appears to me to be travelling beyond the Vote, though his remarks would, no doubt, be appropriate if the salary of the Irish Bishop were under consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN: No doubt if the hon. Gentleman went on to attack in detail the action of the Bishop it would be irregular. But I understood him to attribute the Bishop's action as being possibly inspired by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman springs from his seat to defend Dr. O'Dwyer—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot allow that statement to pass. I sprang from my seat because I thought—wrongly as it now appears—that the hon. Member was travelling beyond the Vote. I did not intend to defend the Bishop.

MR. DILLON: I will say nothing more on that subject. But I am glad to see the Tory Party so enthusiastic in support of the Bishop. He has done his best for their policy in Ireland, but his worst for the Church in Ireland. I am exceedingly glad that he stands alone among the episcopate of Ireland in his scandalous line of conduct. But I dismiss that. I ask the Committee what progress has been made in solving the Irish question? The right hon. Gentleman tells us he has inaugurated all kinds of liberal schemes of Irish policy. Well, I may be pardoned if I hold the faith I have always held that the people of the country are the best judges of what is for their benefit. If he and his uncle have been such benefactors, what kind of a people must they be who live in Ireland, since he cannot get one single vote from the three southern provinces or the western half of Ulster? For four years he has had arbitrary rule, and though he claims to have exercised it so beneficently that the country overflows with prosperity, yet the people continue to vote steadily against him. I think we may now ask, after this trial of his policy, Where is it going to end? Where is it going to stop? We see the consequences of all his coercion and strong Government. He has ruled Ireland now for four years, he has had from this House all that he asked for in the nature of strong legislation, he has had a free hand in the administration of Ireland, and I maintain that the right hon. Gentleman has produced absolutely no result in reconciling the people to his Government. On the contrary, politically, the Government is weaker in Ireland to-day than it was when the right hon. Gentleman accepted the post of Chief Secretary. It cannot be denied. Anyone can see that if two policemen are placed by the side of a Nationalist the expression of that man's Nationalist opinions may be prevented. And this is the great triumph of the Government. It cannot be pretended that the system of intimidation the right hon. Gentleman professes to be so anxious to restrain extends even to the vote at the polls. We heard from the hon. Member for South Tyrone, the official supporter of the Government, in a speech that unhappily was cut short, that over the greater part of Ireland absolute peace and contentedness reigns, and that there never were more friendly relations between the police and the people. Then I say in any of those districts where peace and contentment reign, where the people and the police are fraternising, where the people are reaping the golden benefit of your beneficent rule, start a Government candidate against one of our Party. There is not a man on these Benches who would not willingly vacate his seat to-morrow if the right hon. Gentleman would give us the satisfaction of contesting the seat. I represent one of the poorest districts in Ireland, where it is probable the Light Railway policy of the Government should attract support; let the right hon. Gentleman send a man there to stand on the Light Railway platform, and I will stand on none; I will remain in England and never open my mouth during the contest, and let him see what would be the result. That is a fair test. You profess, in your speeches, that your object is to make Ireland contented to remain, as you say, an integral part of the United Kingdom, and you claim success. Then, I say, put it to the test and see if you have reached the people. The right hon. Gentleman has indeed succeeded in elaborating a hitherto unheard-of system of police persecution and espionage. The right hon. Gentleman talks most glibly of Irish social matters, and recently spoke about an auctioneer at fairs. For my own part, I never knew it was the custom of Irishmen to sell cattle by auction. The right hon. Gentleman has never addressed an open-air meeting in Ireland, except on one occasion, when he sallied forth into the Phoenix Park and addressed the Royal Irish Constabulary. He addressed them as if they were a body of troops encamped in the Soudan, surrounded by dangers and savages, and praised them for their extraordinary courage. That is the only case which I remember when the right hon. Gentleman had the courage to address Irishmen, though it is true that about 18 months ago he addressed a meeting of the wealth and fashion of Dublin, backed up by the presence of the Government officials, in the "Antient Concert" room. But the rank and fashion of Dublin were careful that their names should not appear in the Press, and the right hon. Gentleman addressed his audience in camera. Such is the Government under which the people of Ireland have to suffer. They are governed by a man who knows nothing of the circumstances of the country, who utters gibes against the Irish people, and who never allows any consideration of after consequences to check him in sneering at, and insulting, the Irish nation. He must be a bold man indeed who would say that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman has been a success. In one respect, and one only, his policy may be said to have been a success—namely, that he has become the hero of the bitter high Tory, anti-Irish faction of the country. In conclusion, I may mention an amusing incident as an illustration of the high-water mark of the popularity to which the right hon. Gentleman has attained in Ireland. A few days since a poor man was charged at Castletown Roche Petty Sessions, in the County of Cork, with being drunk and disorderly. The Resident Magistrate asked the constable how the man was disorderly, and the witness replied that the man "was driving a donkey and cart and was abusing the animal by calling him Balfour." Immediately the Magistrate imposed on the man a fine of 5s. and costs. There is a moral in this ludicrous incident, because, if we look aside from its absurdity, it shows that the name of Balfour is the worst term of opprobrium that can be used in Ireland, and because it is, at the same time, an evidence of the appreciation entertained for the right hon. Gentleman's policy in Ireland.

(5.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are two complaints brought against me by the hon. Gentleman, which I confess I was surprised to hear from him, one that I make too few speeches; the other, that I am not popular in Ireland. With regard to the speeches I have made at Dublin or elsewhere, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, so far from desiring to stump the country, I should be very glad if I could cut down the disagreeable task of making speeches in Ireland and elsewhere, to even smaller proportions than at present. Then as to my want of popularity in the South and West of Ireland, and the comment it affords on our policy, I do not know that the hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues, who have great influence in these parts of the country, have done their best by speeches and by articles in the newspapers to increase that popularity. On the very day on which I was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, unless I am greatly mistaken, the Freeman's Journal, United Ireland, and other journals of similar complexion, immediately, without warning or experience, transferred to me every one of the epithets with which they had been plastering my predecessors, and when the Committee recollect that the sole estimate which the Irish people are allowed to have of the policy of the Government, and of my personality, is derived from such speeches and newspapers, they will not be surprised that in some parts of Ireland I may not be as popular a man as the hon. Member for East Mayo. After the remarks I have already made on this Vote it will not be necessary for me to traverse the whole of the speech of the hon. Gentleman, but there are one or two points in his speech which I think should not be passed over. One of the chief objections he urged against the Government was that they were in the habit of resting their case upon what he called "cooked statistics." Though he was good enough to say that I was not personally responsible for the cooking, he gave the House to understand that he did believe that whenever political exigency required that a case should be made out for the Government all available machinery was set to work to cook statistics for the purpose. I need not say that a more baseless or more absurd charge was never made in this House, even on Irish Estimates, where baseless and absurd charges seem the order of the day. The hon. Member backed up his general accusation by referring to what he called the monstrous statistics I had produced about boycotted farms. I do not know what statistics he alludes to, for I have refused to give such statistics. I cannot bear in mind all the speeches I have made, but I do not believe I have myself given such statistics, though I cannot speak with confidence on the point. I have said, and I repeat, that the information which I have been careful to collect on this subject does prove that boycotted farms are now taken in Ireland, and in much larger numbers than they used to be. The hon. Gentleman asked why I do not give the names of persons boycotted. This is a very naive request. The immediate result of announcing the names of persons boycotted would be, as the hon. Member knows, to increase the stringency of the persecution to which they are subjected. There are cases, no doubt, in which the sufferings of the boycotted person are already so great, in which the persecution is so complete and the man so cut off from union with his fellows, and from the necessities of life in the neighbourhood in which he lives, that his name might be mentioned without risk of doing much additional harm, and I have frequently given names in such instances; but there are many other cases in which the boycotting is in process of relaxation, and to announce names in connection with these would only have the effect of renewing the persecution. The hon. Member, in order to show the inaccuracy of the boycotting statistics produced by the Government, referred to the case of a land agent heard in a Court of Law in Dublin recently. The land agent pretended to his employer that the labourers on the estate were being boycotted, and he fraudulently charged his employer with the expenses of procuring necessities from a distance. This is conclusive proof that the land agent was a scoundrel; but what else it proves I do not know. How does it prove the statistics are wrong? The hon. Member says no doubt this was included in the list of boycotted persons. But this case does not necessarily invalidate the

Returns, because a man might be boycotted or under police protection at one time, and not at another. As a matter of fact, this man had been boycotted and under police protection at one time; but boycotting had ceased, and police protection withdrawn, and the Returns counted before these fraudulent transactions of the land agent occurred. The most careful watch is kept over the Returns, and they are subjected to revision whenever boycotting is relaxed or ceases. The authorities responsible for the statistics are under the most stringent orders to criticise the Returns at relatively short intervals, to examine the condition of every boycotted person on the list, and, where necessary, to remove a name from the list, so that the House may have a correct view of the general position of boycotting in Ireland. So much for the accusations which the hon. Member has been good enough to bring against me. With regard to the violent denunciation he was good enough to bring against the Holy See and Monsignor Persico, I do not think it necessary to say anything. It is no business of mine to criticise the ultra-Orange speeches it may please hon. Gentlemen from time to time to deliver. The Government had nothing whatever to do with the Mission of Monsignor Persico; they were never approached or consulted on the subject, and if Monsignor Persico came, as I presume he did, to a conclusion which ultimately compelled the Pope, in obedience to the dictates of morality, to condemn the Plan of Campaign and boycotting, it certainly did not depend in any way on the action of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member then went on to discuss the policy of the Government with regard to public works in Ireland. He was good enough to say that I was in the habit of weeping crocodile tears—and I observe that that is a favourite metaphor of the hon. Member—over the fate of any emergency man who might fall a victim to the fury of hon. Members opposite, while I had no heart for the sufferings of the Irish people; and then he denounced the general policy of the Board of Works, and, therefore, of the Government. He told us, so far as I could make out, that the money would be wasted and would not benefit the people on whom it was expended, that it came from the taxpayers of the country, and that, even where executed, the works would do no good for the population they were intended to benefit; and he concluded with the amazing statement that in spite of all these considerations his virtue was not equal to resisting the bribe.

Mr. DILLON: It is not fair to say that. What I did say was that there was no doubt that there was great waste, and that the works were not in the proper place, but that I represented a very poor district, and that some of the money would find its way into the pockets of my constituents.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite accept the hon. Member's statement, but I think that his original version was a good deal more powerful. He, therefore, does admit that the policy of the public works of the Government is, at all events, one that might benefit his poor constituents. That is the first admission in favour of the policy of the Government that I have ever been able to extract from hon. Members opposite. The hon. Member thinks that some policy of public works is desirable, but not under the present régime. He thinks that when the good time comes, when Ireland is blessed with a Home Rule Parliament, then, and then for the first time, money will be plentiful in Ireland; that then, for the first time, it will be possible for the Government to borrow at a cheap rate; and that then, for the first time, jobbery will vanish from Irish shores. I confess that if the rosy view which the hon. Member takes were in any way justified I should find some of my strongest objections to Home Rule, from the point of view of Ireland, would be removed; but I am afraid that the hon. Member will find that the money he is going to borrow will be at the moderate rate of 5 or 6 per cent., and he will find by painful experience that if there be jobbery in the Government of the United Kingdom, that jobbery will sink into insignificance beside the jobbery which will take place when a Parliament is sitting in College Green. Then I was asked by the hon. Member to point out what evidence there was of the success of Her Majesty's Government, and he said that it was a proof that we had no success, that if any Member on those Benches were to resign his seat it would not be contested by any one holding the views of the present Government. The hon. Member appears to be of opinion that the whole policy of Her Majesty's Government is to make an electoral conversion of the provinces of Connaught, Leinster, and Munster. Of course, I should be extremely glad were I able to sway the electoral districts in Ireland, and to persuade the electors that their duty was to give a loyal support to the Constitution of this country, as it at present exists. But I never anticipated for a moment that I would be able to convert in the course of a few years the political convictions of those gentlemen. Is that a proof that Her Majesty's Government has failed in its efforts? I entirely fail to grasp that argument. The policy we have endeavoured to pursue is a twofold policy. In the first place, it is a policy of endeavouring to support the minority in Ireland, who are attacked in their just rights, from plunder and spoliation, a minority not consisting in the main of the landlord class—though even an Irish landlord has his rights—but a minority—I admit, if you like, a small minority—consisting of the peasantry of those three provinces, who most undoubtedly, by the admission of hon. Members themselves, have been the victims of the most cruel and brutal oppressions in history. That is the first task we have in view. The hon. Member for East Mayo, who has behind him the organisation of which he is a leading member, has very little reason to congratulate himself on its results. The state of Ireland is not all that it should be, but it is far better than it was when we came into office, and as far as that branch of the policy of Her Majesty's Government is concerned, I claim now, as I have claimed before, that it has met with success. The second branch of the policy of Her Majesty's Government is that of ameliorating the material condition of the people of Ireland. In carrying out that policy, also, we have made great progress. It is true that every effort we have made has been hampered either by hon. Members themselves or by their Radical allies. The whole power that the Rules of this House give to a minority have been used to make it difficult for Her Majesty's Government to carry out that policy; but I have the satisfaction of reflecting that no inconsiderable portion of it has been carried out, and as regards the remainder, important proposals are now before the House and the country, and before many months they will be carried to a successful issue. When that time comes hon. Members opposite may use what arguments they please, and may give what version seems best to them of the recent history of Ireland, but three facts will stand out in plain relief. It will be obvious to all men that we have been able to vindicate the law and to protect the weak against the strong; it will be obvious to all men that we have done more than any previous Government, whether it was before the Union or subsequent to the Union, to improve the material prosperity of the poorest people in the West and South-West of Ireland; and, further, it will be seen that we have made the largest contribution towards the settlement of that perennial source of difficulty in Ireland, the land question, than was ever attempted or even dreamed of by Irish reformers in the past.

(5.42.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I suppose it is the entire breakdown of this bankrupt Session that has given the right hon. Gentleman's eloquence such a monumental turn. This is the second time in the course of the Debate on this Vote that the right hon. Gentleman has pronounced an elaborate epitaph on his own administration. He was in a melting, lachrymose mood last night, and we then thought that on the morrow he would be more cheerful; but this evening in almost the same terms, although at somewhat greater length, the right hon. Gentleman has for the second time engraven the inscription on his early tomb. I am not at all surprised at the right hon. Gentleman being in this mood. Not even the satisfaction of seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in trouble, which for a few days seemed to keep up his spirits, has sufficed to keep the right hon. Gentleman out of the melting mood. Of course, we can understand why in his statement he disclaimed any idea of his policy leading to the electoral conversion of the people of Ireland. I can assure him that he may console himself with the reflection it has largely led to the electoral conversion of England. I am sometimes a little doubtful as to whether it is to him or to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we ought to be most grateful, but, on the whole, I think it is to the Chief Secretary we are most obliged, because of the universal disgust and detestation which his policy has excited in Ireland, in Scotland, and in Wales, a policy which will meet with overwhelming condemnation at the next General Election. The right hon. Gentleman laughs at that; but if he is so confident of success at the next Election, why is he always pronouncing funereal orations? Now, the right hon. Gentleman has misrepresented the speech of my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend did not complain that the right hon. Gentleman made too few speeches. The complaint was that he made too few speeches in Ireland. So far as England is concerned, and so far as this House is concerned, the more speeches the right hon. Gentleman makes the better pleased we shall be; for I do not remember a single speech delivered by him which has not driven a nail into the coffin of his policy. With the somewhat doubtful exception of his uncle, the Prime Minister, I do not know any man whose orations are more useful to his foes and more prejudicial to his friends. I do not know any man whose statements have been so frequently and so clearly disproved than those of the right hon. Gentleman. What defence has he now set up? The right hon. Gentleman says he is blamed for giving answers from official sources, which all Ministers have to do. That is quite true in one sense, but the right hon. Gentleman has been the first Minister who, when a charge is made against an official, thinks the reply of that official should be accepted, even against the statements of Members of this House, who were eye-witnesses of the occurrences in question. I say the adoption of such a policy is most scandalous and outrageous, and one which even no Minister of the Czar of Russia would dare to adopt. I need not weary the House with details. We cannot forget that at Mitchelstown three lives were lost, and the word of an official was sufficient to prevent the trial of the persons responsible for the deaths. The same thing occurred at Tipperary, and again there was no inquiry. My hon. Friend here was at a meeting in Ireland and saw policemen charge and savagely assault unarmed people, and yet the right hon. Gentleman, on the information supplied to him by the officials, denied that any such events had taken place. Again, when the people lit a bonfire in celebration of the marriage of one of their most trusted leaders, they were batoned by the police, and the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman was, this was done because the crowd were causing an obstruction, which is a mockery as every one knows who is aware of the solitude, desolation, and ruin of Irish towns, thanks to the misgovernment of the right hon. Gentleman. Why does the right hon. Gentleman refuse inquiry into these matters? He does it in pursuance of a deliberate policy. If an official feels that whatever offence he commits he will be defended by a Minister in Parliament, by the money of the Executive in a Court of Law, and that, if necessary, the jury who try him will be packed to secure his acquittal, that official becomes as irresponsible as if there were no law, no Courts, and no Parliament. The natural result is that the police in Ireland have been demoralised and brutalised as has never been the case before. For days together they are in a state of chronic intoxication. They are given as free a range as if they were soldiers permitted to sack an enemy's country. The right hon. Gentleman must intend all that. His sinister and futile hope is that the people can be coerced into tame submission to the authorities and the abandonment of their political convictions. The right hon. Gentleman declares that that is the policy of the civilised world, and that it will have to be adopted by the Government who follow him. We can plainly gather from the right hon. Gentleman what is the character of the Government which he thinks will succeed him. Men who expect to live long do not compose their own epitaphs. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the next Government will have to adopt his policy. He justifies that statement by saying that the Plan of Campaign exists in certain parts of Ireland, and that the Plan of Campaign is an illegal conspiracy. Within 24 hours of the accession of a Liberal Government, the Plan of Campaign will have disappeared into thin air. There will be no further need for it. The emergency men will have gone about their business in Belfast, and will be trying to enlist in the Army which at that moment the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh will be endeavouring to raise in order to man the last ditches. The landlords of Ireland will then, not for the first time, curse the sinister counsels of their friends and patrons in England, and Ireland, too, because they will have no choice but to accept the reasonable and just terms of their tenants. I hope the tenants will ask no more. An hon. and learned Member opposite (the Member for Harrow) laughs at that; but let me remind him that when a few months since the Land Purchase Bill was before the House, he went about the country declaring that slavish greed was not a characteristic of the Irish tenants. What will happen when a Liberal Government comes in power? We shall have a Bill passed in this House, a simple measure, probably of not more than one clause, which will not require any of the hanging-up machinery of which we hear so much, to get it through. We shall pass it; and if the House of Lords is inclined to reject it, we shall bring a little pressure to bear on that illustrious Assembly, after the example of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and bring them to their senses. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could himself have put an end to the Plan of Campaign at any period during the past four years had he been so inclined. If the right hon. Gentleman had but a little more perception of facts, and a little less of that priggish dogmatism that belong to him, he would have dealt with the question of arrears of the tenant farmers of Ireland by inserting a clause in his Bill to that effect. A couple of lines would have been sufficient; and in this way he would have relieved the farmers of much of their difficulties, and the Plan of Campaign would have come to an end within 24 hours. As a result of that, the farmers would have had more money put into their pockets, and the right hon. Gentleman would have avoided all the disturbances which have arisen from his policy. There would have been no necessity for the Mitchelstown affair; no necessity for Bodyke; John Mandeville would not have been done to death; and the right hon. Gentleman would have been saved from pursuing his course of callousness and cowardice, which has so disgusted every man of sense and feeling. Has the right hon. Gentleman's policy made the people more contented? No. I tremble to think what the people would have done if it had not been for the fact that they share the convictions of the right hon. Gentleman himself, that his administration is on its last legs, and that between their final emancipation and the present there stands nothing but a single discredited and bankrupt Ministry. Were it not for these hopes; were it not for the hopes reposed in the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and in the action of the Liberal Party, I believe that the people of Ireland would have long since ceased to listen to the tranquillising councils of their leaders, and that there would have grown up again in Ireland, against their advice, those dark and sinister associations that have played such an important part in the history of the past. But the Irish people know that their day of deliverance is at hand. They know that the right hon. Gentleman has no delusion on the question. His friends may prepare their wreaths of laurels, but all his thoughts are of cypress. His friends may prepare their testaments of praise, but the right hon. Gentleman is writing his own epitaph in language so characteristic of his rule, that when it comes to be inscribed upon the tomb of his administration, it will add new force to the old saying, "As lying as an epitaph."

(6.5.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): It has been complained against us that we have kept up this Debate upon lines too narrow—that on such an important question as the Chief Secretary's salary, in which his policy and his government of Ireland properly come up for consideration—a policy and a government that are interesting the whole world—we descend too much to particulars. But particulars are the very essence of the situation, and whilst in the few words I have to say, I would desire to treat the question broadly, I cannot hope, nor do I desire, to avoid particulars altogether. It has been my rule in political life to endeavour to think well of my opponents—it is pleasanter to feel that one is contending with honest, though mistaken, adversaries than with dishonest men or men that are intentionally malevolent. But certainly I never found the task so difficult as in the case of the right hon. Gentleman. Courtesy, and a desire to conciliate rather than exasperate, should be the characteristics of a man who seeks to govern: these qualities appear to me entirely wanting in the bearing of the right hon. Gentleman towards us. We cannot but see irresponsible rule in its most hateful garb; we cannot but feel, down to our very finger tips, that he and his supporters scorn and dispise us and those we represent. In the two special instances that claimed our attention last night—the acknowledged firing by the police into an unarmed and inoffensive crowd, and the escape from trial of a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary who had committed a felony—a class of cases with which we are, alas! too familiar in Ireland—did one word of sympathy or one gesture of assurance that justice would be done escape the right hon. Gentleman. And that is his bearing all through—a bearing that might pass with the representatives of a powerful and a happy people, but which cuts us to the quick and rouses in us and sustains a determination never to submit to a continuance of his rule. The right hon. Gentleman last night asked how it was that we were not able to imitate his stoical indifference—his philosophic coolness in Debate; as well might the man who applies the thumb-screw ask his victim why he does not imitate his demeanour. We are weak and powerless; he wields all the Forces of the Empire; he inspires the Executive; nay, we believe the Bench is not free from his influence; and as for the Magistracy, which should stand indifferent between people and Crown—they are the instruments of his will. It is idle to ask us to remain calm in the face of the injustice and the indignities to which he subjects our people. He is reported to have written on a recent occasion that we

"Form a Political Party violent in their designs to the verge of treason, unscrupulous in their methods beyond the limits of legality"; a Party whose eloquence, energy, and determination

"Have been steadily and unwaveringly employed, not for the purpose of settling the political controversy on a permanent basis, but for the purpose of embittering it in the interests of a political revolution."

We are not violent beyond the measure of our necessities. We have gone no nearer the verge of treason than many a Political Party in this country within the present century. Our methods have been the only methods through which reform and peace with Great Britain were procurable. Our eloquence (an eloquence in which I can claim no part), our energy and determination have been steadily and unswervingly employed to settle on a permanent basis a great and once apparently hopeless political controversy in which the very existence of our people was at stake. If it has been embittered, the fault does not lie at our door, but at the door of those who, in stupid blindness, for their own supposed interests, have step by step opposed reform in Ireland, and at the door of the right hon. Gentleman, who fitly sums up in his bearing and his policy their ideas of progress and of freedom. We are told that Ireland is peaceful and prosperous. Our peace is not the peace of subjection and despair; it is the peace of vitality and hope—peace the outcome of the sacrifices and the struggles of this Party which he so much condemns, and of the statesmanship, wisdom, and highest Christianity of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and the Party he leads. I believe Ireland is tolerably prosperous at present. In this belief I differ from some of my friends. This prosperity is due in no degree to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. It is the result of the security against eviction and raising of rents—of the large sums of money that are now in the pockets of the tenants, and that were formerly unjustly in the coffers of the landlords—it is the result of that political revolution, of that partial settlement of the land question that the right hon. Gentleman so bitterly condemns. But, after all, it is the prosperity of the Second Empire in France, of Italy under Austria, of the Southern States under Slavery, of Russia—it is not such progress as would be under really free institutions such as we shall have. An hon. and gallant Gentleman asked if Belfast was not prosperous. I rejoice in the prosperity of Belfast. We are as proud of Belfast as you of the South of England are of Manchester and of Leeds. The turn of the spindles in her mills is sweet in our ears; we are as proud of the ships turned out of her yards as you here are of the vessels run off the stocks on the Tyne or the Clyde. The progress of Belfast is largely due to the suitability of the North for the growth of flax—to the encouragement of its manufacture by the people and Ministry of this country; whilst, on the other hand, they discouraged and suppressed the production and manufacture of wool, which were suited to the other parts of Ireland. It is due to the manner in which Protestants were encouraged and petted, the Catholics persecuted and depressed—a policy not yet altogether abandoned. It is, I believe, mainly due to the political content that reigns there. They have had it all their own way, and they are satisfied—just as we over the rest of Ireland will be satisfied when we have it our own way—only that the liberty we aim at is liberty for Protestant and Catholic for North and South alike, not for Protestants at the expense of Catholics or of the North at the expense of the South. You can bring forward no proof that the government and administration of the right hon. Gentleman is not loathed and detested as no government was ever so loathed and detested in Ireland. He himself admits its failure—four years ago we were promised peace in 20 years—it is now relegated to the days of our grandchildren. In my experience Irish Protestants are, as never before in my time, day by day ranging themselves on the side of their Catholic fellow-countrymen. The old naturally hold back, clinging to the false traditions in which they were reared; but the younger generation, largely influenced by disgust at the policy of the right hon. Gentleman and by the sacrifices and utterances of the Irish Party, are taking a better part. The Protestant trading class is honey-combed with detestation of his policy—thousands of its members are blinded by petty and by false and mistaken considerations to the duty of openly expressing their real opinions. Talk of boycotting—of depriving men of their means of support because of their opinions—there has seldom been a more complete boycott than under the possibility of which those live who in any way depend upon the official and attending classes in Ireland. The Government, the right hon. Gentleman, and his friends are deluded as to the real feelings of the Irish people by the overgrown and rapacious official class in Ireland, the outcome of the false system he represents and controls. It inspires a Press; it stands as a veil between him and the Irish people. Even if he would he could not do justice and act lightly. And even this official class is permeated with dislike of his rule. Amongst them nobler and more generous feelings are springing up. We at this side of the House have constant opportunities of realising this fact. The right hon. Gentleman has not one qualification for the rôle he has assumed, for the position in which he has been placed, and for which he now seeks to be paid. He knows nothing of our country, of its traditions, or of the feelings of our people. He does not I am sure make one-tenth the effort to identify himself with it as do the German Governors of Alsace and Lorraine to identify themselves with and understand those they rule. Did he ever consult the representatives or public opinion of the country? Did he ever adopt their proposals? Did he ever consider their united opposition sufficient ground for questioning the wisdom of his own schemes? All he can do is to propose abortive petty measures for light railways and for draining which seldom mature, and, when they do, effect little or nothing. I suppose he is welcome to pour his thousands into Ireland—in my mind it is a demoralising and an enervating system. After all, he will effect nothing. Paralysed by the system he seeks to administer, he is unable to take a step in advance or to remove the rottenest stones out of the edifice he seeks to support. He must, in his heart of hearts, admit that the Irish Question is the latent cause of the paralysis that has overtaken the course of public business in this House—a House whose traditions are so glorious, and whose power of usefulness and of blessing to the human race will be well-nigh boundless when it has for ever abandoned the impossible attempt to crush out the spirit and the aspirations of the Irish people. Gentlemen opposite admit all this, and yet they are unable or unwilling to set about reform even upon their own lines.

Mr. Webb

Their only policy is coercion and suppression. It is amazing how this policy can be supported by so many great and good men and women in and out of Ireland—but so have bad policies in all times and all over the world been supported by the great and good. I was reared in the contest with the most hateful and diabolical system the world ever saw—the system of American slavery. Up to the last that system had the support of culture and refinement in the United States and in this country. It crumbled to its fall, and no one now seeks to defend it. My later years have brought me the unspeakable privilege of being permitted to take part in a contest for Irish liberty and Irish freedom. That cause will triumph, and when it has triumphed no one will be found to attempt to justify the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. Summed up in a few words, that policy is one than which no more criminal can be conceived. The murder of an individual is bad enough. But what are we to say to the attempt to strangle and to murder the God-given spirit and the feeling of a nation—that spirit and those feelings through which alone we can attain real prosperity, and through which alone these Kingdoms can be really, and in fact, united. A new renaissance is spreading over the world. In mental and physical training, in all the essentials upon which progress depends, the peoples are making a fresh start forward. In the last century, when it was of vital importance that all should be free to take part in a great industrial awakening, we were bound hand and foot—the crime is now admitted. A greater awakening has now come upon the world, and were the policy of degradation which this Vote is asked to support to be continued, future generations would have in vain to deplore a more miserable failure and a more heinous crime against our people.

(6.26.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I do not think, Sir, that I ever recollect a time when the discussion of the Constabulary Vote and the discussion of the present Vote have presented so many objects of interest and attention, and have necessitated the expenditure of so much of the time of Parliament. That one fact, taken by itself, shows, I think, very great discontent, not only upon the part of the Irish Representatives, but also upon the part of their constituencies, with regard to the administration of the law by the right hon. Gentleman. Now, Sir, that administration of the law has been described by my hon. Friends, and grave and weighty criticisms have been advanced against it; but to effectually demonstrate to the House the iniquity of that administration, and the hardships from which the every-day people in Ireland suffer, owing to that administration, we should require their tongues—we should require to know their experience; and it would be necessary that they should stand at the Bar of this House and personally impeach the right hon. Gentleman and his agents in Ireland for the sufferings that they have inflicted upon them. We can only faintly tell—we can only imperfectly depict the depth of all the suffering that is going on in Ireland. I am sometimes almost tempted to believe even that the right hon. Gentleman himself has neither the time nor the inclination to fathom the result of his own action. If it were possible for him personally to investigate these matters—I do not say it is possible—I think he would hardly have the conscience to stand up in the House and defend the actions of his agents, and represent the reports of his policemen as true. The right hon. Gentleman is hard at work during most of the Session answering the questions of Irish Members regarding his administration, and during the winter months, probably his choice and his health do not encourage him to encounter the rigours of the Irish climate in pursuit of that information of which he stands so much in need. It has come to pass that we are left in this unsatisfactory position. We are, as it were, beating the air. We cannot, owing to the want of information, efficiently place before the House the position of the Irish people who are suffering from what is being done by the agents of the Government in that country. And although the right hon. Gentleman may not be so very much to blame under the circumstances I have endeavoured to describe, yet he is to blame to some extent, because he has relied with implicit confidence from the time he entered upon his present office until now on the representations made to him and the advice given to him by the effete and rotten permanent officials of Dublin Castle. His initial mistake was made in 1886, when he declined to carry out the remedial legislation necessary to deal with the agrarian crisis. The right hon. Gentleman in 1887 took the responsibility of delaying remedial legislation in order to press on an abominable and cruel Coercion Act. In this way he set on foot the commotion and disturbance which undoubtedly, owing to what I regard as the folly of the right hon. Gentleman, will outlast his time, and will certainly prevent his administration from attaining that measure of success which might, under different circumstances, be possible for a Chief Secretary to achieve. The Plan of Campaign was started because of the failure of the Government to introduce legislation to deal fairly and justly between landlord and tenant in Ireland. I do not, and never have, concealed my views with regard to the Plan of Campaign. At its outset I saw my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, and told him that I thought the Plan of Campaign ought to be limited to those estates on which it had already been started. He represented to me that if the combination were general the movement would be so strong that the Government and the landlords would be altogether unable to cope with it, but that if it was limited, as I suggested, the result might be that the tenants would be sacrificed. I could not help admitting that there was a good deal of force in what my hon. Friend said, but I still felt justified in pressing upon my hon. Friends the desirability of limiting this movement as much as possible. They assented to my expressed wish, and did not push it beyond those estates on which it had up to that time been started. But my friends tell me now that my predictions have come true, and that while we, on the one hand, have limited the movement to that small number of estates, those who have been shut out are pursued by a combination of the Government and the landlords with a hatred and a relentness vindictiveness which are even for them extraordinary. I may have been wrong in the position I took up, but I thought it better that a small number of tenants should suffer or be sacrificed rather than that there should be the terrible evil of a general agrarian struggle. I cannot here too strongly condemn the fatuous conduct of the Government in not having yielded to the pressure brought upon them that these Plan of Campaign estates should be allowed to share in the Act of 1887. There were only 10 or 12 of these estates, and on the Coolgreany and Ponsonby estates the tenants consisted mainly of leaseholders. These tenants were deprived of the benefits of the Land Act, but their struggle was recognised or sanctioned by the Act of 1887, which admitted leaseholders to the benefit of the Act of 1881. The right hon. Gentleman, acting under the advice of the partisan permanent officials, who urged the right hon. Gentleman against all surrender, has, owing to the strife on these estates, been deprived of even that small modicum of success in his administration which is all that a Chief Secretary under the present system can secure. He has been told that the British Government is not strong enough to surrender these 10 or 12 estates; that he must not give way in regard to them. That is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. I, at any rate, do not think it is statesmanship. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, even at the eleventh hour, whether he cannot utilise the remaining weeks of the Session to bring forward some plan by which the strife on these estates might be terminated, and by which the tenants on these estates might take their share in the benefits that the Legislature intended for them. After the experience of the successful arbitration in reference to one of these estates carried out by the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell), it ought not to be difficult to frame a measure which would pass through the House without difficulty or opposition, and which would provide for an inquiry and a fair settlement of the dispute on each of these estates. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman is determined to pursue these tenants to the bitter end, he may do so. I may say that I have not discussed the suggestion I have made with any of my hon. Friends, and let it not be supposed that my suggestion is any sign of weakness. These tenants will be protected, and effectually protected, to the end. If it takes 50 years before the means and methods of the present Government are removed, these people shall not suffer. Money will be found for securing that they shall not suffer. But I make the suggestion in the interest of peace and humanity and justice, and not in the interests of the pockets of the landlords. I daresay that my hon. Friends would prefer to fight it out, and are careless as to whether the suggestion I make is accepted. I have myself little doubt that my suggestion will have been made in vain, but I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I have made it, and that the responsibility will not rest on me. Let me now turn from the Plan of Campaign to a consideration of the programme of the Government with regard to next Session. We had an important announcement made to us yesterday by the Leader of the House. It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government, it appears, to persevere with the Irish Land Purchase Bill this Session. This Bill is dead, and it is the intention of the Government, we are told, to re-introduce it next November, or early in the coming year, and press it through. I endeavoured at an earlier period of the Session to place some of my objections before the House, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that I showed by the tone of my speech that I was not guided by any blind or unreasoning hostility to the Bill. I was anxious to make it a workable measure, in order to fulfil the object which it was introduced to carry out, and I say again now, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will ponder what I say, that my anxiety is that these 33 millions of money shall be used to the best advantage for the purpose of settling as far as it can extend this land question, or the most difficult and pressing portion of this land question in Ireland. When, during the Second Reading of the measure, I suggested a method of fining down the rents, that method was not suggested as any great or original discovery, though I happened to be the first to discover and suggest it myself in the spring of 1881, when the Land Bill of that year was first introduced. But, of course, I shall prefer a solution by occupying ownership, and I did not advance the principle of fining down the rents as a better and more perfect way. I did not so advance it. I advanced it simply from the point of view of economy, and in order to allow the limited amount of money available to be stretched as far as possible to do the greatest amount of good for the least amount of money. But if any objection is taken—and I am addressing myself particularly now to the right hon. Gentleman whose salary we are considering and in whose jurisdiction and upon whose responsibility the Land Bill of the coming year will be framed—if any objection is taken to the principle of fining down the rents on the ground that it is not an abolition of dual ownership, and that occupying ownership is preferable, I say I am entirely with that objection. By all means use this money for occupying ownership, but do so use it. Now, Sir, what is the situation? The Bill which the right hon. Gentleman has had framed by the advice of his subordinates will not carry out the objects you have in view. Your money will be to a large extent wasted and used for purposes for which it is not in the contemplation of Parliament that it should be used. Instead of enabling bond fide occupiers to become the owners of their holdings, much of it, if you proceed upon the lines laid down, will be used for the purpose of enabling large graziers in Connaught and other Irish provinces to become the owners of their holdings, and I do not believe that that is the wish of the people of this country or of this House. What I wish to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman is this, that he should occupy some of the Royal Irish Constabulary in the interval in obtaining Returns to this House as to the situation of the estates in Munster and in Connaught, and especially in Connaught, with regard to the amount of rent paid upon each estate by tenants living on their holdings, and by tenants not living on their holdings, and by tenants of the class of grazing tenants, who do not come under the operation of the Land Act of 1881, because they are of that class. I think he will find that the magnitude of the problem he has undertaken will be enormously reduced, and that, by means of the information obtained, he will be able to introduce alterations into the Bill which will enable the money to be provided by Parliament—the £33,000,000—to go very much further than he has any idea of at present. I believe, speaking in regard to the case of Connaught, that probably not more than one-fifth or one-sixth of the value of the land in that province need be purchased out at all for the purpose of establishing an occupying ownership. In the case of Munster, probably not more than one-half of the land of that province need be purchased. The case of Ulster is entirely different, because there, owing to the operation of the Ulster custom, the extensive clearances which have taken place in Connaught and in Munster have not been carried out. You have a province of medium and small occupying tenants who are well fitted to become the owners of their holdings, and where, undoubtedly, the money of the State, if spent with proper safeguards, and in accordance with local feelings and requirements, may be well and safely spent. But that does not apply to Connaught and Munster, and to some extent, though not at all to the same extent, that does not apply to Leinster. The advice I would respectfully give to the right hon. Gentleman would be to make his Department acquainted with the circumstances of Munster and Connaught during the coming autumn and winter before the re-introduction of his Land Bill. The Constabulary are well fitted to collect these Returns. They know the circumstances of all the different estates, and they already collect many Agricultural Returns which are of great value to us; and they can easily, with little addition to their ordinary duties, put the right hon. Gentleman and the House into full possession of the most important details with reference to these matters, with the result, I believe, that there will be great advantage to the State and great economy of money. Finally, I would entreat the Government to consider, in view of the fact that they propose to allocate large Imperial grants to Ireland for local purposes as a counter-guarantee to the sums to be advanced from the Imperial Treasury, whether some regard ought not to be paid to the principles of local control and local responsibility. It appears to me to be a bitter mockery to say that here are sums which are given to English Local Authorities to do what they please with, and that in the case of Ireland we should intercept these sums, should deprive the future Irish Local Authorities of all right to control them, and should previously hypothecate them for the purpose of securing the British Treasury. That is a due regard to the British Treasury undoubtedly, but not a due regard to the principles of local self-Government for Ireland—principles on which the present Government have come into Office, and by their regard to which they will have to stand or fall at the next General Election. I, for one, can take no part in and can on no account agree to any hypothecation of local resources without the will and sanction of the Local Authorities. I do not believe that any danger or risk of whittling or obstructing the working of the Land Act will be likely by taking Local Authorities into your confidence. I do not think that for an instant. I would say, trust to these Local Authorities since you are going to set them up, and if you do not trust them do not set them up. It would be the height of foolishness at the first turn to assert of these Local Authorities, to whom you look for so much in the future government of Ireland, that you will not trust them to have their say whether these counter guarantees are to be given. These are the subjects which I have thought it right to put before the right hon. Gentleman for his consideration. I hope he will be able to pay some attention to them, and I hope he will be able to give immediate attention to the first suggestion I made with regard to the termination of this turmoil on these Plan of Campaign estates. I trust he will have an opportunity during the recess of paying further attention to the other matters which I have brought before him—matters which are well worthy of his attention, and matters which I believe, if attended to, will enormously facilitate the settlement of the Irish land question, and will reduce the sum necessary to be advanced by the Imperial Treasury to manageable proportions, and to an amount which will not terrify the taxpayers of this country.

(6.56.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I think it is not necessary for me to make any reply to the hon. Gentleman, but I desire to express, on my own behalf, my sense of the moderation which has characterised the speech just delivered, and to say that any practical suggestion falling from the hon.

Mr. Parnell

Member will, of course, receive the respectful consideration of the Government. But I ought not to be understood as holding out the faintest hope of proceeding with a Land Bill in the remaining portion of the Session. I refer rather to the suggestion made with regard to the Land Bill being introduced at a very early date. I take it that I should be out of order in discussing the provisions of that Land Bill. The hon. Gentleman's particular position, and the place he holds in the councils of the Party of which he is the leader, no doubt may render it appropriate that he should, on the Chief Secretary's Vote, give some general view of his notion of the policy to be adopted in respect of the Bill which is in charge of the Chief Secretary. I presume that is the consideration, Mr. Courtney, which enabled the hon. Gentleman to be in order in making the observations he did. But I take it that I should be stretching your indulgence if I were to discuss with him at this moment the question of giving Local Authorities control over the expenditure of the sums to be lent by Parliament for the purchase of land in Ireland, or to express any opinion upon the suggestion that he has thrown out—a suggestion, in my opinion, very well worthy of attentive consideration—with regard to limiting the area, size, or character of the farms to which the principle of land purchase is to be applied. I did not rise to discuss the speech of the hon. Gentleman, but to express my own sense of the general moderation which characterised it, and to inform him and the Committee that practical suggestions, coming from those Benches, as from any other Benches, will always receive due consideration from this Bench.

Vote agreed to.

2. £1,457, to complete the sum for Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £102,602, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the salaries and expenses of the Local Government Board in Ireland, including various Grants in aid of Local Taxation."

(7.4.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): I should like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of money he proposes to allot this year to the different Poor Law Unions, and, as I have considerable experience in the administration of the Poor Law, perhaps I may tender to the right hon. Gentleman a little advice. There are now put on the Poor Rate an enormous number of charges that have no connection whatever with the Poor Law. For example, there is the expense of making out the voters' list, and expense of administering the Vaccination Acts. There are, at least, six or eight different charges now put on the Poor Law administration which I think ought to be put on the local rates. I draw a distinction in this way. When there is anything that a Local Body can possibly keep down, it is extremely proper it should be put on the rates. The interest of Local Bodies is entirely in the direction of keeping burdens down. But take the case of vaccination. A Poor Law Board have no authority to reduce the number of children born or vaccinated. We are absolutely helpless. When we perform our duty well we increase the rates. We have no possible means of keeping down the rates, and I say that is a burden which should be shifted entirely to the Imperial Exchequer. The expense of preparing the voters' lists, too, should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. There are at least six charges which are in no way connected with the Poor Law which we have no authority whatever to reduce. I quite acknowledge that we can only expect a certain amount of assistance, and as the chairman of a Poor Law Union I am disposed to say the Chancellor of the Exchequer has assisted Poor Law Boards a good deal. But I think it would be well if he would look at this matter from the point of view I have set forth.

(7.10.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I propose to move to reduce the Vote in respect of the item of salaries. The amount asked is £23,391, being an increase of £65 upon the amount asked for last year. Of course, local government affairs in Ireland are despotically managed by the right hon. Gentleman who has just received his wages, and it is worthy of notice that though this year several Boards of Guardians have been disfranchised, there is an increase in the expenditure. I regret extremely that when Irish Members rises the Chief Secretary prefers to converse with the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer than to listen to what is said. We all recognise the constant discourtesy of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I am merely stating what is true. Whenever I try to bring a matter under the consideration of the Chief Secretary he tries to show his discourtesy in the worst possible way. However, we are getting accustomed to it, and we know we shall not have to endure it very much longer. Now, we ought to get some information respecting the various Boards of Guardians that have been done away with this year. I have the privilege, the great privilege, of belonging to the Cork Board of Guardians, one of the largest Poor Law Boards in the South of Ireland. It has suited the convenience, the will, and the pleasure of the Chief Secretary to do away with that Board. Why? Simply because I exposed the illegitimate conduct of a man who is illegitimate himself. Such Boards as those of Dungarvan and Cork should not be allowed to lapse without some very good reasons being assigned in the House of Commons. The circumstances of the Cork Board are very remarkable. So long as the Board happened to be Conservative, and confined themselves to passing resolutions of eulogy upon the Government of the day, they were not interfered with, but when the political complexion of the majority was changed owing to the political conversion of many of the ex officio Guardians, and the Board sought to pass resolutions conveying censure upon the administration in Ireland, the Government stepped in. Up to the year 1886, by reason of the predominance of the ex officio Guardians, the Conservatives had a majority on the Board of three or four. They accordingly always elected a Conservative chairman. But opinions began to change, and the old Tory Party thought they must make a new departure. Accordingly Mr. Henry L. Young was chosen to be run as a candidate for the chairmanship. Mr. Young was chosen because he was a colourless politician, though on many occasions he lent himself to the Tory Party. On one occasion I had the great pleasure of materially conducing to his defeat. On that occasion we succeeded in placing a democrat in the chair, a Mr. Michael Hearn, a tenant farmer. We had a few votes at first, but after a fortnight's fighting the opposition collapsed, just as the Orangemen in the North collapse. The following year, however, by dint of scraping together all their members, Mr. H. L. Young was appointed Chairman. The Conservative ex officio Guardians, who are always talking about what they do and can do for the poor people in the South of Ireland, having once established Mr. Young in the chair, left him. He was left to himself on the understanding that he would refuse to put any resolutions which were in any wise political in character. The week following the election of Mr. Young we had a difference with him, and on three occasions we took exception to the tactics of the Tory Party. Our resolutions were refused, the Local Government Board were appealed to, and they, of course, backed up the party of disorder, of disunion, of hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness of blood and murder. ["Order!"] I have seen bodies that have been murdered by the minions of the right hon. Gentleman. [The CHAIRMAN: Order!] Well, I believe what I say, Mr. Courtney. Sometimes, perhaps, I speak strongly, but I have seen things in Ireland that I really—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! I should like the hon. Member to come to the Vote.

DR. TANNER: When I was interrupted by discordant jeers from hon. Members opposite I was stating that when the newly-elected Chairman of the Cork Board appealed to them the Local Government Board came to his assistance. As I say, the Chairman was elected by the votes of the ex officios, many of whom had no right whatever to be on the Board. At any rate, there are a certain number of gentlemen on the Cork Board who are always absent when work has to be done, and who only turn up when there is a job to be done. When we had done what we considered it was our right to do we received a couple of protests from the Local Government Board. We received a third warning because we passed a resolution of confidence in the leader of the Irish Party, in the leader of the Irish nation, a man of whom we are all proud. And then a sealed order was sent down dissolving the Board. This is no small matter. The Cork Board is one of the largest in Ireland. There are at present about 2,300 persons in the workhouse. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary makes signs of impatience. Of course, the number of poor in the Cork Union has been increased since the present Chief Secretary came into office. What has been done since the dissolution of the Board? Great and grievous harm. Two Vice Guardians have been sent down to Cork. I do not know them, but I have heard about them. Mr. Burke is in many ways a most respectable gentleman, and I have heard that Major Kirkwood is a graduate in the school of horse-racing, like most of the Lord Lieutenants who come over under the Tory régime. What did these gentlemen do when they came to Cork? One of the first actions of the Vice Guardians who superseded us was to cut down out-door relief. In our administration we had always to encounter the opposition of the ex officio members to any out-door relief being given. In their view, whenever an unfortunate person was reduced to destitution by bad times, he should enter the workhouse, but they did not succeed in enforcing their policy upon the Board, because popular feeling and common sense was too strong against them. But when our successors, the Vice Guardians, came into office, they at once proceeded by every means in their power to cut down the list of the recipients of out-door relief. In this way there were several families deprived of the pittance of a few shillings a week, which had been doled out to them. For instance, there was a blind man, named Madox, who with his family had by assistance in this way been enabled to keep out of the workhouse, and thus there was a saving to the rates, but he by the new policy was forced to enter the workhouse. Public attention being directed to these matters a check was given to these proceedings by the expression of public opinion, but still matters are not what they should be in this respect in Cork Union. I will admit that the administration of the Vice Guardians has been productive of a small, a very small, amount of benefit. We had always to contend against the opposition of the Tory members, strong feeling was excited on the Board, and the work was somewhat impeded. The new Guardians, having full sympathy and assistance from the Local Government Board, were at once able to get the money for the purpose of providing labourers' cottages, which we for years had been vainly trying to obtain. With all their facilities, however, these gentlemen are unable to do the work satisfactorily, they naturally being hampered by the feeling of opposition which naturally arises among the people who are deprived of their recognised right of representation. The administration of affairs in the Union, in the manner I have endeavoured to point out, is far from satisfactory. In recent years similar action was taken in regard to the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians, but in that case there was, undoubtedly, a considerable amount of violence displayed, which in the case of our Board did not exist. I was the person who bore the brunt of the situation on our Board. I impeached the action of a gentleman who was a member of the Board. I told the truth about his conduct, his character, his pedigree, and his aspirations, and I was met by threats that I should have my head punched—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I am stating what happened.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not necessary to go over all these details in discussing the action of the Local Government Board.

DR. TANNER: I will follow your ruling, Sir. There were various scenes on the Cork Board, and the Board was dissolved, but I will not enter into this. But I demand from the Chief Secretary the reasons for the arbitrary action of the Local Government Board in dissolving this and the Dungarvan Board. I shall have occasion later to question the action of the Local Government Board Inspector. In this, as in other matters, the Chief Secretary, as President of the Local Government Board, has not done his duty, I conceive. I demand an explicit reply dealing with details in connection with the dissolution of these two Local Representative Bodies, and I ask when will representation be restored.

(7.40.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): Into these matters of detail I do not propose to enter, but I do protest against the way in which the amount of this Vote has been growing year after year, until it has almost reached the amount of the English Vote. We are asked to vote £132,000.

DR. TANNER: I beg pardon; it was my intention to conclude by moving the reduction of the Vote under head A by £1,000.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. CLARK: While the amount for the English Vote is only £164,000, the salaries paid to officials seem to me preposterous in amount and number. I take one Department, the Medical, and compare it with the Departments in England and Scotland. The Medical Department in England costs £130,000 a year. I do not object to the English Vote, under which the Chief Inspector gets £1,200 yearly, for that is not too much, but I do object to that officer in Ireland getting £1,200, while in Scotland he only gets £200. If the present condition of things is allowed to continue we shall have the Irish Vote mounting up to the English Vote. Next year I intend to move a number of reductions on this Vote, and one of the things I will endeavour to do will be to reduce the Medical Inspector's Vote from £1,200 to £600, and it will then be three times the amount paid for Scotland. These high salaries are, I suppose, paid as a kind of bribe to Ireland, but I think the time has come for pruning down these extravagances, and placing Ireland, as regards officials and salaries, in a position similar to that of England and Scotland.

(7.44.) DR. TANNER: I beg to move the reduction of Item A, Salaries and Wages, by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries and Wages, be reduced by £1,000."—(Dr. Tanner.)

(7.45.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I regret that my hon. Friend has thought it desirable to move a reduction on a specific item, for it narrows the extent of our criticism.

DR. TANNER: I may explain that I was anxious to get the reasons that actuated the Board in the suppression of the Cork and Dungarvan Boards of Guardians.

MR. FLYNN: I quite appreciate my hon. Friend's object in moving a specific reduction, and that reduction being moved, there are one or two anomalies in administration to which I would invite the attention of the Committee. We find a large amount set down for auditors of the Local Government Board. We find these officers go round—

THE CHAIRMAN: That is item C, and the hon. Member must not enter upon that, the reduction being moved in regard to item A.

MR. FLYNN: I come at once to the matter which has induced my hon. Friend to move the reduction, the suppression of the Boards of Guardians in Cork and Dungarvan. I have no doubt that when the right hon. Gentleman comes to reply he will say that the Boards did not confine themselves strictly to official business. Now, in the first place, I ask the Committee to consider, what is the action of the Department having supervision in England? I have seen in the newspapers of the day a report of some very disorderly proceedings at a meeting of the Clerkenwell Vestry, when the members, departing altogether from the propriety of official proceedings, indulged in language of a personal and recriminating character, and wound up with a bout of fisticuffs. Of course, there is no defence for such conduct, which is an extreme example of what has taken place at other times in other parts of England, but we do not expect to hear that the Local Government Board in England has, at once, taken action in suppressing the Clerkenwell Vestry, or any other body which has committed an offence against the propriety of official administration, in the autocratic manner characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman who presides over the Local Government Board in Ireland. My hon. Friend made a reference to the suppression of the Ballinasloe Board. I am not familiar, as doubtless some of my hon. Friends are, with the particulars in that instance, but I am acquainted with the circumstances in relation to Cork and Dungarvan, and I say those circumstances were not of a sufficiently grave character to justify the extreme action of suppressing those Boards, and depriving the ratepayers of that representation which is the very essence of local administration in this and other countries. In Dungarvan there was some trifling disregard of the rules and regulations laid down by the Department, but attention was paid to the remonstrance, and yet the next thing we hear is that the Board has been suppressed and paid Guardians are sent down, the right of representation being taken from the ratepayers who, of course, had no voice in the nomination or selection of the superseding Guardians. But the case is worse in the Cork Union. We have on previous occasions asked for an explanation of the autocratic and, to us, unjustifiable action taken. We who have local knowledge can vouch for the work of the Guardians being carried out legitimately, fairly, honestly, and without a suspicion of jobbery, and they had, within a comparatively short time, reduced the rates of the Union to reasonable proportions. The Local Government Board could not lay to the charge of the Guardians anything in the nature of jobbery or corruption. The grave and serious offence in the eyes of the twopenny-halfpenny Magistrates of Dublin Castle was that on two occasions the Guardians did not confine themselves to the 14th Article of the General Rules, but had attempted to carry resolutions dealing with public questions of the day, actions which Guardians have in times past been allowed to take without interference. Does the right hon. Gentleman defend the suppression of the Board on the ground that there was friction and a rather hot encounter between my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork and the hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry)? The hon. Member for South Hunts, with that tendency to hide his diminished head, and never to defend himself in public, which has marked his career for some time past, has not explained that he was accused by certain Guardians of being responsible for a state of things in the Union, and out of this arose a resolution which was proposed, and resisted by the hon. Member for South Hunts and those ex officio Guardians who only attended the Board meetings when there was some appointment to be made, or business to be transacted in which they or their friends were personally interested. On the occasion there was a warm altercation between my hon. Friend (Dr. Tanner) and the hon. Member for South Hunts, and the next thing we hear of is that the Local Government Board have sent down sealed orders for the suppression of the Board, and the appointment of paid Guardians. Surely the Representative of the Local Government Board here is not going to contend that because there was a certain amount of strong language indulged in by hon. Members of the Board, even though they are Members of this House, is a sufficiently grave reason for taking this high handed autocratic step? We await the official explanation with considerable interest. I feel convinced that the right hon. Gentleman will not be able, notwithstanding his well trained ingenuity, to allege anything more serious against the Cork Board of Guardians than the fact that, on one or two occasions, they passed resolutions dealing with public political matters, and then proceeded with the ordinary business of the Board. It should be borne in mind, that before Boards of Guardians represented the National feeling in Ireland, as now they do, so far as elected members are concerned, it was a constant practice to pass resolutions of a loyal or political character, resolutions congratulating a Lord Lieutenant upon his accession to office, or commenting upon political events of the day entirely outside the routine business of a Board of Guardians. As my hon. Friend (Dr. Tanner) reminds me, in the days antecedent to Disestablishment, when there was great excitement in Ireland, and Party feeling ran high in relation to the much vexed Church question, a number of Boards of Guardians, then in the hands of the land owning class, passed resolutions denouncing the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in favour of Disestablishment. Such resolutions Boards in past times passed without reproof, if not with encouragement, and they were not more outside their ordinary business than if Boards in these days passed resolutions in reference to the Land Purchase Bill, or any of the ill-starred measures of the present Administration. It is the more desirable that these Boards should be permitted to act in this way, as they are the only bodies who reflect the public opinion of the locality. The right hon. Gentleman gets his information entirely from official sources, and, by putting their opinions on record, these Local Boards offer a further means of enlightenment to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues. Copies of these resolutions are sent, I understand, to the Chief Secretary, as well as to the Local Representatives in Parliament. It cannot be contended, or it should not be contended, with any respect for the principle of Local Government, that such action on the part of Local Boards is a grave dereliction of duty, to be marked with suppression. We demand some explanation why an important body like the Cork Board of Guardians was treated in this arbitrary manner at the instance of a clique of officials in Dublin Castle, inspired and directed, as we think, by a political cabal, of which the hon. Member for South Hunts is a prominent member. There is one other matter to which I wish to call attention in connection with the action of the Local Government Board in regard to certain medical officers, in order to show how the Dublin Castle officials, inspired by the right hon. Gentleman's policy, sound whatever stop they like on the instrument on which they play. Over and over again we have brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman in this House certain views connected with Irish administration. I wish particularly to call attention to the readiness with which the Local Government Board officials pounce upon what they consider to be a blot, if the act is committed by a medical officer who has the misfortune to hold Nationalist views. Complaint was made of an alleged dereliction of duty by a medical officer at Killarney. A complaint was conveyed to the Government, through the medium of an insignificant and insolent minority, that application was made to the dispensary medical officer to attend a sick person, and that it was not attended to, although it was repeated. This matter was laid before the right hon. Gentleman, who, although he was unable to find time to inquire into a shooting outrage at Charleville, was in a position to set the whole machinery of the Local Government Board in operation, and it then transpired that the explanation was, the applicant had only a red ticket, and the medical officer did not deem it an urgent case. Now, the Board of Guardians might easily have dealt with this little matter, yet the right hon. Gentleman and the Local Government Board were so responsive to the touch from certain quarters, that the whole machinery of the Department was set in motion. I think this incident is most significant of the real nature of the Government policy.

(8.7.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the hon. Member has attacked the Local Government Board for having inquired into a matter brought before the House of Commons.

MR. FLYNN: Yes; and they did so very promptly.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But how can the hon. Member complain of the prompt action of the Local Government Board? I think I may at once pass from that to other matters which have been mentioned. I have been questioned with regard to the dissolution of the Cork and Dungarvan Boards of Guardians. The dissolution of the latter Board occurred in 1888, and the matter is at least a year and a half old, and has been discussed.

DR. TANNER: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon my ignorance; he had me in gaol last year, and I could not possibly bring the matter under his notice then.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was particularly referring to the remarks of hon. Members who were not in gaol. The Board was dissolved because it disgracefully wasted its time, and also its money in regard to contracts. But it will come into existence again next March, and I think hon. Members will be glad to learn that the result of the administration by paid Guardians has been to place the affairs of the Union in a much more satisfactory condition. With regard to Cork Union, the dissolution of that Board took place in July last, under circumstances which have already been described—

DR. TANNER: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. He has before admitted that the Board was doing its duty in an ordinary manner. When, however, an altercation arose between two of the Members, who are also Members of this House, the Local Government Board suddenly intervened.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What really occurred was this: The dissolution of the Cork Board of Guardians took place in January last. The hon. Gentleman would have the Committee believe that the Board was doing its duty in an ordinary way, and was suddenly and arbitrarily dissolved for political purposes.

DR. TANNER: I did not say anything of the kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At least twice before January the Board was warned that it would be dissolved unless its manner of conducting business was altered. The Board of Guardians knew perfectly well that if they continued proceedings contrary to regulations laid down by the Local Government Board, no other course would be left to the Local Government Board than to dissolve them. This is but obviously just to the poor. If the majority of a Board of Guardians are to constantly occupy themselves with discussing, not the affairs of the Union, but mere abstract political resolutions, it is perfectly clear that the poor will suffer. If at a time when business is to be transacted the Guardians quarrel in an unseemly and discreditable manner over these extraneous resolutions, such conduct must properly and necessarily be followed by dissolution. Any one who looks into the series of transactions which terminated in the dissolution of the Cork Board of Guardians must agree that the Local Government Board acted as they were bound to act, and if, after repeated warnings, they had refrained from taking the step which was expressly prescribed by statute for such cases they would have proclaimed their own incompetence to manage the Boards of Guardians. I have refrained from describing the character of the scenes and the language used at these meetings, but even if the scenes had not been, as they were, of a discreditable character, and even if the language had been moderate and decent, which it was not, their action would have been an offence against the regulations of the Local Government Board.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): How many Irish Boards of Guardians are suppressed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think two.

(8.15.) MR. CLANCY: I think that the doctrine which the right hon. Gentleman has laid down in regard to Public Bodies passing political resolutions is a somewhat extraordinary one. Surely the mere doing that is not a sufficient justification for suppression. Of course if persistence in passing resolutions outside the scope of business should lead to actual mismanagement of the affairs of a Union I would sympathise with, and, indeed, advocate a policy of stringent suppression.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I endeavoured to explain that this Board was suppressed because these political resolutions were brought forward at such a time that the legitimate business of the Board was delayed.

DR. TANNER: The second resolution congratulating the Leader of the Irish Party on the result of the Parnell Commission Inquiry was only proposed after a resolution had been carried congratulating a Conservative gentleman, who had been ill, on his recovery.

MR. CLANCY: Even if it were true that some members of the Board were inconvenienced by the discussion of political resolutions before the regular business was proceeded with, I think it was a very hard measure to deprive the ratepayers of the right of having their affairs administered by elected Guardians. Of course if such conduct really prejudiced the affairs of the Union, such an extreme course of action might have been justified. But I do not gather that the right hon. Gentleman has charged against the Cork Board anything like the misappropriation of funds, the fraudulent placing of contracts, or delay in the management of business, and, that being so, I think it is a very hard case to deprive the ratepayers of the right of electing a Board for the simple reason that certain members of the Board were inconvenienced on one occasion. In neither the case of the Cork nor of the Ballinasloe Boards has the right hon. Gentleman been able to point out anything more serious than mere personal inconvenience, and, therefore, I say that the punishment inflicted was too severe. In another case a complaint was made that a contract was given to a person who ought not to have had it, and even in that case I doubt whether the suppression of the whole elective system was not too severe a punishment. Some smaller penalty would surely have adequately met the case. The Local Government Board has the minutes of every meeting of a Board of Guardians in Ireland transmitted to it within a week of the meetings being held, and surely nothing would have been easier than for the Central Authority to refuse to confirm the contract, and to insist on its being given by the Local Board to another person. No, the Local Government Board preferred to suppress the Local Board of Guardians, and this is indicative of the whole system of Irish government. The fact is, that the Dublin Castle officials avail themselves of the slightest pretext for suppressing one of these Boards, and the suppressions generally take place in those parts of Ireland where the Nationalist Party have obtained the upper hand on the Boards. In many cases recently in the North of Ireland Boards of Guardians have made it the first business of the day to pass political resolutions in support of the policy or measures of the Government, and within the last six months nearly every Board in the North has adopted that course, especially in regard to the Land Purchase Bill of the Government. Nevertheless, in no single case in the North of Ireland, where these transactions have taken place, has the heavy hand of the Local Government Board been felt. It is only when we come to the Nationalist parts of the country—Leinster, Munster, and Connaught—that the Local Government Board come down, hot and heavy, on the least pretence, and sometimes on no pretence at all. Some protest is called for from the Nationalists against this policy of terrorism—this attempt to humiliate where they cannot convert. I hope the Boards of Guardians will not be intimidated. These Local Bodies are the representative centres of local feeling, and I think that Boards of Guardians and Town Councils and other authorities are justified in passing these resolutions, and I hope they will pass them whether they be Orange or Nationalist. We can only protest, as we shall protest again and again, against offences of this kind being visited with the severest punishment, namely, suppression. (8.32.)

(9.5.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): The list of salaries and wages presented to the Committee under this Vote this year is very significant. At present, we have under 5,000,000 of population, and in the year 1848 we had over 8,000,000, and with the latter number, the amount voted was £19,636. If we now voted a proportionate amount to this Irish Bumbledom, we should be paying £10,000, but instead of asking us to vote that sum, we are asked for over £23,000. In the year 1848, the cost of Inspectors amounted to £2,110, but in the present Estimates we are asked to vote for Inspectors alone £3,930. In 1848 the cost of travelling and auditors was £3,300, but now, though there are 3,500,000 less people in the country, the cost is £6,750. If this money were voted for poor people who require relief, I think nobody on this side of the House would say much, but the cost of the poor per head per week was only 2s. in 1848, and it is the same to-day, and therefore the increased charges made under the Vote must have been devoured by the officials. No portion of the increase goes to the poor. It is all absorbed by salaries, allowances, and travelling expenses. The total cost in 1848 was £41,699, whereas now, with little more than half the population, it is £132,603, that is to say, some thousands more than three times the amount. And it must be remembered that in 1848 the country had only just emerged from a period of famine and great distress. The distress was so great in 1847 that the House had to give a Supplementary Estimate, and I believe there was also a Grant in Aid voted. The salaries voted to these officials are far beyond anything they would obtain in ordinary civil life. I find that the Inspectors have £500 a year, which rises after five years to £700, and comes under the general Vote of salaries and wages. The auditors draw a large amount, not only for salaries but for travelling.

THE CHAIRMAN: An Amendment has been moved to item "A." The hon. Member must confine himself to that item. He cannot deal with the others.

MR. BLANE: We are dealing with the question of salaries and wages. Well, I must say it appears to me we are voting two-thirds as much in salaries as we ought to according to the population. I think the official charges should have some relation to the number of population, because when increased burdens come and have to be borne by a smaller number of people they press with great severity on the poor. They do not press on the landed class, but on the humbler classes, who are getting every year less able to bear them. Although we are a richer people than we were, it must not be forgotten that there is not that equal distribution of wealth which some of us are endeavouring to bring about. There is a great deal of distress amongst the people, and the poor have to pay these large salaries and expenses out of every smoke of tobacco they take and every glass of beer or cup of tea, coffee, or cocoa they drink. If we devoted this money to bettering the condition of things, so far as the poor people in the workhouses are concerned, I should not complain; but we do not. It goes to what are called the loyal minority. We hear a great deal about the loyalty of these people, but we find that out of almost every Vote that comes up they get something for their loyalty. You never find salaries and allowances getting less. They are an ever-increasing quantity. We are asked to vote more than we did last year or the previous year; in fact, ever since 1848 the demand has been increasing, and I must protest against this enormous sum being voted in the shape of salary for men who, if they were thrown on their own resources in any other country, would find it difficult to make a living.

(9.13.) MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I desire to call attention to a case of peculiar hardship. It is this: Mr. Peter Keogh, a gentleman for some years a Guardian of the Ballinasloe Union, and a Juror of the County of Roscommon, and who had experience of the management of large numbers of workmen, having been appointed to the mastership of the Athlone Workhouse, the Local Government Board refused to sanction the appointment. How far they were legally entitled to do so may be hereafter tested; but the grounds on which they base their refusal are, first, that Mr. Keogh was twice convicted, and, second, that he has had no official experience. With regard to the convictions, I may inform the Committee that one of them was on account of an alleged assault on the occasion of his eviction from his farm for a rack rent, sought to be levied on improvements which were the result of his labour and expenditure. The other was a conviction without the right of appeal, for having been amongst a crowd at Ballinasloe Railway Station when cheers were given for some Coercion Act prisoners who were passing. Convictions such as these are not now regarded in either country as affecting a man's moral character. With regard to the charge of inexperience, I think that the Guardians who know Mr. Keogh personally, and are aware of his intelligence and capabilities for the office, are better judges of his qualification than the members of the Local Government Board. Full acquaintance with all the duties of office is not always deemed essential in Ireland, otherwise the Vice President of the Local Government Board would not hold that position. But the real reason for the refusal is that Mr. Keogh was appointed by a popular Board, at the meetings of which the landlord section only attend when some job is to be carried. Failing success there they resorted to private intriguing with the Authorities in Dublin to carry out their views. Complaints are sometimes made of the conduct of Boards of Guardians, and it is said that their suspension ought to be justified on account of their manner of conducting their business, but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to give a single instance in which in Ireland such language or such conduct has occurred as the Evening Standard describes as taking place at a London Vestry to-day. It says—

"There were the usual personalities, and scenes of confusion peculiar to this Board, and remarks such as 'You are a liar,' 'You little rascal,' 'You vagabond,' 'You are an unmitigated liar,' &c., were frequent, notwithstanding the energy with which the Chairman (Mr. W. L. Kellaway) wielded his gavel, and shouted for order. The ratepayers' gallery was crowded during the whole of the six hours' meeting, and the people shouted and applauded and joined in the hilarity which some of the wits of the Board created. But the climax was reached about a quarter to 1 o'clock, when Mr. John Ross, after many offensive personalities, said something to upset Mr. George Elcock. The latter gentleman rushed round the table, and excitedly exclaimed, 'You say that again!' Mr. Ross repeated his assertion, and Mr. Elcock struck him a violent blow with his fist in the left eye, which caused an immediate swelling. Mr. Ross retaliated by throwing one of the heavy metal inkstands at the head of his opponent; but this fortunately missed its mark, and did no greater harm than smothering Mr. Elcock in ink, and breaking a piece off the board-room table."

There is a half a column of similar description, and I should like the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to give an instance of a similar disgraceful scene to this described in a London Conservative newspaper having occurred in Ireland. Will the English Local Government Board dare to take notice of this and suppress the Clerkenwell Vestry? Certainly not. A somewhat similar scene occurred at a meeting of the St. Paul's Vestry, Deptford. The Evening Standard says—

"Mr. Smith demanded to be heard, and for a time confusion prevailed, Mr. Smith declaring that last time brute force was used, and challenging any member now to turn him out. Other accounts were passed, the Chairman immediately putting the motion on Mr. Smith rising. Mr. Wheatley protested against 'this indecent way of doing business,' and other members spoke in a similar strain."

No notice will be taken of these proceedings by the English Local Government Board, whilst Irish Guardians are hampered in every possible way in the exercise of their duty. If this is the right hon. Gentleman's idea of conceding Local Government—depriving men who have the confidence of the people, and who best know the wants of their localities and the qualification of their officers of the little power they at present possess—it bodes ill for the success of his remedial policy, and in this instance, at all events, is only likely to result in adding another to the list of suppressed Boards.

(9.22.) DR. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): The right hon. Gentleman shows on most occasions a tendency to do what is right in regard to these matters if he is not hampered by his officials. Unless the right hon. Gentleman will advise the Chief Secretary to give us some undertaking to consider the advisability of restoring the rights of these Local Bodies, I hope my hon. Friend will press the reduction of the Vote. It is a remarkable thing that at the very moment when the Unionist supporters of the right hon. Gentleman are refusing to support his Land Bill unless he will extend a larger measure of local self-government to Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman is suppressing one of the Local Governing Bodies that exist. The right hon. Gentleman defended the suppression of the Dungarvan and the Cork Boards on different grounds. At Dungarvan he said the Guardians would persist in giving a contract for bread to a certain local baker, of whose bread the doctor did not approve. I would like to point out that the baker was a Nationalist baker, while the doctor was a Tory doctor. Although the doctor might have some complaint to make of the bread, I do not think that the fact of a loaf having been too small or not of the desired quality for the time being was sufficient ground for suppressing one of these Local Bodies that administer to the wants of the poor. With regard to the Cork Guardians, there is no doubt that certain controversies arose between members of the Board who hold one political view and members who entertain another, but I think the right hon. Gentleman has shown no good grounds for the suppression of the Board. Of course, it is desirable that Boards of Guardians should keep within the bounds of moderation, but I do not think it will be contended that the Boards of Guardians in Ireland as a whole are not conducted in a better and more efficient manner perhaps than the Boards in this country.

(9.26.) MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): The answer given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) this evening about the refusal of the Local Government Board to sanction the appointment of Mr. Keogh to the mastership of Athlone Union was, I think, the most extraordinary answer ever given in this House. We were told that that gentleman had not previous official knowledge. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to name for me three unions in Ireland the masters of which had official knowledge before they were appointed. The practice is to elect a man who is new to official life. The real reason why the appointment was not sanctioned was that Mr. Keogh had been convicted of an assault, or, in other words, of having defended his home when he was being evicted on account of his incapacity to pay the exorbitant rent which had been for many years wrung out of him. His case was a case of desperation, and he defended his home as any good man would do and ought to do. Mr. Keogh is a Nationalist, like many others in Ireland, he has kept the green flag flying in spite of all difficulties, and it is because he does not belong to the class of crawlers who are Nationalists one day and who go over to the Government the next day when their own interests are at stake that the appointment was not sanctioned. If he had been rowdy and a man of no character, but a supporter of the Government, there would have been no difficulty. A year ago a man named Hewett was summoned for threatening to blow the contents of a revolver into a man and violently assaulting him, but because he happened to be an emergency man he was let off with the slight fine of 27s., and he is now an officer in Queens-town. The rowdy of a year ago is now the guardian of the peace in Queens-town. Mr. Keogh, the Nationalist, because he defended his home, is not to get any appointment. This shows that the trail of the serpent is over every office and department in Ireland. Every office is given to men of one faction, and every man who is a political opponent is sure to meet with opposition at every point. It is said that Mr. Keogh is lacking in official knowledge. What official knowledge did the Vice President of the Local Government Board possess when he was appointed to Office? Mr. Keogh is a man of education, a man of capacity, and a man of wide experience in public affairs. We do not intend to let this question drop until we receive a satisfactory assurance, and I think it will be better for the Government to promise that the refusal to sanction the appointment on such paltry and miserable grounds will be re-considered.

(9.37.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I feel bound to challenge the statements of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary with regard to the grounds of suspension of Local Boards of Guardians. I know nothing of the facts except from what I have heard; but I maintain that the Chief Secretary's case for the suspension of the Cork Board of Guardians is not sufficient. I know perfectly well that the Irish Poor Law is not like the English Poor Law. It has always been a harsher Poor Law, and has always been administered in a harsher spirit. Allowing for that historic difference, surely the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to deny that the extreme power of suppression ought to be charily exercised, and only exercised upon a clear and indisputable case. I say that the right hon. Gentleman's case was not clear. The right hon. Gentleman made the significant and important admission that Boards of Guardians were perfectly justified if they chose to occupy a part of their time in passing political resolutions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. What I said was, that members of Boards of Guardians who happen to hold particular views can, if they choose—for nobody would interfere at all—after the Board meeting is over, pass any resolutions they like.

MR. STANSFELD: I was about to make precisely that statement, so that the right hon. Gentleman's interruption was uncalled for. The right hon. Gentleman admits that Boards of Guardians have this right; only he says it is a question of time and opportunity. According to the right hon. Gentleman, if the Cork Board of Guardians had attended to their Poor Law business first, and passed their resolutions at the end of the business meeting, he would have had no fault to find, or, at any rate, would have taken no action.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not so.

MR. STANSFELD: Then I do not understand what the right hon. Gentleman means. He said in the most distinct way that their fault was that they passed these resolutions at the beginning and not at the end of the meeting. I say that is no justification for the action the Chief Secretary took. It is conceivable that by passing these resolutions at the beginning of the meetings they might interrupt business, but the right hon. Gentleman made no such statement. Is it an efficient defence to say that a resolution was passed at the beginning instead of the end of a sitting? Should not the right hon. Gentleman have followed up that statement by a demonstration that the Poor Law had suffered? I do not wonder that he did not put it much higher, because time was when the right hon. Gentleman's friends constituted the majority on these Boards of Guardians and passed political resolutions, and I have never yet heard that they were suspended for passing such resolutions either at the beginning or end of the proceedings of the Board. The power of suppression is an evil power, a power which in this country we should not dream of exercising under any conceivable circumstances. It is incumbent on the right hon. Gentleman to give full and exhaustive answers to Irish complaints. The President of the English Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) would not have ventured to address to this House such an argument as we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour). It is because it is an Irish grievance that the right hon. Gentleman, in his accustomed manner, has thought right to treat it with cynical indifference. Having known something about the administration of the Poor Law, I say he is bound to show that the case was extreme or he cannot justify the application of so severe and stringent a power. He is bound to show that the business of the meeting was not fulfilled and that the poor suffered in consequence of the non-fulfilment of the duties of the Board. I invite the right hon. Gentleman to complete an explanation which, I say, as it stands, is utterly incomplete and unsatisfactory.

(9.43.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman may have known something at one time of the administration of the Poor Law, but I think he must have forgotten it. The right hon. Gentleman appears to think that such proceedings as those of the Cork Board of Guardians would be tolerated in England. I venture to think that they would not be tolerated here. The right hon. Gentleman appears to suppose that the action of the Local Government Board in suppressing the Board of Guardians was sudden, arbitrary, and unexpected. There never was such a mistake made.

MR. STANSFELD: I did not say anything of the kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman had listened to my speech—

MR. STANSFELD: I listened to every word of it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will put it in this way. If I had been able to convey my meaning to the right hon. Gentleman, he would have seen how entirely uncalled for were some of the heated observations he has made. The Local Government Board addressed a remonstrance to the Guardians for an infraction of the recognised rules of the Local Government Board as early as January 18, 1888.

DR. TANNER: May I ask the Chief Secretary whether it is not the fact that all the remonstrances were in respect of the same rule?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not question the force of the observation of the hon. Gentleman. But as early as 18th January, 1888, the Local Government Board addressed a letter of remonstrance to the Cork Board for an infraction of the regulations. The remonstrance was repeated on November 14, 1888, and it was again repeated on August 7, 1889. On that occasion the Local Government Board wrote pointing out that such conduct as the disorderly opposition to the ruling of the Chairman, and adjourning the meeting, leaving much important business undone, was of such a kind that, unless the Board of Guardians proceeded to discharge their duties, the Local Government Board would be compelled to dissolve them. Again, on October 2, 1889, the Local Government Board addressed the Guardians on the continued disregard of the order regulating their proceedings, and addressed a final warning, in which they stated that if the Guardians continued to leave undischarged the important functions entrusted to them, the Local Government Board would feel themselves compelled to relieve the Guardians of the duties which they appeared to be unable or unwilling to fulfil according to the regulations governing their proceedings. In 1890 occurred the scenes I have referred to. On three separate occasions the Board of Guardians deliberately put off their business in order to pass political and personal resolutions which had no reference whatever to the duties they were called upon to perform.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): What were those resolutions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman—

MR. J. O'CONNOR: What were the resolutions?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman seems to regard that as a matter of small importance. It is not a matter of small importance.

MR. STANSFELD: The right hon. Gentleman must not misrepresent me. I believe I spoke clearly and distinctly. My case was that the right hon. Gentleman had not condescended to give an explanation of the circumstances. The only statement he made was that the Board of Guardians had passed resolutions at the beginning of the meeting.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has given an inaccurate version of my speech. I expressed myself in language which might have been intelligible even to him.

DR. TANNER: I rise to order. I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in order in making such a statement as that?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to use such language, though I think it is unusual. I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax that if he had heard the first speech of the Chief Secretary I think the misunderstanding would not have arisen.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely agree with your ruling, Sir. The circumstance which perhaps made me speak with a little heat is now entirely explained. It now appears that the right hon. Gentleman did not hear my remarks, but notwithstanding that he comes forward and attacks me for having given no explanation, the right hon. Gentleman did not take the trouble to be in his place to hear my explanation.

MR. STANSFELD: I beg pardon; I did hear his speech in reply to an hon. Member behind me, and I assumed that that reply was intended as an explanation to the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am responsible in this matter. I thought that the right hon. Gentleman had not heard the first speech which contained the explanation of the absence of which he complains.

MR. STANSFELD: I certainly did not hear that statement. I only heard the statement to which I refer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will not again complain of my not having given the Committee an adequate account of the transaction. I explained to the Committee the circumstances which occurred in 1889. It is not necessary to meet the explanation. Suffice it to say that on three separate occasions the Board of Guardians broke through the regulations laid down for the conduct of business by the Local Government Board, and that this was followed by a final warning; and, in my opinion, neither the Presidents of the Local Government Boards in England or in Ireland could possibly have left unnoticed and undealt with so grave and deliberate an infraction of the rules laid down for the transaction of Poor Law business in every Union in the country.

(9.52.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: The language the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to address to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), who occupied the important post of President of the Local Government Board before the Chief Secretary had a seat in this House, was unworthy of the Chief Secretary. The Chief Secretary said the Cork Board of Guardians was suppressed because it passed political and personal resolutions, but he left the Committee entirely in ignorance as to what the nature of the resolutions was. From time to time the Cork Guardians received warnings because they passed resolutions condemnatory of evictions. What subject was more suitable for Guardians to deal with? Is it not provided by laws passed by this House that it is necessary for landlords, the friends of the right hon. Gentleman, to send notice to the Board of Guardians to provide space in the workhouse for evicted tenants? I think it is, therefore, quite within the right of the Guardians to condemn by resolution a course of conduct which places burdens upon their shoulders.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman does not appreciate the force of my observations. What I said was that those members of the Board who took a particular view of any subject were at perfect liberty to stay after business hours and pass resolutions, but to pass resolutions with regard to a particular suit brought against the Member for Cork at the beginning of business, thereby preventing the public business of the Union from being transacted, was contrary to the regulations of the Local Government Board.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I will come to that in a moment. Such, I say, was the nature of the resolutions passed by the Board of Guardians in 1888 and 1889. But the Local Government Board did not act on those resolutions, but they acted upon a personal resolution. The Cork Guardians passed a resolution congratulating a certain gentleman upon his recovery from a serious illness, and shortly afterwards the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), acting upon the precedent established by the friends of the right hon. Gentleman, proposed a resolution of confidence in his chief and leader (Mr. Parnell). I maintain that that was a very proper resolution to pass. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) has impressed his personality upon the legislation of this House, affecting Poor Law Guardians in Ireland. The character of the hon. Gentleman was attacked, and thereupon the Cork Guardians expressed their confidence in the hon. Member. There was no dissolution of the Board two or three years ago when they passed resolutions both before, during, and after the legitimate business of the Board. And why? Because the Guardians were presided over by a Nationalist. Last year and this year the Board has been presided over by a friend of the right hon. Gentleman, and he has declined to receive resolutions, hence the difficulty. The Chairman has been incited to this course of conduct by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman made a speech in the Antient Concert Rooms in Dublin, in which he incited— Ah! he is going away now. He flies! He made a speech on that occasion last year, and it has been adverted to by my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo as the only occasion upon which the right hon. Gentleman addressed a meeting of Irishmen, or of people who call themselves Irish when it suits them. This, the only meeting he has addressed in Ireland, was held with closed doors, and those who attended it took care that their names did not appear in the public Press. To this meeting the right hon. Gentleman addressed himself, and among other things he advised those who were Chairmen of Poor Law Boards, and of the same way of thinking as himself, not to accept these resolutions. Therefore, I say he incited to a precipitation of these difficulties. Naturally, the elected Guardians on the Cork Board insisted upon having the resolution considered. The ex officio Guardians left the room with their Chairman, the hon. Member for South Hunts, I suppose, leading them. The Nationalist Guardians put their own Chairman in the chair, and conducted the rest of the business with satisfaction to themselves, the rate-payers, and the poor, for whom they had to provide. This was how the present state of things was brought about, and the action of suppressing the Board was because the resolution was of a character obnoxious to the Government. My hon. Friend, when the right hon. Gentleman alluded to this, said a resolution had been passed congratulating a Conservative Member of the Board upon his return to health and his duties, and then the right hon. Gentleman said that was an additional reason why they ought to be suppressed. Now, surely the right hon. Gentleman was not serious when he made such an observation as that. Does he think he can impose upon our intelligence as an additional reason for suppression the fact that the Board passed a resolution congratulating a Conservative Member of the Board who had been seriously ill, and who is highly respected by every member of the Board? Well, so much for the Cork Board of Guardians. I turn to another matter I desire to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman in connection with this Vote. The Local Government Board are constantly engaged in the interesting process of boycotting the National Press of Ireland. In and out of the House we hear the Chief Secretary stigmatise boycotting as a criminal conspiracy, but the Boards under the control of the right hon. Gentleman are engaged every day in boycotting the National Press in Ireland. A circular has been sent out by one of these Boards to the effect that only that portion of the Press which is friendly to the Government in Ireland should receive official advertisements. At the present moment the Cork Daily Herald and the Cork Examiner, the two Nationalist papers which circulate not only throughout the County of Cork, but throughout the whole Province of Munster, receive not a single advertisement from the Local Government Board. These advertisements are all sent to the Cork Constitution, which has a limited circulation among the few friends of the hon. Member for South Hunts. The Cork National Press is absolutely boycotted. The Members of the Boards, with the Chief Secretary at their head, have entered into a criminal conspiracy to boycott the Cork Herald and the Cork Examiner. This ought to discount a great deal the effect of those denunciations we hear from the right hon. Gentleman when he stands at that

Table, and with those dialectical flourishes for which he is so remarkable declaims against everybody for indulging in boycotting. Again, the Nationalist newspaper in Carlow, having the largest circulation in that county, has been deprived of these advertisements. The editor has written to the secretaries of these Boards, pointing out the injustice to which his newspaper has been subjected, but he has got no satisfactory answer. He has been told, indeed, that he has been sent to gaol, but I should have thought that the offence of the editor had been expiated by a two months' imprisonment, but that is not so in the view of the Local Government Board and the Government of Ireland. Although he has rested his weary frame on the plank bed, has partaken of the fare of the convict, and worn the convict dress, when he comes out again to pursue his avocations he is followed with punishment into his private life by that system of boycotting which the right hon. Gentleman meets elsewhere with "shadowing" and vigorous denunciation. These things lead us to the belief that the Local Government Board is actuated by that animus which exists in the mind of the Chief Secretary. I should have thought that the Local Government Board would have acted in a fair spirit towards the Local Poor Law Boards. It is many years ago since the Act was passed calling into existence Boards of Guardians in Ireland, and the people were called upon to exercise rights previously suppressed, the people of Ireland being hopelessly subject to penal laws. Without any previous training in the science of local administration the people were called upon to exercise their powers, and yet from the day they were called into existence until now these Boards have conducted their business so well that in one instance only had the Controlling Board found it necessary to exercise its authority and suppress a Board for dereliction of duty, and I may mention that in that one instance business was conducted almost entirely by ex officio members. This is a highly creditable state of things, such as would do credit to a more favoured country. Through all these years the people have done their business thoroughly well, and there was no friction until, through stress of political circumstances, the people were obliged to use their Poor Law Boards for the exercise of their undoubted right in the expression of their political opinions, or, at all events, those opinions that bore upon the maintenance of the poor in Ireland. We notice that this question first arose on the very inception of the National movement, under a former Government, when an attempt was made to prevent doctors holding positions under the Poor Law Board from taking their natural place among the people in their popular agitation. In all such cases the people stood by the doctors, and, in deference to popular opinion, doctors who were deprived of their positions were reinstated. Now we find another course is being pursued. We found a year or two ago a Wexford Board of Guardians was suppressed because they made special provision for the relief of evicted tenants, and now these Cork Guardians have been suppressed because they passed resolutions of a quasi-political character, which, undoubtedly, had a bearing on the maintenance of the provision for the poor. Unfortunately, the Local Boards are under the authority of the Board presided over by the right hon. Gentleman, and his animus and his spirit prevails on the Board, and so we see that, without sufficient cause, this great principle of representative local administration is destroyed, for the purpose of giving vent to the expression of political acrimony which distinguishes the Chief Secretary.

(10.15.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (South Tyrone): I may be allowed to ask the Chief Secretary one question, and that is, whether, while the members of the Cork Board of Guardians were passing political and personal resolutions, the rates were to a great extent uncollected, and the balance at the bank was against them; and whether, since the Vice Guardians were appointed, the condition of affairs has improved?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I believe the administration of the Union has greatly improved.

(10.16.) COLONEL NOLAN: The observation of the hon. Member is calculated to convey a false impression. It is a notorious fact that throughout the Unions in the South and West it is a very common thing for the accounts of the Guardians at the banks to be overdrawn in January, for the simple reason that the rates are not collected until later. I know this is the case of Tuam, which is a well-managed Union. It is a well recognised habit for bankers to allow accounts to be overdrawn until after the fairs are held, when rates are paid in and there is a large balance to the credit of the Guardians. It is simply a matter of arrangement, and there is nothing exceptional in the fact that the account of the Cork Guardians was overdrawn.

(10.17.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: Upon the answer which has just been given, may I ask is it not a fact that the paid Guardians do not give that attention to outdoor relief which occupied much of the time of the elected Guardians, week by week, as they revised the list of the recipients of this form of relief, relieving the charge upon the rates by this part of a well recognised and enlightened system of Poor Law administration?

(10.17.) MR. DILLON: Does the hon. Member for South Tyrone mean to convey, by his question, or insinuate, that it is any part of the duty of Guardians to go out and collect rates from the ratepayers?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I intended to convey nothing of the kind, but I do say they would have been better occupied in seeing that the business of the Union was done than in passing resolutions about the O'Shea Divorce case.

MR. DILLON: But the hon. Member did not speak of the business of the Union; he spoke of the collection of rates, not of business to be done around the Board table. I have never been a member of a Board of Guardians, but I have always understood that the business of collecting rates is the work of collectors, who are bound to collect the money under penalties, and it is nothing to do with the business of the Board meetings. But, however that may be, any neglect is equally attributable to the majority on the Board, the Conservative and nominated members. The fact is, a shameful, scandalous animus underlies the action of the Local Government Board. The Cork Guardians committed the unforgiveable sin of passing a resolution in favour of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork. They might have passed resolutions by the score on other subjects. These are the only constituted Representative Bodies we have except Town Councils; they are the only representative Rural Bodies, and do you lay down the principle that they are not to be allowed to give expression to the feelings of the people? The right hon. Gentleman plainly showed what was the real cause of the suppression. Not because they neglected business, because he did not attempt to prove to the Committee that there had been any such neglect; the reason was because the Guardians passed a resolution of confidence in the hon. Member for Cork.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I stated precisely the reverse.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman say that the Board neglected business?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes.

MR. DILLON: We have it from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) that they did not leave the Board-room until they had concluded all the business of the meeting. My hon. Friend says, and he was present, that the whole of the business was finished before they separated, and we want something more than a bare ipse dixit on the other side. If they did not conclude the business, what part of it was left undone? Further, the right hon. Gentleman says the proposing of the resolution led to waste of time. Why? Was it the fault of the Guardians who introduced it? Nothing of the sort. It was because of the unreasonable and outrageously partisan conduct of the Chairman, who obstructed the introduction of the resolution, although he had allowed a resolution in reference to one of his own party—his son-in-law I am told—to be passed without protest and with approval. This was done in a few minutes, but when a resolution was introduced in favour of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork the Chairman obstructed the resolution, the Tory members of the Board made a disturbance, and so the time of the Board was wasted. I protest against the waste of time being charged against the Nationalist Guardians. I say that the members of this Board of Guardians were entitled to pass this resolution, although it did not form part of their particular business. You cannot, by a hard and fast rule, utterly gag the people of Ireland. If you will not give them Local Government it is absurd to say the mouths of Guardians shall be shut, and that they shall not, provided they attend to business, express the opinion of those they represent on public matters of the time. If there was neglect of business, there was sufficient reason for suppression, and there was no reason to refer to the resolution; but as no neglect of business is shown, we may fairly assume that the resolution was the cause of suppression. We are entitled to have the specific grounds upon which the Board was suspended. If the right hon. Gentleman has details of the business, as his answer to the hon. Member for South Tyrone would seem to indicate, we are entitled to have this information. I do not suppose he has the same conception of the duty of Boards of Guardians as the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that it includes interference with the business of rate collectors. The hon. Member has left his seat; I was going to ask him if he had paid his own rates, for I know it is not at all an unusual thing, even in Dublin, to defer the payment of our rates until the autumn, but we do not live in fear of our furniture being seized for arrears.

(10.25.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I need not again go over the grounds upon which I defended the action of the Local Government Board, but the hon. Member has asked me a specific question, to which I will endeavour to give him a reply. The business left undone by the Cork Board of Guardians on January 9, was the consideration of the Report of the Engineer with reference to the Blarney water supply; a question as to labourers' cottages; the Report of the medical officer with reference to the defaulters under the Vaccination Act; the consideration of a communication from the Local Government Board as to statistics of relief and the salary of one of the officers; and other matters. The business left undone on January 16 included the consideration of a Motion of which notice had been given by the Chairman, in reference to out-door relief, and the Report on the water supply. This is the specific information I have at my disposal.

(10.25.) DR. TANNER: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question at all. He has not told us what business was left undone on the occasion when the Tory members, led by the hon. Member for South Hunts, the absentee landlord, effected a strategic retreat to the County Club. We put the Mayor in the Chair, and we finished all the business before us; we left none undone; we finished all arrears of business that had accumulated. Some Members of this Committee may not understand that frequently there are before the Board, and especially in large Unions like Cork, debateable matters, such as the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to, the Blarney Water Supply, that have to be referred again to officers or to Committees. It would have been unwise and unfair if we had taken advantage of the absence of the Tory members to settle a matter still under debate. We did not wish to copy their bad example; we desired to act squarely and above board; we hit straight, and not under the belt, when necessity arises.

(10.27.) COLONEL NOLAN: Those who are familiar with the business before Boards of Guardians know that there are subjects with which some members of the Board are better able to give advice than others, and, especially in regard to such matters as building and engineering, it is the habit to postpone a settlement in the absence of members whose technical information may be of value. Two of the matters mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman come within this category, labourers' cottages and water supply, and the settlement of such building and engineering questions is not infrequently postponed by every Board. As to vaccination cases, these are always put off. There will probably be a large number of cases as to which it is open to the Guardians to prosecute, but it would be most injudicious to proceed at once. Decision is advisedly postponed, and the result usually is that the list of persons who have failed to comply with the Act is largely reduced, and you are saved the irritation and expense that would be entailed if the Guardians acted up to the very letter of their powers. These are matters outside the necessary financial and routine work connected with the administration of the Poor Law, and I do not think there is much difference in the administration of Poor Law Boards in Ireland to that in England.

(10.30.) Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork City): There can be no doubt that the Government have been guilty of gross unfairness in the treatment they have meted out to the Cork Board of Guardians for having passed resolutions of a political character. The real question is whether the Cork Guardians did their business in an efficient manner. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary contend that it is entirely beyond the competence of a Board of Guardians to pass resolutions in regard to political topics? If he is of that opinion, I am not, and I would remind the Committee that it is not so very long ago when the right hon. Gentleman himself sent a letter to a Board of Guardians thanking them for a resolution they had passed in favour of his own Land Purchase Bill. That is an incident which occurred within the last six months. So that we are in this position, that the right hon. Gentleman thinks it necessary to suppress one Board of Guardians for having, as has been stated, neglected its duty in regard to the collection of rates, and for having, at the same time, passed resolutions of a political character in defiance of the Local Government Board, while, on the other hand, when another Board of Guardians passes a resolution expressing approval of the right hon. Gentleman's Land Purchase Bill, so far from suppressing that body he, as head of the Local Government Board of Ireland, actually sends that body a letter of thanks. In point of fact, he did not even allow the letter to be written by his private secretary, but the document approving the action of that particular Board of Guardians was written in his own fine Roman hand. I ask the Committee, and I also ask the right hon. Gentleman, how can he reconcile the action involved in the despatch of such a letter, with that which he took in directing the suppression of the Cork Board of Guardians, which had also thought it right to pass political resolutions, but which had taken a totally different view of the political situation from that of the other body. The real difficulty in regard to that Board arose from the obstruction originated by the right hon. Gentleman's own political friends. Of all the acts which have helped to heap opprobrium on the name of the right hon. Gentleman, there is, I think, none that can be regarded as worse than his suppression of the Cork Board of Guardians, whereby the people of that locality are deprived of their legitimate local representation.

*(10.36.) Mr. SMITH-BARRY (Huntingdon, S.): I can state, as a member of the Cork Board of Guardians, that great surprise was felt at the fact that that body was not dissolved long before. The majority of that Board persistently, day after day, defied and defeated the ruling of the Chairman and the directions of the Local Government Board, which have been instanced by the right hon. Gentleman, and into the details of which I do not now propose to go. It is, therefore, perfectly untrue and inconsistent with the facts of the case to say that the difficulty was occasioned by the obstruction of the Tory members of the Board. The ex officio and Conservative members of the Board used to go down for the purpose of doing the business of the Board, and whenever those members were in a majority, the business of the Board was done; but, on the other hand, whenever it was found that they were in a minority, obstruction went on, extraneous matters were introduced, the interests of the Union were neglected, the Conservative members found it necessary to withdraw, after the Chairman left the chair, and the meeting became a perfect bear garden. The result was, that it was utterly impossible to carry on the real business of the Board, and the ratepayers had to complain of the neglect of their interests. Now, however, under the new system, the rates are being reduced, the business of the Union is being efficiently conducted, and I have no hesitation in stating that, in the opinion of the majority of the ratepayers, and also of the Guardians, it was a great relief when the Board was dissolved.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I desire to say, in reference to the non-appointment of Mr. Keogh, that I assume the reason is that he is a Nationalist, and the Chief Secretary has done his best to ruin him by driving him from his house and home, and now refuses to allow the Guardians to give him an appointment for which he is well qualified.

(10.40.) MR. CLANCY: We have just had from the hon. Member for South Hunts a very characteristic speech. I think if anything were wanted to show why the hon. Gentleman could not live comfortably in Ireland, and has been obliged to remove to England, it is to be found in the remarks he has just made. The most detestable character in Irish history is the anti-Irish Irishman, and more than once the hon. Gentleman has illustrated that character in this House. Whenever anyone is wanted in this House to throw dirt on Ireland, we may reckon with confidence on the assistance of the hon. Member for South Hunts. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of the opinions of the ratepayers of the Cork Union with regard to the action of the Cork Guardians. I should like to know what body of ratepayers the hon. Member represents in the Cork Union. The hon. Gentleman does not represent any portion of the ratepayers, and is obliged to fall back on his ex officio qualification, and even in that capacity he has been an absentee for the last two or three years. I have only risen to point out the character of the hon. Member's speech, and that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone, in regard to which I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary on the support or defence he has received to-night from his two jackals.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Member is in order in the remarks he is making?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think it would be better conducive to the conduct of business if the hon. Member would adopt a more moderate tone.

*LORD DUNSANY (Gloucester, Thornbury): I also rise to order; and I desire to ask you, Sir, whether it is in order for the hon. Member to characterise Members on this side of the House as jackals?

MR. CLANCY: I only referred to one hon. Member sitting on that side of the House. This is a more important matter than many people think. It is a question whether the representative system in Ireland is to be extinguished by an irresponsible Chief Secretary. The question is whether these Boards of Guardians are to be suppressed on the merest pretext or no pretext at all. The right hon. Gentleman has not pretended to answer the question whether the business has been left undone by the Board of Guardians. He gave an account of the business left undone on certain occasions, but he did not give a single instance of business left undone on the occasions when the Guardians were present. All the business was completed before the Board separated, and I think we are entitled to an answer from the right hon. Gentleman.

*(10.45.) MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I think what my hon. Friend has said is sufficient to explode the pretext of the right hon. Gentleman for suppressing the Board. I happen to have been Member of a Board of Guardians for 10 or 12 years, and on several occasions we could not get three members together to form a quorum. The consequence is that no business whatever was done, and I would like to know why we never heard any complaint from the Chief Secretary. It is idle for the Chief Secretary to say that the Local Government Board did not approve of Mr. Keogh's appointment, because he had not sufficient legal knowledge. Three months ago, a similar appointment was made by the Board of which I am a member. There were several candidates, and the successful one had never in his whole life occupied any position of the sort. He admitted that he had never kept books, and that he knew nothing whatever about the office for which he had become a candidate. I have no hesitation in saying that Keogh was refused, not because he was inefficient, but because he was an evicted tenant. At the head of the Local Government Board in Dublin is Mr. George Morris, who at one time happened to be agent on the property from which Keogh was evicted. Mr. Morris, in order to carry out the vindictiveness of his former master, refused Keogh the appointment. That is the real reason why he was refused. It is an extraordinary thing that no man in Ireland has the slightest chance of an appointment who has been imprisoned under the direction of the right hon. Gentleman. On a recent occasion we gave an appointment to a gentleman capable of filling any position. He is Chairman of the Loughrea Town Commissioners. The appointment was a small one, that of Registrar. The Local Government Board refused to sanction it because the newly-appointed Registrar had been in prison under the direction of the right hon. Gentleman. No later than this very evening, I have received notice that the appointment of rate-collector in my parish will be filled up to-morrow.

About three weeks ago it was filled up, but the man, like Mr. Keogh and Mr. Sweeny, had been in prison, but the people honoured him, and the majority of the Board thought him best qualified for the position. Mr. Courtney, if I ceased to be a Member to-morrow, and applied for the rate-collectorship, which is only worth some £20 or £30 a year, my appointment would not be sanctioned by the Local Government Board. I would be told that I could not occupy that position because I had been in prison. That is the system which we object to in Ireland, and I think you will admit that we ought to resist it by every means in our power, and we are determined to resist it. I next come to the case of Mr. Timothy Clarke, of the Portumna Board. I brought the case before the House on a previous occasion. I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether Mr. Clarke was undergoing three months' imprisonment in consequence of having signed the Relieving Officer's book for relief to evicted tenants. You are aware that the law provides that evicted tenants shall be relieved for the four weeks immediately after their eviction. Mr. Clarke, acting in his capacity of Guardian, and in accordance with the rule, relieved these evicted tenants, with the result that the Local Government Board sent down an officer, and when auditing the books, he objected to every item of relief given to the tenants evicted from the Clanricarde Estate. The case of Mr. Ayre, a landlord, is different from that of Mr. Clark; but at the very time Mr. Ayre was proceeded against, another member of the Board, Mr. Timothy Kirwan, was proceeded against, and allowed to go scot free. They ceased to be members of the Board, as they were suspended by the right hon. Gentleman, not because they did not do their duty as guardians, but because they refused to allow the evicted tenants of Clanricarde to starve. The right hon. Gentleman then sent down two of his friends to do the duty at a salary of £500.

(11.0.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks it possible that any succeeding Liberal Administration will go on as this Government have proceeded? Does he think the officials of the Local Government Board will act under a Liberal Government as they have done under his rule? The right hon. Gentleman may assert that it is impossible for any civilised country to be governed in a different manner; he speaks as if his system of law and order were like the car of Juggernaut. But may I suggest it is astounding how easily that great car of law and order is shunted into a siding when it suits his purposes. Suppose that under the next Liberal Administration it should occur that a member of a Board of Guardians gets up and proposes a vote of confidence in the hon. Member for Cork, does he think it probable that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle will issue an Order the next morning suppressing that Board? It is not at all likely that such a thing would occur. The hon. Member for South Hunts has had the audacity to state that the people of Cork rejoiced at the dissolution of their own Board, because it had passed a resolution of confidence in their own local Member. I think it would be well for the hon. Member to be a little more modest in his ambition to have his name associated with the people of Cork. He is not entitled to speak for the ratepayers of Cork. Why, he would not be elected as a porter in the workhouse. That the people who elected the Member of Parliament, in whom the vote of confidence was passed, should rejoice that their Board was dissolved for passing this vote of confidence is rather too strong even for a Primrose League meeting in South Hunts. If the House of Commons was entitled to put on record its hatred for the Member for Cork, instead of attending to its business of voting Supply, why should not the Cork Board of Guardians, at exactly the same time, pass a resolution in a contrary sense, and declare their confidence in Mr. Parnell? It is a pity the House of Commons does not set a better example. If the hon. Member for Cork had not been so atrociously attacked by gentlemen connected with the Times newspaper, and by Mr. Pigott, it might be that the House of Commons would now be pursuing the even tenour of its way. But when the House of Commons declares itself to be entitled to enter upon its record such a Report as that of the Parnell Commission Judges, is it a wonder the Cork Board should feel itself justified in declaring its own opinion on the matter, which so seriously affected its own Representative in this House? Remember that this is the largest Board of Guardians in Ireland, and yet for simply passing a vote of confidence you suppress it, and appoint three paid Guardians to do the work of the Board, at the cost of £1,000 a year. The Irish Government ought to have some sense of proportion, because I maintain that a grosser case of absurdity has never been perpetrated, even by the Irish Local Government Board. I observed a case the other day in which an English School Board sat up all night, assisted by wine and sausages, in order to settle who should be chairman, but after sitting about a day and a half the question was settled by tossing, or some other British method of settling difficulties. Were they dissolved? Then there was the Metropolitan Board of Works, a spectacle for gods and men during many years. The Chief Secretary should remember that Irishmen have not received the training which has belonged to English Municipal Bodies since the days of Queen Elizabeth. What we object to is this irritating system of harassing Local Bodies all over Ireland. Let me give an illustration of this policy. For instance, the Local Government Board refused to sanction the appointment of Mr. Keogh as the master of the Athlone Workhouse simply because this man happened to be an evicted tenant, who, on the occasion of his eviction, was alleged to have committed a trifling assault on a policeman and to have resisted the Sheriff. But contrasted this with the action of the Government in the case of another man named Hewett, who was convicted of a most violent assault in the County Kildare, and who yet was considered a fit and proper person to be appointed as a member of the Dublin Police Force. This irritating policy must be abandoned. It must no longer be the case that a policeman who fires a revolver shall escape scot free, while a Nationalist who commits a petty assault is to be pounced upon. And now I desire to say a few words with regard to the question of labourers' cottages and the action of the Privy Council. The Inspectors of the Privy Council are doing their best to prevent the Labourers' Act working successfully. I trust something will be done to meet the difficulties that have arisen.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled on this Vote to condemn the action of the Privy Council.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But I want something done to ensure that proper homes shall be provided for these miserable roofless families, and I would urge that the Local Government Board Inspectors should do all they can to promote schemes framed by Boards of Guardians under the Labourers' Act. The Local Government Board Inspectors are honestly endeavouring to do something for the poor people under the Labourers' Acts, but they are obstructed in their duty in a most heartless way by those above them. One of them, who tried to do his duty, was sent from the South of Ireland to Ulster, where not a single scheme for labourers' cottages has been set on foot. I submit further that if the Local Government Board had any ambition beyond that of suppressing Boards of Guardians, they would do something towards seeing that the Labourers' Act is carried out in Ulster. We sometimes have flash-in-the-pan Motions from the hon. Member for North Antrim to bring forward this matter, and to call attention to the remissness of the Local Government Board in not carrying out the Labourers' Act, but those Motions never get discussed. This is a matter which I submit the Government are bound to take into their consideration. I do not say that we in the province of Ulster have done what we ought to have done, but not one single scheme has been evolved. A scheme was put forward in Antrim, but what happened? The Guardians rejected it. And what did the Local Government Board do when appealed to? Nothing. I say that they would be well advised if in these days they went in for a little less clap trap and a little more administration—the working classes in Ireland would then be a little better off than they are. These poor labourers cannot now get elected. The House may be surprised to hear that the Queen's Bench decided a long time ago that a landlord in Ireland might cast 36 votes. What chance has a poor unfortunate labourer of getting elected as a Poor Law Guardian when he has but one vote? This House requires no qualification for election. If it did, probably some hon. Gentlemen we now see in this House would not be here, especially if it were an educational test. The Guardians in Ireland, so select must they be to deal with questions of outdoor relief and vaccine lymph that a high qualification test is imposed, but I contend, in the interest of the Irish labouring classes, that the Irish Local Government Board ought to exercise the powers that lie in them, and reduce the qualification. We did pass in this House an Act abolishing the qualification, but as soon as it got into "another place," that illustrious Assembly quickly burked the measure. The Local Government Board, however, have power to reduce the qualification, and I call upon them to do it. Let them give labour a chance of representation on the Boards of Guardians. With regard to the Portumna Union, I should like to ask a question as to the ill-treatment of the gentleman to whom reference has been made. Is it not an appalling thing that a man should get three months' imprisonment with hard labour for having signed a cheque in favour of an evicted tenant? He only signed the relieving officer's book, and I am wrong in saying that he signed a cheque. This system of relieving evicted tenants is legal. It seems that on the occasion in question a surplus sum was voted. There was no moral guilt, in fact it appears to have been altogether a mistake. The Board of Guardians had previously been surcharged in connection with similar votes, and so long as a gentleman named Ayre, a Justice of the Peace for the county, was chairman of the Board the Local Government Board did not make him pay a penny. He was a Conservative; he signed the cheques—to his credit be it said that he was willing to vote money for evicted tenants—and no notice was taken of the matter. His successor, however, got three months' imprisonment for doing that which he had done with impunity. When attention is drawn to these different methods of dealing with the same offence, the answer is that Mr. Ayre when he signed the cheques did not know the law. Is that a valid excuse? Surely that is a most extraordinary confession for the party of law and order to make. And is it not an extraordinary thing that the lawyers should be so keen, and their wits should be so sharp when they have to deal with a Nationalist, and that they should be so dull and stupid when dealing with a Conservative. In the case of Mr. Ayre he said he could not find the amount of money he was surcharged, and when it was attempted by the Sheriff's officer to seize his goods a return of nulla bona was made. The Sheriffs are very friendly sometimes. I hope Mr. Ayre will not be dismissed from the Commission of the Peace, and I do not think he will, but if he were a Nationalist I wonder how long he would be allowed to sit in judgment on Her Majesty's subjects. I maintain that what has occurred in this case is a perfect scandal, and I ask the President of the English Local Government Board whether supposing the chairman of the St. Pancras Union had voted cakes and ale for his necessitous friends on the Board or any one else, he would have got three months' imprisonment for it? I say, certainly not, and I therefore ask, why should there be one law in Portumna and another in St. Pancras? Can anyone tell me if there is a single instance extant in England where people who have been surcharged have been sent to gaol for three months? I do not think so, and yet the Party opposite talk so much about sanctity of law and order.

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Another gentleman, Mr. Kerwin, was sent to gaol under similar circumstances for one month, and another, Mr. Clark, who was surcharged £20, had three months' imprisonment, which shows the lovely gradation of guilt which is in the minds of the Irish Magistracy. One gentleman got three months' imprisonment and another one month for the same moral offence. It was not because Mr. Kerwin and Mr. Clark could not pay the money that they were sent to gaol. It was because they would not. The Local Government Board does not pounce upon Mr. Ayre and his predecessors, but it does upon the Nationalists, to whom a vindictive punishment is meted out. Is that the way the Quakers were treated in regard to the tithe question—is that the way the anti-vaccinationists were dealt with in Leicester? When was the Leicester Board of Guardians last dissolved for not carrying out the Vaccination Acts? Is that Board dissolved? Have three paid noodles been sent down to Leicester to preside over the administration of the Poor Law there? You do not treat English Bodies in the way you do the Irish, and yet the latter are supposed to be happy, contented, and loyal. They are supposed to be contented and loyal under a system which tolerates a member of an Irish Board getting three months' hard labour for signing a relieving officer's book, and which at the same time allows a member of the English Board of Guardians to defy the law with impunity. I say such a thing is monstrous. When the Chief Secretary gets up and says—"We have defended the weak against the strong," I ask him, "Did you defend Clark or Kerwin, or Keogh; did you protect the weak in that case?" I say the right hon. Gentleman's assertion is all clap trap and nonsense. The reason I respect the right hon. Gentleman is for his intellectual qualities, and because I know that he never can for a moment believe in his own heart the statements which are put into his mouth by his officials. He thinks those stories are good enough for the Tory Party—and I quite agree with him in that, though I do not think that it takes much intellect to lead the Tory Party, or to convince them upon any point. I most admire the way he can extract cheers from them by his statements about protecting the weak against the strong. His speech yesterday glided gracefully over all the ugly points he had to deal with, and then out came a volume of clap-trap about "protecting the weak against the strong," and "law and order," and he gracefully invited the Conservative majority to act as judges—moving the Closure at the end of all. That is the right hon. Gentleman's Irish policy. I would suggest to him that before he moves the Closure he would be good enough to tell us some of the facts in justification of his conduct in reference to the man Clark, and in reference to Kerwin and Keogh. I would ask him on the analogy of Ayre's treatment, and on the analogy of the action of the English Local Government Board, to defend his policy. This is a question of daily administration, and I ask him for facts and specific information in regard to the cases we have brought before him. I ask him to justify his administration. I ask him to let us know why, because he finds that Mr. Smith-Barry wishes it, the Cork Board of Guardians has been dissolved?

(11.45.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will answer the questions put to me as far as I can. The man who was refused the post of master of a workhouse appears to have had no special qualification, unless being an evicted tenant is a qualification, and he was twice sentenced to imprisonment by the Magistrates.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What are the qualifications necessary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly not having been twice convicted and imprisoned. With regard to the cases of Clark and Ayre, Ayre was surcharged, and it was found impossible to proceed against him under that Act, and the next time another Act was used.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Never against Ayre.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was on account of the experience of Ayre's case that another Act was used in the proceedings against Clark. There was no hard labour, and the sentence of two months' imprisonment was only imposed because the sum of £49 which was surcharged was not paid.

Mr. T. M. Healy

(11.47.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the House believe after that statement that it was on the very same day that Ayre was prosecuted that Kerwin was sent to prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is mistaken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am not mistaken. I was on the same day and before the same Magistrate in the same Court Room that Ayre was allowed to go scot-free and Kerwin was sent to gaol.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said Clark.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will not allow the right hon. Gentleman to sail off on a question of nomenclature. Ayre and Kerwin were summoned on the same day at the same Court, and the right hon. Gentleman says it was because the inadequacy of one Act was discovered that Kerwin was prosecuted under another. Sir, Mr. Disraeli used to say that the man who said he liked dry champagne would say anything, and I say that a Minister who would get up at that Table and make a statement that can be proved at the moment to be utterly unfounded, must be the most shameless Minister that ever disgraced an Administration. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that his language passes the decency of Debate. I must ask him to express some regret; to withdraw the insinuation he has made.

COLONEL NOLAN: He quoted Disraeli.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I had not the good fortune to catch every observation you made, Sir, but I take it you hold that it is not in order to say that a Minister who is capable of making a statement that can be proved on the moment to be without foundation is a shameless Minister. I, therefore, have no alternative but to withdraw the words. I maintain that a gentleman in the position of the Chief Secretary, who, at a moment like this, when his policy is challenged, can, in order to get a temporary advantage, and secure, it may be, the passage of a Vote, tell English gentlemen behind him, in ignorance of the facts as they necessarily must be—[Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] Which of you knows them? I would like to know did any English Conservative Member ever hear of these cases before to-day? Well, I say that the right hon. Gentleman made his statements recklessly. He did not care for their accuracy. He did not care to seek information. The question had been put to him time after time in this House, so that he could not say he was not seised with knowledge of the facts of the case. Well, I stated advisedly that these two cases occurred on the same day, and he, with the most reckless exercise of his powers of assertion, stated that it was because of the futility of the law in the one case, that the other defendant was not prosecuted under the same Act. I leave these facts to the judgment of the House. But I say that if it had been I, mere Irishman as I am, member of a race unworthy to hold any position in its own country, not being a long-descended man or connected with Dukes, or Lords, or other noble people of high descent, I would have been ashamed of myself, and if the right hon. Gentleman is not ashamed of himself, all I can say is I believe there are those of his own Party in the country who will be ashamed of him.

(11.54.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not in the least mean to add to the heat of the Debate. The very violent attack which the hon. Member has made upon me has been made on this ground. In reply to a question asked me by the hon. Member for Galway, I stated that the two persons concerned were a man named Clark and a man named Ayre. I also stated that the action with regard to Ayre preceded the action with regard to Clark, and that because the action with regard to Ayre failed, a new procedure was used with regard to Clark. For that I have been attacked in the language the House has heard. I will now take the liberty of reading to the House the question put to me by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Roche), and which first brought the matter under the attention of the House. [The right hon. Gentleman here read Mr. Roche's question.] I submit that by that question it is conclusively proved that the charge which the hon. and learned Gentleman has thought fit to bring against me is confuted out of the mouth of his own colleague.

(11.56.) MR. DILLON: I am not going to let the right hon. Gentleman get off in that way. I will show in a very few minutes that my hon. Friend the Member for Longford was perfectly correct in his statement. The right hon. Gentleman was asked to account for difference in the treatment of these two men, and he said that owing to the failure in Ayre's case a different procedure was adopted in Clark's case. What we say is, that this is not the truth, because on the same day on which Ayre was tried under one Act, another Nationalist named Kerwin was tried under the same procedure as was subsequently applied to the case of Mr. Clark. I think we have made out our case absolutely. It has been shown that what my hon. Friend contended is the simple and plain truth. We make a complaint. We receive an explanation respecting our complaint. We prove by the most complete and conclusive evidence that it is no answer at all, and that it is inconsistent with the real facts. We prove by the facts we have brought forward, and which the Chief Secretary has not attempted to deny—

LORD HENRY BRUCE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that question.

MR. DILLON: We prove that the reason why a different Statute was used in Clark's case from the Statute used in Ayre's case was that Clark was a Nationalist, and elected, and that Ayre was a J.P. I am not in the least surprised to see the noble Lord opposite endeavouring to close the Debate. That is the resource on which they fall back when the argument is going against them, and when they find they have not a leg to stand on. I want to put this question to the Committee, Do they think it a reasonable and just punishment, or a punishment that the law ought to allow, that—

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [10th July] reported.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

Class II.

Resolution agreed to.

FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 43.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.5.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyne, South): This Bill has been on the Paper almost from the beginning of the Session, and has never been printed. I wish to ask if Members are to be kept here night after night watching a Bill which has not been printed?

MR. T. M. HEALY: If it is of any convenience to the hon. Member I will move the Second Reading.

DE. TANNER: The Member in charge of the Bill is not present.

(12.6.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As a point of order, Sir, may I ask whether a Bill can be read a second time without having been printed?

*MR. SPEAKER: It would not be out of order, but there are strong objections to it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would point out that some Acts have been passed into law without ever having been printed, such as the Bill relating to the naturalisation of Prince Henry of Battemberg.

Second Reading deferred till Friday next.

MOTION.

POST OFFICE MAIL CONTRACT (WEST INDIES.)

(12.8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Contract dated the 15th day of May, 1890, with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, for the conveyance of mails to the West Indies, be approved."—(Mr. Secretary Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think we are entitled to some explanation of this.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The new contract provides for an accelerated service, and provides for alternative port of call and for a diminished payment of £5,000 a year. It has been submitted to all the Colonies concerned, and has been approved by them.

(12.9.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the rate of steaming contracted for; whether the contract provides for the acceleration of steaming under new and improved machinery, and how long the contract is to last?

*(12.10.) MR. JACKSON: The minimum rate provided for is 13 knots an hour on the main line. Attention has been paid to the points he has raised. I would point out that the best security we can have is that this is an important Company, working in competition with other companies, and that it is to its own interest that the service should be efficient. Under the late contract the Company was at the end performing the service in less time than the contract specified. I have no doubt that they will keep pace with the times, and will perform the contract even in less time than is specified.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 14th July, 1890.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT BILL.

(No. 106.)

Returned from the Commons with the Amendment agreed to.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.—(No. 184.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUSTFORD): My Lords, the Bill of which I ask your Lordships to grant a Second Reading is, with the exception of two clauses, which have been omitted, to which I shall soon call your attention, the same as that which your Lordships passed last year. The Bill went down to the House of Commons, but, owing to the lateness of the period of the Session, to the pressure of business, and to the threatened opposition on the ground that sufficient land was not reserved for the control of the Crown, Her Majesty's Government, though with regret, were unable to proceed with the Bill, and they withdrew it, on the pledge that it should be brought in at an early period this Session, and then referred to a Select Committee, who should thoroughly consider and thresh out all the different questions arising upon the Bill. That pledge was redeemed, the Bill was read a second time, and was referred to a very strong Select Committee, who went most fully and thoroughly into all the matters that were brought before them. They had the advantage of hearing a considerable body of evidence, and amongst the witnesses who gave evidence before them were included the late Governor, Sir Frederick Broome, the future Governor, Sir William Robinson, who has already once administered the Government of the colony, and they also had the advantage of the evidence of two delegates from the colony, men of high standing and position, who were members of the Legislative Council, and were chosen from that Body to give evidence before the Committee, and to state the views of the Colonial Government. I think I need only now call your Lordships' attention to the two clauses which were, by the decision of the Committee, a decision subsequently approved by the House of Commons, omitted from this Bill. They were Clauses 4 and 8. By Clause 4 your Lordships will remember the control and management of land to the north of the 26th parallel of latitude was reserved to the Crown. The reasons why I pressed upon the colony this reservation, in spite of their wishes to the contrary, were embodied in a Despatch dated December 12, 1887; and perhaps your Lordships will allow me to read a passage from it. In that Despatch I pointed out that—

"Representations have been already made to Her Majesty's Government urging that the northern portion of the Colony should not be placed under the unrestricted control of a Legislature elected by the present small population residing, for the most part, in the Southern districts. It might, therefore, not improbably happen that a measure for giving effect to the Resolution of the Legislative Council might not receive the assent of Parliament, and the wishes expressed in the colony would thus be frustrated."

I am free to admit that it seemed to me that the principle of granting responsible self-government to this colony was so important that I was ready to adopt any measure, not unreasonable in itself, which would disarm opposition. The restriction, as I stated last year in this House, did not appear to be unreasonable, though, as I also added, I personally did not believe there would be any danger that the land would be wasted or mismanaged. My chief reason for so thinking may be shortly stated as follows: It may be admitted that what Sir Charles Dilke calls "the noble dowry" which we gave to the colonies when we handed over to them the control of all their land, has been somewhat wasted and mismanaged. It may be admitted that the best mode of dealing with land for the benefit of the colony was not thoroughly understood, and could only be gained by experience; and that out-and-out sales of land at low prices no doubt did cause loss to the community and waste. But to those who find fault with Her Majesty's Government for handing over the control of so much land to the responsible Government, and who urge upon us that we ought to profit by the experience gained in the past, I would answer that if we look back to the history of the land question and of land management in these Australian colonies we shall find that the waste and mismanagement of land mainly took place in the earlier years of the life of these colonies, and when the land was under the control of the Crown, and before responsible Government was conceded. Since responsible Government has been given to the colonies, the Colonial Government have, with more or less success, improved the land system which previously prevailed, and they have largely diminished the waste resulting from such system. At all events, Western Australia has profited by the experience gained in the other colonies, and the Rules and Regulations which have been passed in that Colony for the management of the land are eminently calculated to favour emigration; the creation of agricultural areas; and the cultivation by small settlers occupying the land. The evidence given before the Committee in favour of this view, and also of some practical difficulties which would arise in the management of the lands in the northern district if reserved to the Crown, to which, perhaps, I had not given full weight, was so clear that, without a Division, they agreed to the omission of this fourth clause. This view, I may add, is in entire accord with the opinion of one who was most competent to form an opinion upon this point and one whose loss we so deeply deplore—I refer, of course, to Lord Carnarvon; and perhaps, in passing, your Lordships will allow me to say a few words in addition to those which Lord Rosebery spoke on Thursday last. Lord Carnarvon twice held the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies with dignity and with honour to himself and with great advantage to the colonies. I had the honour of twice serving under him when he was Secretary of State, and I can, therefore, speak undoubtedly and with certainty of the entire devotion that he gave to his work and the ability with which he administered that office. I can also speak of the great respect and esteem, I had almost said the affection, with which he was regarded by the colonists; and I can assure your Lordships that his death will be most deeply regretted by thousands of our fellow-subjects in all parts of Her Majesty's possessions. Lord Carnarvon said last year that if you give responsible Government to the colonies you must be prepared to give the Crown lands with it, and he very much doubted the desirability—and I rather think the noble Earl opposite rather doubted the desirability—of the reservation which, for the reasons I have stated, I thought it well to insert in the Bill of last year. There was one argument advanced—I think by the Earl of Derby—in favour of our reservation of land, which, no doubt, had weight. He pointed out that in his opinion the reservation of land north of the 26° parallel would materially simplify and facilitate the creation of a separate colony in the northern portion of the territory, which he then anticipated must take place in a few years. There would be considerable force in that view if it was likely that the separation would be so shortly effected. But the evidence given before the Committee distinctly pointed to this: that it must be many years before that separation can take place, if ever; and I would add that the great movement in the Australian Colonies towards federation has also, I think, militated against the chance of the northern portion of the colony being separated from the southern, and made into a separate colony. At all events, my Lords, I think that the matter has been most thoroughly examined into by the Committee; and, for these reasons, I trust your Lordships will not think fit to dissent from the omission of the fourth clause. With regard to the other clause (Clause 8), which provided that any Bill restricting emigration should be reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure, the omission of that clause was only decided by a majority of two in the Committee; but Her Majesty's Government decided that they would take the sense of the House of Commons on the matter and abide by their view of this clause; and, after Debate, the House of Commons affirmed the omission of the clause without, I think, a Division. I myself entirely concur in that decision, and I think the evidence that was brought before the Committee showed three things: first, that upon the introduction of responsible Government into a colony emigration has always increased, and that the increase has continued for many years; secondly, that the Colony of Western Australia has been one of the Colonies which has been most ready to promote immigration, and most desirous to secure emigrants; and, thirdly, that this feeling in favour of immigration will be certainly increased and not diminished, because, as Lord Derby observed last year, every immigrant who enters Western Australia will be regarded as an addition to the wealth, the resources, and the development of the country. This being the case, it seemed to me unnecessary to retain this clause, and undesirable if unnecessary, because in no other case where responsible Government has been granted to a colony has such a clause been inserted. It has been admitted in both Houses that this Bill is of vital importance to the Colony of Western Australia, and I may add that it is most strongly supported by the other Australian Colonies. I trust, therefore, your Lordships will grant it a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Knutsford.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I wish simply to say that I am extremely glad the Bill has come to us in this shape. I think it is a decided improvement on the Bill of last year. With regard to the control of the Crown over the land, I will not again go over what the noble Earl has already stated. My opinion was last year as it is now, that it was entirely unnecessary and very impolitic to introduce the restrictions which the Bill of last year contained. The evidence given before the Committee of the House of Commons has shown very clearly what the feeling in Western Australia is on the subject; and even if I were of opinion that there was some particular advantage to be gained from such a restriction, I should still strongly deprecate our introducing restrictions of that kind in face of the feeling in the colonies generally. With regard to the other matter of emigration, I may venture to say the same thing as was said last year, namely, that it is entirely an illusion to suppose that the Colony of Western Australia will not favour emigration. On the contrary; for a long time they must look to immigration for their progress. When the time arrives for the Colony of Western Australia to have a large labouring population and a system of manufacturing industries like Victoria it may so happen that a feeling will grow up against the introduction of immigrant labour to compete with the labouring population of the colony. But if that time should come, and if that feeling should grow up, as it has grown up in other places, I feel perfectly certain that it would be impossible for Parliament or Government to interfere in the matter to override the feeling of the colony, and that such a clause as that in the Bill of last year would not in the least strengthen the position of the Government of the day. I therefore strongly approve of the alterations which have been made in the Bill, and am very glad to find that it now meets not only with the approval of the Government and the Party who support it, but also with the approval of many who think with me here and in the other House.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, as one who for a very long time was much engaged in what I may call the restoration of our colonial policy, I desire to address a few words of congratulation to the Secretary of State for the Colonies on his successful conduct of this Bill. Rome, the mistress of Empire in the old world, certainly did not show much acquaintance with the details of her distant provinces. The Romans, no doubt, cared little at home for the details of distant administration. I fancy a Roman senator troubled himself very little about the government of Dacia. But it did astonish me that legislators in England, the greatest modern mistress of Empire, should, in dealing with a matter of this sort, show so little acquaintance with the subject, as was shown in the Debates in the other House, and even in the Committee on the Bill. We do not make dependencies, as the Romans did, in distant parts of the world; we make extensions of Empire, settlements of fellow-subjects as free and with precisely the same rights as those at home. When I saw, both in the Debates of the other House and even in the Select Committee, the matter was discussed by many as if Western Australia was a Crown Colony, and as if they were not aware that this Bill only developed a Representative Government into a Responsible one, I was not surprised to hear the waste lands of the colony talked of as the patrimony of our people at home, and as if the right of dealing with waste lands was not just as much vested in the Government there as the right of dealing with common lands was vested in our Parliament here in England, both Governments being under the one Sovereign. I am, therefore, extremely glad that any restriction upon their perfect control of their own waste lands has been removed from the Bill; and I think, also, that the fears that the colony will pass Acts restricting English immigration, and that they may ill-treat the aborigines smack of the old Mother Country colonial policy, which for a time overlaid the free and successful colonisation by England of her earlier colonies. I can only say that I think now that the Bill as it has passed, almost, but not quite, free from those blots in the first Bill, does meet the wishes of the colonists, and does recognise the rights of responsible Government in Australia, besides consulting the best interests of the country at home. The Bill itself is, I think, exactly in the right shape, and not something in substitution for the Constitution drawn up by the colonists themselves. I, therefore, as one who has for a long time been engaged in the subject, do offer my hearty congratulations, and I consider that our thanks are due to the noble Secretary of State for the Colonies for the service he has done in conducting the passage of this Bill through Parliament to so satisfactory a conclusion.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

RURAL POST OFFICE APPOINTMENTS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government if they could not arrange for rural Post Office appointments being made by the General Post Office instead of by the Treasury and the County Members, said: My Lords, although recent events might suggest that this is a fitting time to ask Her Majesty's Government to in some measure free the General Post Office from the incubus of the Treasury, I will on the present occasion confine myself to a minor point. It is now the practice that if a vacancy occurs in a country Post Office the Treasury are first communicated with; the Treasury then ask the County Member to nominate someone. Very often the County Member may not be acquainted with the circumstances of the case, of what the requirements may be, or suggest a really fitting appointment. Moreover, since the Secretary of the Treasury has been deprived of his patronage, and as patronage in general has been abolished by competitive examination, it is no use taking away the substance and preserving the shadow by giving to the County Members these small appointments. As I have said, the County Members are very often really unacquainted with the circumstances of the place; they may even reside at a great distance from it, and they are liable to give the appointments to some supporter of their own without regard to qualifications or circumstances. In addition to these hypothetical objections to the present system, I may as well give your Lordships instances from my own experience. Some years ago in a village in Cheshire there was no Post Office. I asked for one to be established. At the same time, I put up a small building in the centre of the village which I intended to be used for the Post Office. For some time I heard nothing more about the matter, and at last it turned out that the Post Office had been established in some other less convenient place, and the building has now been let for the purposes of the County Constabulary. The man who holds the Post Office is now desirous of throwing it up. I have been asked to build another house, but I declined, as I did so once, and no notice was taken of it in consequence of these Treasury and Post Office arrangements." It would, in fact, be useless for anyone to build a house for a Post Office unless he is tolerably certain by communication with the Post Office through their Inspector that the house will be made use of. I will mention another case which occurred many years ago. A County Member wrote to me saying, "Your Post Office is vacant; I know nothing about it myself; tell me whom you recommend." I wrote back to him: "Please do not move until I settle it with the General Post Office." I then wrote to Sir John Tilley and said, "Why is this Post Office vacant? I think I ought to have been consulted first." He answered that "it was vacant because the person who was appointed to it had never gone there." I said it "had been managed by his sister, and had never been better managed; and the person appointed did not wish at present, for family reasons, to leave the neighbouring town; that his father and grandfather had long been supplying contracts for the Post Office, and did not deserve such summary treatment, and I asked to have things left as they were." But supposing this County Member had not been an acquaintance of mine, he might have appointed somebody else, and then there would have been an unnecessary complication. I hope, therefore, Her Majesty's Government will arrange that in future the General Post Office, through their Inspectors, will manage these matters and make the appointments. I can only speak of the Cheshire and North Wales district, but I wish to say that the Postmaster General and his Inspector have introduced a good many reforms, and if the rest of the country is equally well served, the people should be very well satisfied.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): I am sorry for my noble Friend's experience in his dealings with respect to this Post Office. However, I can only say that I do not think that is everybody's experience. I do not think it will be necessary for me to follow the noble Lord through the history of his dealings with the Post Office; but I may tell him that the present system has been in vogue for a long time. Still, some representations have been made to the Treasury on the subject, and they are carefully considering what they will do in the matter.

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (PREVENTION) BILL.—(No. 117.)

Amendments reported (according to order); further amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 14th July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

LIGHTHOUSES ON FAIR ISLE.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the work of erecting lighthouses on Fair Isle has begun; what is the present state of the works; and when it is expected that the buildings will be finished and the lights shown?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I understand from the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses that the contractors whose tender was formally accepted on the 23rd ultimo are now actively engaged in preparing material and arranging for the shipping of it, and expect to commence operations on the island before the end of this month. The erection of the lights will be proceeded with as quickly as possible, having regard to the difficulties of communication with the island.

EGYPTIAN WATER SUPPLY.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the Report of M. Prompt, Administrateur des Chemins de Fer Egyptiens, submitted to the Egyptian Government on 27th February, 1890, in which he states that, if a railway were made from Khartoum to the Red Sea, and were maintained in working order, the effect would be to stimulate the Soudanese to increased cultivation, and thereby to materially diminish the supply of water available in Egypt; whether he is aware that in 1889, during the month of July, only from 15,000,000 to 17,000,000 cubic metres of water reached the Delta daily, although 25,000,000 metres are required for existing areas; whether this year the cultivation of rice has been suspended in favour of cotton; and whether he will cause to be printed and circulated to Members copies of any maps, diagrams, or documents bearing upon this subject illustrating the proposed area which it is proposed by M. Prompt to develop and colonise as the result of the scheme recommended by him, and of any papers or maps relating to the Raiyan-Moeris storage reservoir and escape canal projected by Mr. Cope Whitehouse?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government are in possession of M. Prompt's scheme, but have not been informed of the estimates referred to in the second and third paragraphs of the question; and they do not deem it proper to submit to Parliament projects which it rests within the discretion of the Government of Egypt to adopt, if they see fit to do so.

INTERDICTED MEETING AT WISHAW.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Magistrates of Wishaw prohibited an open air meeting proposed to be held at the Cross at Wishaw on 2nd June, and instructed the Constabulary to prevent the meeting from being held; and whether he can state the nature of such interdicted meeting; and under what Statute it was so prohibited?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): My attention was called to this matter by the question of which notice was given by the hon. Member for Northampton. The facts appear to be as stated in the first paragraph. The object of the meeting, as described in the posters calling it, was, "Resistance of Compensation. The Duty of the Hour." I am informed that the Magistrates, who are the elected police Magistrates of the burgh, had no apprehension of disturbance, and that this interference was in no way actuated by the nature or objects of the meeting, or the conflicting opinions of any sections of the community. They acted solely because the place proposed was a part of the streets where, in their judgment, a large public meeting could not be held without the ordinary traffic of the streets being interfered with and danger of accident arising. The place called the Cross is simply the point of intersection of two narrow streets, and even the normal space was at the time curtailed by a hoarding erected for some building operations. The Magistrates acted in what they held to be their Common Law duty to prevent obstruction in the streets, and they had also in view Section 248 of the General Police Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862. I am informed that there is a park at a short distance from the Cross, where meetings can be held without inconvenience to anyone, and in the present instance the promoters, protesting against the action of the Magistrates, adjourned to the Good Templars Hall, and there held their meeting.

MR. PHILIPPS: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the interdict by which the meeting was prevented, and the notice which was served upon the Chairman? The notice prohibited the holding of a meeting in the open air at the Cross, or in any of the public streets of the borough. Is there anything in the Act of 1862 which gives to the Magistrates such wide authority as that; and, if not, under what authority do they act?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The primary object was to prevent the meeting being held in a particular place. The place was narrow, and the Magistrates were of opinion that the holding of a meeting there would obstruct the traffic. I do not think that the interdict involved any deliberate intention on the part of the Magistrates to interfere with the right of meeting unless a danger to the traffic arose.

MR. PHILIPPS: Would not the ordinary course be to allow the meeting to be held and to remove any persons creating an obstruction?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Magistrates might have taken the course suggested by the hon. Member and waited until the streets were obstructed before they interfered. But they gave persons the option of going to the meeting or refraining from doing so.

MR. PHILIPPS: Why do they say that the meeting would have created an obstruction? [Cries of "Order!"] Surely I am in order in pressing the right hon. Gentleman for the authority under which the Magistrates acted?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am not prepared to give the authority. The primary duty of the Magistrates was to preserve the peace.

MR. PHILIPPS: I beg to give notice that I will put a further question to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to lay down the principle that a legal meeting becomes illegal from prohibition by the Magistrates?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I do not intend to lay down any principle of the kind. What I hold is that the Magistrates were quite within their rights in letting the inhabitants know that they would prevent people from standing about and causing an obstruction.

THE ESSEX MILITIA.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can explain why the Essex Militia (3rd Battalion) was assembled at Warley, and sent by train to Colchester and back to Warley, and why the 3rd Battalion did not occupy the camp recently vacated by the 4th Battalion; and what object is gained by the expense involved in sending tents and camp equipments for 700 men from Colchester to Warley and back for the 4th Battalion, and sending the 3rd Battalion from Warley to Colchester and back, instead of occupying the camp at the place of assembly?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The object gained was the instruction of the 3rd Battalion in a large camp with regular troops. The original arrangement for this year was that the 3rd Battalion should train at Colchester Camp, and the 4th Battalion in barracks at Warley, but the drainage at Warley Barracks was found to require attention, and the 4th Battalion was, therefore, encamped at Warley. This was not considered a sufficient reason for depriving the 3rd Battalion of the valuable instruction arranged for it at Colchester.

MAJOR RASCH: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the matter on the Transport Vote, and move a reduction.

HALL MARKING.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has received any communication from the India Office or from the Viceroy of India on the subject of Hall Marking; and whether he can now make any statement thereon?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): No, Sir; I have not received any communication from the India Office or from the Viceroy on the subject of Hall Marking.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Has the right hon. Gentleman any means of knowing whether such communications have reached the Secretary of State, because my information is that they have?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I made inquiry, and was informed that none have reached. I will make further communication. The matter is a complicated one, but I have no doubt that I shall receive some communication soon.

INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury to what day he intends to postpone the Indian Councils Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Indian Councils Bill will stand over until Monday next.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty about what time he intends holding the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres; how many and what type of ships are to be mobilised, and whether it is correct that the date has been postponed owing to many of the vessels having to be longer under repair than anticipated; and whether, with the large addition to the Navy of ocean cruisers, he will consent to extend the scope of the experimental operations to the protection of the leading food and cotton ocean routes, notifying to commanders of British shipping that they will be expected to avoid, as far as practicable, nominal capture by hostile experimental cruisers? As the noble Lord is not in his place may I ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if he can answer the question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; I have no information.

ST. OLAVE'S BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether complaints have reached him that the St. Olave's Board of Guardians only visit the workhouses under their care once a fortnight; and, if so, whether the Local Government Board will see that the order directing Guardians to visit such houses once a week is carried out in future by this Board?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have not received any complaint as to the times when the workhouses of the St. Olave's Board of Guardians are visited by the Visiting Committee. I will communicate with the Guardians on the subject.

SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. PHILIPPS: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that two men named Edward Marshall and Charles McGill have been sentenced by Sheriff Balfour to a fine of £5 or 14 days' imprisonment for killing one rabbit; and whether he will cause inquiry into the matter with a view to the mitigation of this sentence?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to this case, and inquiry is being made.

TRINIDAD.

MR. GILLIAT (Clapham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. G. F. Bowen has been removed from the post of chief clerk and accountant in the Receiver General's Office, Trinidad, where he was in receipt of a salary of £400 a year; that his post was amalgamated with a lower one, and the united office was given to a junior two grades below him in the same Department during his absence, no hint of such intention having ever been given to him until it was done; can he explain why no reason has ever been assigned for passing him over, and that a copy of the Correspondence regarding it was refused; whether the Receiver General is correctly reported to have stated to the Legislative Council that Mr. Bowen was "about to retire," and on what authority he made this statement; whether he is aware that Mr. Bowen was reduced, at less than a month's notice, from a salary of £400 a year to a pension of £180, and that, after waiting for more than a year, the Governor's ultimatum on the subject is a post at £100 a year, with which His Excellency trusts Mr. Bowen will be content; and whether he can see his way to recommend the reinstatement of Mr. Bowen in a post which, with his pension of £180, may give him the equivalent of the salary of £400 of which he has been deprived?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In 1889, as part of a scheme of re-organisation of the Department of the Receiver General in Trinidad, which was approved by the Secretary of State, the office of chief clerk and accountant, held by Mr. Bowen with a salary of £400 a year, and the office of savings bank accountant, the salary of which was £350 a year, were amalgamated into one office, with a salary of £450 a year, which was conferred upon the savings bank accountant, Mr. Bowen being pensioned off. Mr. Bowen was absent on leave when it was decided to abolish his office. He was informed on the 14th March, 1889, of the intention to abolish it, and the abolition took effect on the 1st of May. The reason for not appointing Mr. Bowen to the amalgamated office was that the appointment of the other gentleman was considered more conducive to the efficiency of the Department. It was not considered desirable to furnish him with a copy of the Correspondence. I am unable to say whether the Receiver General is correctly reported to have made the statement referred to in the third paragraph of the question, or, if he made it, on what authority he did so. Mr. Bowen's income was reduced from a salary of £400 to a pension of £180. The Governor has been instructed to give him, if possible, another appointment, and I believe Sir W. Robinson has done his best to re-employ him. The salary of the post now offered to him is £150. The Secretary of State hopes it may be possible to find Mr. Bowen a suitable post, the salary of which will raise his income to its former level.

ARMY RETIREMENT.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state to the House the number of Majors, Lieutenant Colonels, and Colonels who have been re-called to duty under the age of 55 after their retirement in accordance with the Royal Warrant of December 1886, which empowers him to do so?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No retired officer has yet been re-called to serve, the occasion contemplated in the Royal Warrant not having arisen.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES ACT.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what is the number of sanitary districts, urban and rural, in which the Infectious Diseases (Notification) Act, 1889, or similar Private Act, has been adopted; whether he has any Reports to show; what is the effect so far, whether beneficial or not, to the public health; and whether it works without friction to the parties interested?

MR. RITCHIE: The Infectious Diseases (Notification) Act, 1889, has been adopted in 481 urban sanitary districts, 337 rural sanitary districts, and 18 port sanitary districts. The Act is in force throughout London, without adoption. Compulsory notification is also in force under local Acts in 56 other districts. The population, according to the Census of 1881, of the districts where there is a system of compulsory notification in force is 19,316,000, the total population of England and Wales being 25,974,000. I have no special Reports on the subject, but I have no doubt whatever that the notification of infectious diseases will have results beneficial to the public health, and I am glad to say that the arrangements have worked to a remarkable degree without friction.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the regulation of the expenditure of the Metropolitan Police rests with himself alone now that the Imperial contribution is permanent and not annually voted; and if all increase of expenditure sanctioned by him is put on the rates of the Metropolis without any sanction either of the House of Commons, representing the ratepayers, or the representatives of the ratepayer?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): It is difficult to answer, otherwise than in debate, this somewhat argumentative question. Technically, the sum formerly payable as an Imperial contribution no longer appears on the Votes; but an effectual opportunity for Parliamentary criticism is afforded by the fact that the Vote "Police, England, and Wales" still bears the salaries of the Commissioner and Receiver, as well as such other portions of Metropolitan Police expenditure as are repayable from Imperial funds. The control of the ratepayers and the powers of the Secretary of State are neither greater nor less than they were when the Imperial contribution did appear as such upon the Vote. As the law now stands the Secretary of State cannot increase the charge on the ratepayers beyond the statutory maximum of 9d. in the £ of the rateable value of the district. The accounts of Metropolitan Police receipts and expenditure are, by Act of Parliament, fully published to this House every year.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What is the present expenditure? How many pennies in the £?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: Not very far from 9d.

ASHTON-IN-MAKERFIELD CHURCHYARD.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that in the parish of Holy Trinity, Ashton-in-Maker-field, Lancashire, it is intimated that a breadth, or grave, in the churchyard is appropriated "only on condition that no other than the Church of England Service is ever used"; whether this is in accordance with the provisions of the Burial Act of 1880; and, if not, whether steps will be taken to prevent such a limitation of the rights of parishioners?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Secretary of State has communicated with the incumbent, who states "that in every case the provisions of the Burial Act of 1880 have been loyally and faithfully carried out." It may, therefore, be inferred, though the question is not specifically answered, that no such intimation as is referred to can have been given. I may add that such an intimation would not, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, be consistent with the object and provisions of the Act of 1880.

THE LIFE SAVING APPLIANCES ACT.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a statement adopted by a meeting of steamship owners, held in Glasgow on the 8th instant, setting forth the unsuitability for the cases of coasting, river, and short sea excursion steamers of the "Rules made by the Board of Trade under 'The Merchant Shipping (Life Saving Appliances) Act, 1888,'" presented to Parliament on the 10th ultimo; whether similar representations have been made from other ports; and whether he will consider the propriety of modifying the rules, with a view of meeting the objections raised?

MR. CHARLES WILSON (Hull, W.): I beg also to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is the intention of the Government to enforce the Life Saving Appliances Rules in respect to the coasting, Continental, and short over-sea trades, in spite of the objections raised by the shipowners interested, these objections being fully explained in a statement transmitted to Members of Parliament from a meeting held at Glasgow on the 8th July; and whether he will receive a deputation to consider the objections of the shipowners interested?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My attention has been called to the statement referred to by the hon. Members and also to others of a similar nature, and I have carefully considered the representations made. It must be remembered that the Rules in question have been prepared by a Statutory Committee appointed under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping (Life Saving Appliances) Act of 1888. That Committee consisted of three shipowners selected by the Council of the Chamber of Shipping; one shipowner selected by the Shipowners' Associations of Glasgow, and one shipowner selected by the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association and the Liverpool Shipowners' Association conjointly; two shipbuilders selected by the Council of the Institution of Naval Architects; three persons practically acquainted with the navigation of vessels selected by recognised Shipmasters' Societies; three persons being or having been able-bodied seamen selected by recognised Seamen's Societies; two persons selected conjointly by the Committee of Lloyd's, the Committee of Lloyd's Register Society, and the Committee of the Institute of London Underwriters, Mr. T. H. Ismay acting as Chairman. The Act of 1888 was the result of the recommendations of a Select Committee of this House presided over by Lord Charles Beresford, and the special representations which have been made from Glasgow and other places are in opposition to the Report of that Committee, which recommended that in one form or other, life saving provision should be made for all persons on board a vessel. The Statutory Committee, to the composition of which I have referred, in the first instance recommended rules of rather greater stringency than those now before the House. But at the instance of the gentlemen from Glasgow and others whose representations have now been received, I called Mr. Ismay's Committee together a second time, in order that they might consider the very points now raised, and after an exhaustive re-consideration of the case, they came to the conclusion that the rules now before House were practicable and necessary in the interests of public safety. In these circumstances, I do not think it would be right for me to disregard the advice of a Statutory Committee, so composed as I have stated of representative men, eminently capable of forming an opinion on these matters. I am, therefore, not prepared to alter or modify the rules, until practical experience has shown that it is necessary.

BANKRUPTCY CLERKS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the fact that in his statement last year he gave an assurance that in consideration of the prospects held out by the Official Receiver to the clerks engaged in the Bankruptcy Department of the High Court, he would deal with the conditions of their service in the recess, any change has been made in the position of the Clerical Staff within the patronage of the several Official Receivers; and why the clerks, who have proved themselves competent, should not be brought into the regular Civil Service; and whether it is the intention of the Solicitor to the Board of Trade to transact the whole of the business connected with the departments of the Official Receiver; and, if so, whether the existing staff is sufficient for the purpose?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The question of the organisation of the staff engaged in the Bankruptcy Department of the High Court was considered by a Departmental Committee upon the recent retirement of Sir Robert Harding, and in accordance with their recommendation certain members of the existing staff were added to the permanent establishment by their appointment as Assistant Receivers, but it was not deemed desirable to make any general alteration in the terms of service of the personal staff of the Official Receivers. In accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, the Solicitor to the Board of Trade has taken over, and now performs, the duties of the Official Solicitor in Bankruptcy, whose staff is available for the purpose.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen-shire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received Memorials from various medical schools in Great Britain, praying that the recommendations of Lord Camperdown's Committee in respect to rank, titles, and emoluments of Army Medical Officers be carried into effect; and whether he would be willing to include in the Return, which he has promised to present to the House, like Memorials from the colleges and medical corporations of Great Britain?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir; they will be included.

AGRICULTURAL COMPENSATION PROCEDURE BILL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, having regard to the fact that in 1889 an Act was passed, as a non-contentious measure, amending "The Agricultural Holdings Act (Scotland), 1883," by enabling references under that Act to be carried out by a single referee appointed by the Court, he will give his assent to the Second Reading of the Agricultural Compensation Procedure Bill, which makes the corresponding Amendment in "The Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883," on the understanding that Clause 5 of the said Bill, which deals with another matter, shall be omitted?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I should view with favour the principle of any Bill which has for its object the simplification of agricultural valuations; but I am afraid I cannot pledge myself as to the Second Reading of the Bill in question until we have it before us and I am able to gather from the discussion what course the House would be likely to take with regard to the retention or omission of any particular clause or clauses of the Bill. It is really a matter for the House and not for me to decide whether the Bill is contentious or not.

MR. CHANNING: Is it not obvious that if a Bill of this nature is not taken before 12 o'clock there can practically be no discussion upon it?

MR. CHAPLIN: The matter is in the hands of the House.

ARMENIA.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he already possesses, or will endeavour to obtain, any information as to the correctness of the following statements in the Daily News of 11th July, that, according to the Official Report, nine persons were killed, and 78 wounded, and three shops and six houses pillaged at Erzeroum on the 20th ultimo; that the Armenian Patriarch has received orders from the Minister of Justice to dissolve the Civil and Ecclesiastical Armenian Councils at Van, and to recall the Bishop to the capital, thereby removing some of the few remaining restraints upon the exactions of the Turkish officials, and the brutalities of the Kurds; and, lastly, that certain Armenian peasants of the village of Alakillesse, in the Province of Sivas, were burnt alive by the police, owing to their inability to satisfy the tax-gatherer's demands, without any punishment of the Zaptiehs ensuing, in spite of the written complaint of the Armenian Prelate of Sivas; and whether, in the event of these reports proving correct, the Government will direct Her Majesty's Representative at Constantinople to urge the Porte to rescind the orders issued by the Minister of Justice, and to punish the authors of the outrage at Alakillesse?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A very unfortunate incident occurred at Erzeroum at the date mentioned, when a search for arms was made in an Armenian church and school with the consent of the Bishop. This was resented by the Armenians, who appear to have been responsible for the riot which followed, including an attack on their own Bishop. Some shots were also fired on the troops, which took fatal effect upon them, as well as killing the sexton of the church, and in the subsequent collision and rioting the loss of life was greater than stated in the question, some 20 having been killed and from 200 to 300 wounded. The Vali used his best efforts, and succeeded in preventing further misfortunes. Certain recommendations made by the British, French, and Russian Consuls were communicated to the Porte, and representations were at the same time made by the British and French, and it is believed by the Russian Embassy also, and order has been re-established. Her Majesty's Government have no information with regard to the other matters mentioned in the question.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER: Will Her Majesty's Government take advantage of the presence of Sir William White in this country to confer with him as to the serious condition of affairs in Armenia?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have no doubt that the Secretary of State will avail himself of the opportunity of Sir W. White's visit to confer with him on this and other subjects.

In reply to Mr. F. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye),

*SIR J. FERGUSSON said: I do not think there is any need for special instructions.

MR. J. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I understand that Mr. Clifford Lloyd has sent in a Report. Will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to lay it on the Table of the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have no doubt that Papers will be presented giving Reports of what has taken place. Mr. Clifford Lloyd has carefully reported on all of these cases.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): When will the Papers be presented? Will it be before the end of the Session?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to put the question on the Paper.

BEHRING'S SEA FISHERIES.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, inasmuch as it appears that much of the Correspondence which has passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States of America, regarding the question of the Behring's Sea Fisheries, has already been published in America, that Correspondence, or any, and what, part of it will be now laid before Parliament; and whether he is in a position to make any statement regarding the progress of the negotiations upon the subject of these fisheries?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Papers are being prepared, and will be laid shortly; they are rather voluminous. At the present stage of the negotiations it would not be desirable to make any statement to the House.

BOOK POST RULES.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain why the Postal Authorities decline to accept at the halfpenny postage rate invoices and statements printed at foot with the words, "Please remit the above by return of Post," whereas those printed with the words "All remittances should be made by return of Post" are accepted at that rate; and why voters claims forms, with printed instructions at foot "This claim, &c." are also refused at the halfpenny rate, whereas if the instructions were general that "All claims, &c." the forms would be accepted at that rate; and whether he can see his way to put an end to this system of making different charges in cases which are almost the same?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Such documents as those to which the hon. Member refers are passed at the book-rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ d., provided they contain no communication of the nature of a letter, although it is difficult in some cases to decide where the line should be drawn. I am, however, in correspondence with the Treasury respecting certain alterations which have been proposed in the Book Post Rules, with the view of removing some of the difficulties now experienced.

POST OFFICE—EAST CENTRAL DIVISION.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I had intended to ask the Postmaster General what number of men of the East Central Division were represented by the deputation which he stated waited upon him at the General Post Office on Friday afternoon; whether they were authorised to speak to him in the name of the whole body of their fellow-workers; what were the points they laid before him, and what concessions he promised to them, or is now prepared to make to the postmen as a body? I do not at present propose to put these questions.

MORTALITY AMONG MINERS IN CORNWALL.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the recent article in the Lancet commenting on the fearfully high rate of mortality among the miners of Cornwall, due to the insanitary condition of the mines; and whether he will instruct the Government Inspector of the district to hold a special and open inquiry into the facts, and to report upon the same, with a view to measures being adopted for their protection?

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: The Secretary of State has referred the article in question to the Inspector in Cornwall, and is now awaiting his Report. The Secretary of State has had, for some time past, under his consideration the question of amending the law as to metalliferous mines, and a Bill has been for some time in draft having for its object the better regulation of these mines, with a view to lowering the rate of mortality.

MR. CONYBEARE: I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a recent article in the Lancet, commenting on the fearfully high death rate of the miners of Cornwall, attributable to the unsanitary conditions under which they have to work, and whether he will extend the scope of the Reference to the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties, with a view to their taking evidence as to how far any improvement of the said unsanitary conditions is prevented by the undue exactions imposed in the form of royalties and rents by the landlords upon the adventurers, and offering recommendations thereon? I will, however, postpone the question until I hear further upon the subject.

INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION OF THE POST OFFICE.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg also to postpone the question I intended to ask the Postmaster General, whether he still declines to afford hon. Members who may desire to visit the Post Office, with a view to seeing something of its internal administration before they are called upon to discuss and criticise it on the Post Office Estimates, the necessary facilities for so doing.

"WRIGHT AND SON V. THE QUEEN'S HARBOUR MASTER."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Attorney General if his attention has been drawn to the remarks of Mr. Justice Mathew, as reported in the Times of 8th July, in the case of "Wright and Son v. the Queen's Harbour Master, the Admiral Superintendent, and others," as follows:—

"He regretted the case, it was not the only case in which those dealing with persons connected with the Crown had no remedy," and to the fact that the Jury found for the plaintiffs with damages, and that the learned Judge entered the verdict for the defendants; and whether any steps will be taken in the shape of legislation in consequence?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): As far as I can judge from the somewhat limited report in the Times, the case referred to by the hon. Member does not appear to be one in which there is any necessity for legislation. The defendants, who were public servants, were not guilty of personal negligence. They took no part in pointing out the berth to which the plaintiff took his barge, and it seems to me that the risk was properly borne by the plaintiff, whose bargeman in charge of the barge had seen the berth and signed the book, stating that he was satisfied with the berth before berthing.

THE POSTMEN.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the establishments of the different Offices of State at Home and Abroad is empowered to inquire into the numbers, salaries, hours of labour, superannuation, cost of the staff, and the administration, regulation, and organisation of the said Offices; whether the Royal Commission is still in existence; and whether, if it has not finished its labours, it would be possible that it should extend its inquiries, without delay, to the Post and Telegraph Office?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As I stated on the 11th inst., Her Majesty's Government consider that the questions which have arisen between the Post Office and its subordinates should be dealt with by the Department, which is quite competent to do so. It is not, in our opinion, expedient or desirable that public servants should be encouraged to look for redress of alleged grievances to the good offices of a third party, instead of to the head of their Department, who is directly responsible to the Government and to this House. Under these circumstances, we do not favour any special reference of this nature to the Royal Commission, which has been engaged on a most protracted and difficult investigation for a very long period, and may now naturally desire to be soon relieved of its arduous duties. I should add that the Commission was not appointed, as the instruction will show, for the investigation of grievances, but for the purpose of reviewing the organisation of public establishments, mainly with the view of effecting economy.

EARL COMPTON: Are not the words in the question as to the number, salaries, hours of labour, superannuation &c., the exact words used in the instructions to the Royal Commission, and were not the telegraphists almost invited to send in a statement of their grievances?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is probable, but it is an argument against referring questions of this kind to a Royal Commission, seeing that the time occupied in such an investigation must be necessarily contracted.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will favourably consider the position of the suspended postmen in the East End of London, some of whom have been in the Service upwards of 30 years, with the view of re-instating those who, by intimidation, were induced to join the Union, as they bitterly regret their conduct in going out with others on Thursday last?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now going into what is mere matter of opinion.

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I can only say that the matter in which he is interested shall receive my most careful consideration when a proper time arrives. I should naturally be desirous, if it should prove compatible with the public interest, to re-instate any postmen of good character who can prove that their misconduct was due to intimidation. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Collusion."]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! If the question had appeared upon the Paper I should have struck out that part which refers to postmen having joined the Union.

*MR. RAIKES (continuing) said: But I have at the same time to consider the maintenance of proper discipline, and I think it right to add that, in view of the disgraceful behaviour since the events of last Wednesday of persons professing to be sympathisers with the postmen who on that day deserted their duty in the Eastern District, I must postpone, while such outrages continue, any consideration of representations made on their behalf.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if the new draft of Sub-section 3, Clause 1, of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill will be communicated to the House before the Bill is proceeded with?

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to postpone until next week the question which stands in my name, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the desirability of making provision, whenever opportunities occur, for public parks and recreation grounds in the midst of the crowded population of South London, he will consider the propriety of applying the unappropriated monies arising out of the new Spirit Tax to the acquisition, for the benefit of the public, of the Crystal Palace and its grounds, which, it is believed, the present proprietors would offer to the nation for about £750,000?

ROYAL COMMISSIONS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to postpone until next week the question of which I have given notice, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will furnish a Return showing the number and objects of Reference of the several Royal Commissions issued since the year 1870, in which the Commissioners were precluded by the terms of Reference from embodying in their Report any recommendations for legislation or otherwise?

THE WINTER SESSION.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government, before finally deciding to recommend to Her Majesty the re-assembling of Parliament in November, will consider the danger to the health of Members likely to result from such a course, together with the inconvenience which will be caused to Irish and Scotch Members who will have to travel long distances at a most inclement period of the year?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I need hardly assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government would greatly regret if any proposals which they may feel called on to make for the progress of public business should endanger the health of Members of this House; but there is, I believe, a general belief that Sittings protracted into the autumn are more injurious to health than an earlier meeting in the autumn or winter.

IRELAND—EMERGENCY MEN IN FALCARRAGH.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Derry Journal of 9th July, stating "That the emergency man in charge of evicted farms in the Falcarragh district, accompanied by three soldiers of the Lancashire Regiment, now stationed in Dunfanaghy, visited the townland of Carrowcannon on Saturday evening last, and when they went a short distance beyond the Catholic Church the emergency man drew his revolver and fired five shots. There was a crowd of little children playing close by at the time, who fled panic-stricken to the nearest house;"

and whether, as this is not the first instance of such conduct on the part of this man, he will take any steps to prevent a repetition of similar conduct?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): It appears that the caretaker referred to fired three shots to attract the attention of a police patrol which was in the neighbourhood, as he observed three soldiers quarrelling. It does not appear to be the case that these soldiers were in his company, nor were there any children or persons in his view except these soldiers. On one other occasion only does this caretaker appear to have discharged his revolver, and that was when attacked by a dog.

"SHADOWING."

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Mr. P. D. Kenny, of Birmingham, lately shadowed in Ireland by the police, writes to the Daily News, saying that—

"Politics are no part of his business," denying "that he belongs to the National League of Great Britain," or "that he gave any one authority to describe him as about to attend an Irish meeting," and adding "that there was no reason in fact for the conduct of the police."

and whether, in view of these statements, he has any further information to communicate to the House as to this case?

*MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that one Patrick Burke, who has for years sat in a street in Tipperary engaged in the occupation of repairing boots and shoes, has been of late and is now being obliged to leave his usual place of sitting owing to policemen standing near him and pretending that he was working for them; that Burke, having removed to an archway near New Tipperary, was again so shadowed by policemen that for nine weeks he got no work, and was obliged to apply to the Poor Law Guardians for relief; that having returned to his former position three policemen placed themselves between him and Mr. P. Fitzgerald, of Tipperary, who wanted to approach Burke on business; whether, when Mr. Fitzgerald sent a messenger to Burke, the messenger was ordered "to get out of that" by the police; and what is the reason for this interference of the police with Burke in earning his livelihood?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that owing to complaints made to the police by some boycotted shopkeepers that the man referred to in the question while working near their shops took part in promoting the boycotting under which they were suffering, his movements were watched by the police, but that it is not the case that when he removed to another part of the town he was watched. The police at no time interfered with persons talking to the man unless they were obstructing the pathway. They have no information as to the particular incident referred to in the second paragraph, but if a date be given further inquiry will be made.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the reports in the Cork papers, from which it appears that two brothers, Edmond and David Kent, were at Fermoy fair on 6th instant, engaged in selling some lambs, when a constable came and "shadowed" David Kent for a considerable time; that this man, David Kent, then went and stood beside District Inspector Ball, and followed the Inspector about the fair, he himself being followed meanwhile by the constable; that District Inspector Ball spoke to Mr. Kent, and said, "if you persist in following me I will have you arrested," and that Kent replied that he had been prevented from doing his business by the constable shadowing him, and that if the Inspector withdrew the constable he would not follow the Inspector; if it is true, as reported, that the Inspector thereupon ordered the shadowing constable to arrest Mr. Kent, who was kept in custody from 9 a.m. until 3.30, and then summoned; and whether he can state under what authority was Mr. Kent arrested, and why was he shadowed in the manner described?

*MR. MADDEN: The hearing of the charge against the man referred to appears to have been fixed for to-day, and the case is, therefore, so far as I am aware, still sub judice. It would, therefore, be improper for me to enter into a discussion of the facts.

THE IRISH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to resolutions passed, on Wednesday last, at a meeting of lay and clerical members of the Irish General Assembly, demanding for the Presbyterians a fair share in the Parliamentary representation of Ulster, and also "The abolition of dual ownership in land;" and if he will use his influence with the Government to carry out and give effect to these recommendations?

*MR. MADDEN: My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland has not seen a copy of the resolutions referred to in the question of the hon. Member.

GALWAY HARBOUR.

MR. PINKERTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the sum of £45,000, borrowed by the Galway Harbour Commissioners from the Board of Works, for the purpose of improving their harbour, was advanced by that Board after careful examination and full approval of the plans and specifications submitted by Mr. Price, C.E., and the resolution passed by the Harbour Board in favour of carrying out these new works was only carried by a majority of one; if, after an expenditure of £45,000, a deep dock was constructed without an entrance channel, the water in the dock being 10 feet deeper than in the channel outside; and if, seeing that the port has derived no benefit from this expenditure, and as the Board of Works approved of and are responsible for everything that was done in the harbour, the Government will consider the advisability of either expending a further sum to deepen the entrance channel, so as to complete the works as at first designed, or relieve the port from the burthen of this debt?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I must ask the hon. Member to put the question to-morrow. I have not yet been able to obtain the information.

CAPPA PIER.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he has received a resolution or memorial from the Town Commissioners of Kilrush, County Clare, in reference to the extension of Cappa Pier; and, if so, will he state his intentions respecting it?

*MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I cannot find that any memorial or resolution has recently been received at the Treasury about Cappa Pier.

*MR. JORDAN: In reference to my next question on the Paper, I wish to say that this is not the question which I handed in to the Clerk at the Table, and I protest against the mutilation of my questions in this manner.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. JORDAN: Well, Sir; I withdraw my question, and will put it to-morrow.

SLAUGHTER OF COWS IN PHOENIX PARK.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what was the loss suffered by the taxpayers by the slaughter of the cows in the Phoenix Park under the Pleuro-Pneumonia Order; and will cattle in future be prevented grazing in the park, and sheep, if necessary, used to eat down the grass?

*MR. JACKSON: I regret to say that the net loss incurred, owing to the slaughter of cattle in Phoenix Park, was £3,129 10s. since January 1, 1890. This sum is a charge on the £20,000 provided in the Act of this year to compensate the owners of cattle slaughtered under Pleuro-Pneumonia Orders in Ireland. I may mention that, in allowing the cattle in question to be admitted to the Park, the Board of Works acted in consultation with the Veterinary Department. The Park is, at present, grazed by sheep, and this will probably continue for some years. I have given orders that no further cattle shall be admitted into the Park until there has been some change.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Until when?

*MR. JACKSON: Until there has been a change. As I have stated, the compensation is provided under the Pleuro-Pneumonia Act.

CORK LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can now state what decision the Irish Government have come to with regard to the recent Report of their Inspectors, as to the overcrowding of the Cork Lunatic Asylum, and the necessity for additional accommodation for the inmates?

*MR. MADDEN: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums report that the additional buildings now in course of construction at the Cork District Lunatic Asylum will provide accommodation for 409 patients, which will then give a total accommodation in that Asylum for 1,209 patients.

EVICCTIONS AT CASTLEISLAND.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any moneys are due to the Board of Public Works, Ireland, on the farms from which Messrs. James Leahy, Jeremiah Nugent, and Michael Donovan have been evicted at Castleisland, County Cork, and of which Mr. Thomas Henry Marmion is now in occupation; if moneys are due on them what are the amounts, and what steps have been taken, if any, to recover them?

*MR. JACKSON: I shall feel obliged to the hon. Member if he will put the question to-morrow. The information supplied to me is not as full as I should like to give to the House.

THEFT AT DROGHEDA:

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the remarks of Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, at the Dundalk Assizes, on Saturday, 5th July, in a case where two persons named Brady and Hughes were charged, convicted, and sentenced to terms of imprisonment for larceny of lead from the Imperial Hotel, Drogheda, when his Lordship stated in effect that Patrick Byrne, at whose instigation the lead was stolen, should be charged with the offence; and will he direct a prosecution against Byrne?

*MR. MADDEN: This case will, I have no doubt, be referred to me in the ordinary course; but I have not as yet received the Papers.

NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I wish to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he has seen a paragraph in the Echo of Saturday, headed "Moonlighting by a Policeman," which states that Constable Palmer had been convicted of smashing the windows of two houses, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, but that the District Inspector said there would be some difficulty in finding him because he had left the country, upon which the Magistrate made an observation as to the conduct of the police in allowing the man to escape. If the statement is true will inquiry be made into the conduct of the police; and will the Return presented to the House contain a Return of outrages committed by the police themselves?

*MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put the question on the Paper.

CARDIFF VOLUNTEERS.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the number of rank and file in the 1st Cardiff detachment, which at the close of the last volunteer year on 31st October, 1889, was 115, has now fallen to 60, and that between that date and the 1st of July, 1890, 58 have resigned, and only three recruits have been enrolled; whether he is aware that the number of rank and file in the 2nd Cardiff detachment, which on 31st October, 1889, was 324, is now less than 260, and that the resignations since that date do amount to upwards of 90, and the recruits to 26 only; whether it has been reported to him that the average attendance at the parades in uniform of the Cardiff detachment is now about 50, as against an average attendance of the two detachments combined last year of more than double that number; whether his attention has been called to the remarks of the Colonel commanding the 3rd Volunteer Battalion Welsh Regiment, at the parade of the Cardiff detachment on the 16th of June, expressing surprise at the muster being such a small one, and stating that, unless the attendance at drills improved, he would have to reduce the strength of the detachment from six to four companies, and also to the announcement on parade within the last fortnight that the Officer commanding the detachment will pay 2s. 6d. to each member of the detachment for every recruit introduced by him; and whether, in view of the fact that the 3rd Volunteer Battalion of the Welsh Regiment consists of 23 companies stationed in 10 towns in the Eastern portion of the County of Glamorgan, occupying an area measuring 25 miles in length, and that the Colonel Commandant resides at a distance of 24 miles from the headquarters of the Battalion, he will consider the advisability of reverting to the old system, and divide the present very large Battalion into two Battalions?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member has considerably over-stated the case, but the Cardiff companies are undoubtedly suffering from a deficiency of recruits. The average attendance on parade of the Cardiff detachment is reported to be over 100. The number of resignations is always greatest between November and January, and is partly due to the migratory character of the population; of those referred to in the question, the majority occurred before the amalgamation of the two Cardiff detachments. It is true that the Colonel lives 24 miles from Cardiff, but he is within easy reach by rail, and lives in the centre of a large population, from which a great proportion of his men are drawn. Reports from the Authorities on the spot show the battalion generally to be in a high state of efficiency—there being more efficient this year than ever before—and, in my opinion, no sufficient cause has been shown for abandoning a system which, on the whole, is working extremely well.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

In reply to Mr. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden), and Captain VERNEY (Bucks, N.),

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: If the Tithe Bill is withdrawn it will be withdrawn after 12 o'clock, when the Order is reached. The Employers' Liability Bill will be withdrawn either to-night or on some future day. There are on the Paper notices of Amendments to the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill, and if it is opposed the Bill will not be proceeded with.

MR. BARTLEY: Will the Savings Bank Bill be proceeded with?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I understand there is very little opposition to that measure.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): There is a very considerable amount of opposition to it.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Education Code (1890) Bill, without Amendment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 353.)

(4.25.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee do consist of Twenty-one Members."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee), in whose name an Amendment stood on the Paper to substitute the number 72 for 21, said: The Motion which was made the other night contained two propositions—(1) that none but Scotch Members should sit on the Committee; and (2) that all the Scotch Members should sit on the Committee. The Lord Advocate described it as a fantastic proposal, but I see that the right hon. Gentleman has now accepted the first proposition. There is one name—that of Sir C. Dalrymple—which is not that of a Scotch Member, but if the hon. Baronet is not a Scotch Member he is a Scotchman. The hon. and learned Gentleman was proceeding to criticise the composition of the proposed Committee, when

*MR. SPEAKER said: Order, order! The Standing Order only permits a short statement on a Motion of this sort.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I suggest that the Government should have put the Motion down at a time when every hon. Member could have expressed his opinion?

*MR. SPEAKER: I am not permitted by the Standing Order to allow anything more than a short explanatory statement.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Motion ought to have been made after 12 o'clock.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. SPEAKER: No hon. Member can move the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I take it, Sir, that you must put the names separately?

*MR. SPEAKER: No doubt.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I understand that my Motion is in order.

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Then I beg to move it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "Twenty-one," and insert "Seventy-two,"—(Mr. Edmund Robertson,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That 'Twenty-one' stand part of the Question."

(4.30.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): During the Debate on the Second Reading of this Bill I intimated, on behalf of the Government, that while we assented to the measure going before a Select Committee, we expressly reserved the right of the Government to influence the composition of the Committee. The hon. Member now proposes that in place of a Committee of 21 members there shall be a Committee of 72. Immediately after the Motion was carried to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, the hon. Member proposed that the Committee should consist of the whole of the Scotch Members, and the present proposal is really a repetition of the rejected Motion. I hold that the course the Government have taken is thoroughly defensible. We have a precedent in 1888. Then there was the Burgh Police (Scotland) Bill before the House, and it involved a considerable amount of detail. It was referred to a Committee of 25 Members, of whom four were English Representatives. Three of these were, however, of Scotch nationality, and the other one was an Englishman sitting for an English constituency. If it is said that this Committee ought to be a microcosm of the House in the sense of representing the various nationalities, the argument is at once reduced ad absurdum, because then a Committee of 21 Members should only include two Scotch Members. I can only repeat that in this matter we are following in the footsteps of our predecessors. We hold that as this matter is one requiring special local knowledge there should be a large infusion of the local element on the Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is my duty to point out that the hon. Gentleman has spoken quite as long as the Mover of this Amendment.

(4.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 130.—(Div. List, No. 184.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Baird, Mr. J. B. Balfour, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Childers, and Mr. Crawford nominated Members of the Committee.

(4.42.) DR. CLARK: I now propose to substitute for the name of Sir C. Dalrymple—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is not competent for the hon. Member to move without notice the insertion of another name, although he may move to omit any particular name.

DR. CLARK: I beg, then, Sir, to move the omission of the name of Sir C. Dalrymple, and I do so as a protest against the constitution of the Committee. While only 20 per cent. of the Liberal Scotch Members are to be on the Committee, 75 per cent. of the Conservative Scotch Members are to be placed on the Committee, which I hold ought more fairly to represent Scotch opinion in this House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Sir C. Dalrymple be one other Member of the Committee."

(4.44.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berkshire): I hope my hon. Friend will not propose this Amendment. The hon. Member whose name he proposes to omit is a Scotchman, though it happens that he is not a Scotch Member. He is, however, only an English Member by accident. I think that the proposed Committee accurately represent the ordinary ratio of the various parties in the House.

Question put.

(4.45.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 122.—(Div. List, No. 185.)

Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Hozier, Mr. Hunter, Colonel Malcolm, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Sir Archibald Orr Ewing, Mr. Parker Smith, Mr. Philipps, Mr. Provan, Mr. Edmund Robertson, Mr. Angus Sutherland, Mr. Mark Stewart, Mr. Shiress Will, Mr. Vernon, and the Lord Advocate, nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, that Seven be the quorum.

STATUTE LAW REVISION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL [LORDS].

(No. 251.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Schedule.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Schedule 1 stand part of the Bill."

(4.58.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to move to insert "34 Ed. III., Sec. 1."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This is a Bill for repealing statutes which are no longer in force, but the hon. Member proposes to repeal a Bill which is in force, and which has been recently applied. That is quite outside the scope of the Bill.

(4.59.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, S.): I think this point was decided differently on a former occasion when a Statute Law Revision Bill was under consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN: If so, it was irregular.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are you not, Sir, bound by precedent?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think not.

MR. CONYBEARE: But are we not entitled to show that this Act is not in active operation? And if we show that, is it not competent for us to move to repeal it?

THE CHAIRMAN: The statute might be repealed, undoubtedly, if it were not in operation, but I understand it has been recently applied.

(5.0.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Would it not be in order to move to repeal the statute as regards England and Scotland?

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to point out that it was never intended that this statute should apply to Ireland, and that it has been wrongfully enforced in that country.

THE CHAIRMAN: In another form, and on another occasion, that might be a proper subject for argument, but it cannot be raised now.

MR. CONYBEARE: Then I beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

(5.1.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I hope that the hon. Member will not persist in the Motion. The Bill has been very carefully considered by a Select Committee, and there is no controversial matter in any part of it. It deals with Bills between the 43rd year of George III. and the sixth year of William IV., and the passage of the Bill is being awaited in order to issue two new volumes of Revised Statutes. The hon. Member will be rendering a great service if he co-operates in getting this Bill through the House.

(5.3.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): On a proper occasion I shall be glad to assist in repealing this particular Statute, but as the Chairman has ruled that it cannot be done now, I hope hon. Members will not prevent the passing of the Bill, which is necessary in order to allow the issue of new volumes of the revised Statutes, which are awaited with considerable interest.

MR. CONYBEARE: I shall have to press the Motion.

(5.4.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): May I point out the Bill is intended to provide for the repeal of Statutes which are of such a nature as to be no longer capable of being put in force, regard being had to altered political or social circumstances. I submit that this Statute of Edward III. comes under that provision. Certainly it is incapable of being put in force in England, and I hold that at any rate it is competent for us to move to repeal it so far as England is concerned.

(5.5.) MR. CONYBEARE: I should be glad to withdraw my Motion to report Progress if it were not for the important point which has been raised that according to precedent we are entitled—

(5.6.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That point cannot be debated on a Motion to report Progress.

MR. CONYBEARE: I only wish to say that having regard to that fact I do not feel that I can withdraw my Motion.

(5.7.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I understand that this Statute was passed in order to avoid vexatious and frivolous arrests. I think it is time the Government, seeing the use made of it, have made up their minds to include it in this Bill, and I sincerely hope that even now they will consent to do so.

(5.8.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 195.—(Div. List, No. 186.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported without Amendment.

(5.23.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope that the House will assent to the Motion
Sir E. Clarke

I now make, that the Bill be read a third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

DR. TANNER: I object. I wish to know whether the Committee stage of a Bill, the Report, and the Third Reading can all be taken on the same day?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is no Report stage, as the Bill has been passed through Committee without Amendment. By the general consent of the House a Bill can be read a third time after it has been passed through Committee.

(5.24.) DR. TANNER: Is it impossible for me to raise an objection to the Bill being read a third time?

*MR. SPEAKER: The objection of two or three voices will not suffice to prevent the Bill being read a third time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed, without Amendment.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-1.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(5.25.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): On Friday night, when the moment of 12 o'clock intervened to check a somewhat heated Debate, hon. Members opposite were making a violent attack on myself, based upon the alleged inequality of treatment in the cases of Captain Eyre, Justice of the Peace, Mr. Kirnan, and Mr. Clarke. It was alleged that while these three gentlemen had been surcharged by an auditor of the Local Government Board in respect of relief afforded out of the poor rates to evicted tenants, proceedings against Captain Eyre had been taken under a Statute, purposely with the view of enabling him to evade payment. The hon. and learned Member for Longford said that whilst Mr. Clarke had been imprisoned in reference to a surcharge of £5, Captain Eyre, against whom there was a surcharge of £40, had got off scot free; and this, although both gentlemen were charged on the same day and before the same Magistrate. I desire to point out that the trials did not take place on the same day, and that Mr. Clarke was subsequently tried under a different Statute, in consequence of the failure of the proceedings which had been instituted against Captain Eyre. I was told on Friday night by the hon. and learned Member for Longford that I ought to be ashamed of myself, and that my action as a Minister was disgraceful, and much more in the same strain, until he was called to order by the Chairman. In the case of Mr. Kirnan an accusation equally injurious to the Administration of the Local Government Board was made. The facts of the case are that Captain Eyre was surcharged in January, 1887, before I occupied my present post as Chief Secretary, and Mr. Kirnan was surcharged at the same time, and was tried under the same Statute. The proceedings against both were identical, and the payment was obtained from either of them. Mr. Kirnan and Mr. Clarke were subsequently surcharged last year, and were tried under a different Statute because of the failure of the earlier proceedings against Captain Eyre and Mr. Kirnan. The Committee may now judge upon what basis wild and reckless accusations are made against the Irish Government and against myself, and what reliance ought to be placed by hon. Members sitting on the Government side of the House upon statements made by hon. Members opposite. The episode is, in my opinion, interesting, as illustrating the sort of justification for accusations which it is thought proper to hurl across the floor of the House in most excited tones.

(5.29.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, when I find that I have been led into an inaccuracy, I beg to tender him a full expression of my regret. I hope the example which I, not a long-descended man, set will not be lost on the right hon. Gentleman.

(5.30.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Sir, I too desire to apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for having made a statement which turns out to be inaccurate. Whilst I apologise to him fully for the inaccuracy of the information supplied to us in this particular instance, yet I do not think the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is well founded, because, out of the many charges hurled by Irish Members across the floor of the House, on this occasion alone has the Chief Secretary proved us to be inaccurate. I call the attention of the House to this fact, and to the length at which the right hon. Gentleman addressed it on this solitary triumph. I admit in the frankest way that on this occasion he has triumphed over us. But what about the hundreds of other cases in which we have brought the most damaging charges against the Irish Executive? They were accurate and could not be denied. If they were capable of denial why did the Chief Secretary not deny them as he has done in this instance? I apologise in the fullest way and without reservation for having made the statement that the Local Government Board, of which the Chief Secretary is the head, proceeded against two individuals on the same day under different Statutes. I would venture to direct the attention of the Committee to the great importance of this case, quite apart from that charge. Admitting now that we were wrong and misinformed, and that the Board did not commit the outrage of proceeding under different statutes, there still remains the extraordinary circumstances of the imprisonment of the man for signing the relief book of the union. I ask the President of the Local Government Board of England whether he knows of any case in England in which a Guardian of the Poor has been put in prison for signing the relief book, and not paying surcharge? I am informed that surcharging is not at all an uncommon thing in England, and will the right hon. Gentleman state whether there is any case in which a man has been thrown into gaol for three months because he has not paid surcharge? If he can state that he will certainly rescue the Chief Secretary from a difficult position and render him substantial help. If he cannot do so I ask whether it is fair that this man, Timothy Clarke, should have been kept in prison for three months, to the ruin of his business as a cattle dealer, for non-payment of a small surcharge? I am informed that Kirwan was prosecuted at the same time as Eyre. He was also prosecuted a second time, and the Friend who supplied me with the information simply confounded the two prosecutions. On the second prosecution Mr. Kirwan was thrown into prison for a month for non-payment of surcharge, and treated as an ordinary prisoner. Clarke was not treated as an ordinary prisoner, but as a first-class misdemeanant, I believe. I would invite the President of the Local Government Board in England to give the law and practice here in regard to this matter.

(5.35.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The hon. Gentleman has appealed to me to state whether or not any imprisonment takes place in England for neglecting to comply with an order of the Local Government Board with regard to surcharge. I have not known, during the time I have held the office which I now hold, anything of the kind requiring to be done. The Local Government Board have, undoubtedly, in my time made surcharges, but they have been paid.

MR. DILLON: Are there many instances in which the surcharges have not been paid for a long time? Has the right hon. Gentleman ever known a man thrown into prison for not paying?

MR. RITCHIE: I have answered the question, that I cannot say what has been done. During the time I have been President of the Local Government Board I have not known of anyone imprisoned for non-compliance with an order for surcharge by the Local Government Board. More than that I cannot say. The surcharges have, of course, been paid.

(5.36.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): The question is whether surcharge is not dealt with differently in different cases. I will tell you what occurred in Cork. The Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum was surcharged by the Castle Authorities, and for upwards of two years the money was not paid. But the Chairman of the Cork Lunatic Asylum is a Conservative—a high Tory of the city of Cork. The Dublin Castle Authorities, I would point out, imprisoned a Nationalist, but let off their Conservative friends. I would like the Chief Secretary to pay attention to this matter, and to answer it if he possibly can. Is it not the fact that Mr. Morgan and some of the members of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum were surcharged and allowed time to pay?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Sir, I ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is not the constant practice in England to remit surcharges in certain cases, and to allow long periods for payment; whether it is the practice, in the case of a poor struggling man, to pounce down upon him, and to put him into gaol for a number of months simply because he has not paid the surcharge?

MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board can remit surcharges on two grounds—legal and technical—in which the circumstances are such as to justify remission. There is no disposition, of course, to press unnecessarily in regard to the time at which the surcharge is to be paid.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us a statement as to the amount of the surcharges remitted by the English Local Government Board within the last three years?

MR. RITCHIE: If I can, Sir, I shall be glad to give any information I can when the Vote comes on.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly ask one of his clerks, before the Local Government Vote is disposed of, to say whether any person has been imprisoned in England for surcharge?

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman also, if convenient, give a Return of the number of cases in Ireland where surcharges have been made, and whether they have been remitted or not?

MR. RITCHIE: I cannot make any statement with regard to facts in Ireland.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Why not?

MR. RITCHIE: Because I have no knowledge whatever of them.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Could the right hon. Gentleman not refer to his friend the Chief Secretary?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is not in my Department.

(5.40.) MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what course he intends to pursue with regard to the Nationalist Press in Ireland?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The discussion is on the Local Government Board Vote, and unless the hon. Member is going to speak of the Nationalist Press in relation to that Vote he will be out of order.

MR. KILBRIDE: The point I wish to raise is this. By direction of the Local Government Board the ordinary advertisements of the Carlow Board of Guardians, under the Labourers' Act, have been refused to the local Nationalist paper, and given to the local Conservative paper. As a matter of fact, the Nationalist paper has 10 times the circulation of the Conservative paper. I have a letter from Mr. Condon, owner and editor of the Carlow Nationalist paper, in which he says—

"Some time ago it became necessary to publish official advertisements relating to the Labourers' Act in Carlow Union, and although the Guardians of the Union, who have to pay for such advertisements, expressed by formal resolution their wish to have the advertisement published in the local Nationalist newspaper, as well as in the Conservative organ, the Local Government Board refused to accede to their wishes."

Now, I wish to know whether Local Boards are to be prevented from having their advertisements published in the Nationalist newspapers? I ask what is the reason of this? Is it on the ground that the proprietors or editors of some of these newspapers have been, or may still be, in gaol as criminals, that they are not allowed to have these advertisements? If so, I beg to say that Mr. Condon was not in gaol for any offence under the Criminal Law Procedure Act; he was confined under the Act we have been discussing, namely, that of Edward III., and because he refused to admit that he was a criminal, and to ask for bail, he was practically told by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary—"I will do all in my power to prevent your earning or your obtaining your ordinary means of livelihood." Does the right hon. Gentleman expect that mean and petty action of that kind will tend to allay public feeling against the Government in the districts where these things are done, or in any way aid the cause of law and order? I would here remind the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Condon was confined for two months in gaol for having reported a speech made by myself, a speech which was published without note or comment. It was said that a school was boycotted on that occasion owing to that publication, and that it was boycotted in order to lead to the amalgamation of two schools in the same neighbourhood, so as to enable them to get the grant; but I am glad to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the schoolmistress of the second school is going next week to America, and that we shall be without both schoolmaster and schoolmistress for a short time to come. I would, however, ask the right hon. Gentleman does he want anything more of the same kind? I would also draw his attention to the fact that on the occasion of Mr. Condon's trial it was sworn that his paper did not reach the locality referred to until the Monday following the day of its publication, at the end of the week in which it was issued, that the school was boycotted on the Tuesday, and that the circulation of the paper had nothing directly or indirectly to do with the boycotting. I also put it to the Committee, whether a journalist who merely reports public events, and has had nothing to do with the matters charged, has any right to be treated by the right hon. Gentleman in the paltry and vindictive spirit which has been displayed towards him.

(5.48.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I would remind the Committee that last Friday evening I brought this very question under notice, but that, owing to the peculiar facility the right hon. Gentleman has for overlooking things which are important to the issues involved, and passing on to other matters to which his sublime attention is more congenially directed, he did not allude to the case reported in the Cork Examiner to which I then referred. I pointed out that the editor of the paper had expurgated his offence, whatever it may have been, and now it has been explained that the offence consisted merely in the refusal to give bail. There were two cases—those of the Cork Examiner and the Cork Herald—which I brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman. They are two papers published in an important city in the south of Ireland—a city having 80,000 inhabitants—these papers circulating over the province of Munster, and having been boycotted by the Local Government Board, so that the advertisements of the Cork Union were confined to a Conservative paper, owned by friends of the right hon. Gentleman, and circulating only among a few select people in the south of Ireland. This is not only unjust to the boycotted newspapers, but also to the people who read them, as well as to the contractors who send in tenders, because they do not see the advertisements in the papers they read. I say that this complaint applies not only to the Local Government Board, but to the Fisheries Board, and all the other Boards and Departments under the management of the right hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless we are constantly seeing the right hon. Gentleman turning up his eyes at the boycotting which prevails in Ireland. Why, Sir, we can point to documentary evidence showing that orders are issued by the Boards in Dublin under the management of the right hon. Gentleman that the advertisements are to be given only to those papers which are of the political colour the right hon. Gentleman approves of. At any rate, I think the right hon. Gentleman ought at least to accord to us the courtesy of noticing the complaints we make, and not to confine himself to the making of sensational speeches on those points that are really of no great importance, while he entirely overlooks and passes by matters that are of very much importance, and upon which we are anxious to obtain information. Under these circumstances, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider the speech of my hon. Friend.

(5.50) Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I do not desire, on behalf of the Nationalist Press of Ireland, to claim any favour from the right hon. Gentleman; but they do claim justice, and the ratepayers also demand justice, at the hands of the Government. This boycotting of the Nationalist Press not only works unfairly for the newspaper proprietors, but it also operates unfairly towards the people who pay the rates of the country. I will give the Committee an instance of this. There was an important meeting in the county of Dungarvan not long ago convened by the Local Government Board, and Inspectors were sent down. The meeting was advertised in two of the local Conservative papers, not half a dozen copies of which circulated in that county, or in the neighbourhood of Dungarvan. I asked the right hon. Gentleman why a matter which intimately concerned the ratepayers of that district was not advertised in the papers which circulated there, and he said he understood that the proprietors of those papers had been guilty of breaking the law, and that the Government did not intend to insert any of their advertisements in those papers. Now, the guilt of these persons amounted to this—that they had inserted in their papers reports of the so-called suppressed branches of the League. I think, Sir, the proceedings of the Local Government Board with regard to surcharge afford a good illustration of the way in which Irish grievances are attended to by the Government. They are never tired of telling us that the grievances of the Irish people, when brought forward by their Representatives, will be attended to. On this question of surcharge we have again and again asked that the same law as is applied to England shall be applied to Ireland, namely, that there should be some kind of appeal; but, although the Government acknowledge the principle to be correct, they have done nothing to put it in operation in Ireland. In our country the auditors are appointed, not because of their fitness for the office, but because of the hatred they bear to the Irish people, and these gentlemen have no hesitation in surcharging the Nationalist Guardians, while the ex officio and Conservative Guardians are allowed to go scot free. I was surcharged in this way myself, and it so happened that Sir Robert Paul, my predecessor, had signed cheques for similar payments in previous years, but had escaped surcharge. When, however, he saw that I was so surcharged, Sir Robert Paul came forward, and by some pressure which he brought to bear, I was not forced to pay the surcharge. While I am on my feet I wish to draw attention to another matter which has been repeatedly brought forward in this House. I allude to the system of sending aged and infirm poor back to Ireland, to end their days there, after they have spent the best part of their lives in this country. For my part, I should be happy to approve of any arrangement which would enable these poor people to end their lives in the country from which they have been expelled; but I would point out that the question is an important one locally——

THE CHAIRMAN: This subject is not under the control of the Local Government Board of Ireland.

MR. P. J. POWER: But we are in the habit of writing to them and receiving communications from them upon it. At any rate, you have the power in this country of sending paupers who may be of Irish parentage, but who have been out of Ireland nearly half a century, over to us to be supported by us, and although we have in our unions a great many English poor, we have no right to send them over here. Of course, if you, Sir, consider that this question is not appropriate to the subject of the Vote under discussion, I will not proceed with it, but I think some reference should be made by the right hon. Gentleman to the Irish Press question, and the reason why he refuses to insert advertisements in those papers which are published and have the largest circulation in the districts affected.

(6.0.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the point raised by the hon. Member, that the Government are bound by the statute, and the alteration he desires is an alteration which it is not within the power of the Local Government Board to bring about. With regard to the action of the Local Government Board respecting advertisements in the papers in Ireland, I have only to say what I think I have said on one or two preceding occasions, namely, that the principle which governs the Irish Administration in this matter is simply that Government advertisements ought not to be sent to papers which habitually break the law.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): Who decides that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Those who send the advertisements. Politics are not regarded as long as newspapers do not break the law. I do not know that I have anything to add to that, and I think the Committee in general approves of the broad lines of the policy laid down by the Government in the matter.

*(6.2.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): We do not accept the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman as in any way satisfactory, and I think the Committee will see in this matter an apt illustration of the unfairness with which Nationalists are treated by the officials of Dublin Castle. I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman lays down the principle that if any newspaper in any part of the country is punished for any offence against the law that newspaper is never again to receive a Government advertisement. The Government Departments, as I understand, do not farm out these advertisements as a matter of justice or favour to one paper or another in any of these three kingdoms. By certain statutes the Government Departments are bound to give notice to the people of certain things. They are bound, as a simple ministerial duty, to send the advertisements to those newspapers which do reach the people. If not, they are not giving notice to the people, and in spirit, if not in letter, they are breaking the statutes. It is a monstrous thing that gentlemen in the Local Government Board Office, who do not profess to be able to exercise judicial functions, should take upon themselves the task of judging what is and what is not an offence against the law of the land. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman will admit that some newspapers in the north of Ireland have, from time to time, broken the law. I suppose he will admit that the Belfast News Letter has called upon people to break the law. Does the right hon. Gentleman say that, under these circumstances, that newspaper ought to get the Government advertisements? I suppose there are scores of newspapers in these three Kingdoms that have committed the offence of criminal libel. Does the right hon. Gentleman say that not one of these papers is a fit receptacle for Government advertisements, or does he draw a distinction between one sort of offence and another? I suppose the distinction the right hon. Gentleman draws is that a criminal libel is an offence against the law of the land, and a conspiracy under the Crimes Act is an offence against the law of the right hon. Gentleman. Very often, for simply giving the people of a district a plain account of what had happened in the district, an Irish newspaper proprietor is branded by the Local Government Board as a person unfit to receive a Government contract. The action of the Local Government Board is simply and solely a bit of political persecution. It is contrary to the spirit of the law under which the Board act, for, by giving advertisements to papers with little or no circulation, they do not give that notice to the people which they are bound by law to give. Now, Sir, who are the gentlemen on the Local Government Board who are laying down these principles? There is an interesting publication called The Financial Reform Almanack, which gives the relationship of Members of this House with Members of the Upper House. I should like to see the principle of these Returns applied to the Local Government Board. I do not want to see the relationship to Members of the Upper House especially given, but I should like to see established the relationship between the different officials and members of the clique who have the supreme command in Dublin. You have a member of the great family of Morris, a member of the distinguished family of Gibson, and a brother of the gentleman who is chiefly distinguished by the fact that he has been, from time immemorial, the Conservative candidate for the City of Limerick. You have numbers of men who have obtained their posts simply because they are related to people who are in authority. And now, having got their posts in this way—for services as Party hacks, or for the services of their brothers as Party hacks—they purport to exercise and to assume a judicial function in deciding which newspapers in Ireland are fit to receive Government advertisements, and which are not. I maintain that that is preposterous. It is another matter which shows the intolerance of the clique who really rule Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, by one title or another—sometimes as Chief Secretary, sometimes as President of the Local Government Board—is supposed to rule Ireland, but he does not do so. The actual control of the Administration is not with the right hon. Gentleman, but with the various hacks who do the things that the right hon. Gentleman has to defend in this House. I desire to call attention to the action of an auditor of the Local Government Board in allowing an improper payment by the Grand Jury of the County of Cavan, under circumstances in which no such payment would have been allowed had it been made by a Representative Body on which Nationalists were in the majority. It may, or may not, be known to this House that there is a difference in the mode in which the expenses of children sent to Reformatories and children sent to Industrial Schools in Ireland are paid. In the case of Reformatories, the Grand Jury or the Urban or Municipal Authority, as the case may be, is bound to pay the cost of the maintenance of the children; but in the case of Industrial Schools the Local Authority has an option. It may, if it likes, contribute to the support of the children, but it is not obliged to do so. Now, in the county of Cavan, although the vast majority of the cesspayers are Catholic, there is a Protestant majority on the Grand Jury, and for 16 years in succession it has absolutely refused to pay a farthing for Catholic children in Industrial Schools, on the ground that there is a Standing Order of the Grand Jury against payments for children in Industrial Schools. For eight years out of the 16, however, in spite of continual protest, the Grand Jury made grants to Protestant Industrial Schools. I consider that that is a scandalous instance of bigotry and intolerance. That is not all. Year after year the Grand Jury entered this payment to Protestant Industrial Schools in the published abstract of presentments as if it were a payment to a Reformatory. The entry ran "The Meath Protestant Reformatory" so much. The Auditor of the Local Government Board must have known that there was no such thing as a Meath Protestant Reformatory. He must have known it, for he had to audit payments in different parts of the country to the Meath Industrial School as an Industrial School time after time.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In what year was this?

*MR. KNOX: This has been done for eight years. The improper audit occurred in every one of the eight years. The Grand Jury have not passed any such presentment this year owing to the attention which has been drawn to the subject in this House, but the improper payment was improperly allowed in the year last past. I do not make any charge against this Protestant Industrial School, as I happen to know that the managers discharged their duties satisfactorily and sent in the forms in a straightforward way, describing the institution as an Industrial School. The Grand Jury, however, falsified the Return, putting down the payment as if made to a reformatory. That is a fraud, and should have been prevented by the auditor. What is an auditor for if he is not to stop a fraud of that kind? If the Town Council of the city of Dublin were to perpetrate such a fraud we should have the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) on every platform throughout the Kingdom, denouncing the intolerance of the Irish Catholics. I appeal to the Chief Secretary to say a word or two in condemnation of the intolerance and fraud of the Cavan Grand Jury, although they are amongst his own supporters.

(6.18.) MR. M. HEALY: As the right hon. Gentleman has not risen to explain the remarkable incident referred to by my hon. Friend, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to explain how the Irish Local Government Board discharges the extraordinary duty cast on it of acting as censor over the Irish newspapers, finding out which of them keeps the law, and which of them breaks it. I say that as this censorship over newspapers by the Local Government Board affects the fortunes and property of a great many Irish newspapers, we are entitled to further information from the Chief Secretary. We have it from the right hon. Gentleman that the Local Government Board, instead of having regard to the circulation of a newspaper and the fitness of the medium for the advertisement before it gives an advertisement, endeavours to find out, as the right hon. Gentleman says, whether the newspaper "is breaking the law or not." I want to know how they discharge that function? In what way do they proceed to ascertain the facts? Do they keep a file of the newspapers and submit it to their legal adviser? They have a legal adviser—a distinguished Irish lawyer—and I want to know is it on his advice that they act in discharging this important function? I have always thought that it is for the Courts to decide whether or not the law is broken, but that old maxim, like a great many other old maxims, does not hold with the present Government of Ireland. I say we want some little further information. We want to know whether—say in the case of the Cork Examiner or the Cork Herald—where they are accused of having broken the law, an opportunity is given to the editor or proprietors of being heard in their own defence. I apprehend not. We know it is said these papers are not loyal, but, notwithstanding that, I submit that the proprietors should have some right of appeal when the Local Government Board undertakes to decide a legal issue. These are the extraordinary incidents to which the Minute of the right hon. Gentleman, which we have heard of for the first time to-night, has given rise. I think that when the right hon. Gentleman comes down to this House and declares that instead of dealing with the questions of Poor Law and out-door relief, the Local Government Board go into investigations as to how far the Criminal Law of Ireland has been observed or been broken, we are entitled to some information as to the lines upon which the Local Government Board proceeds.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to the hon. Members I would say that no judicial functions are undertaken by the Local Government Board. As President of that Board I am directly and solely responsible for the principles laid down as regards the granting of these advertisements, and if blame attaches to anyone it attaches to me. I contend, however, that no blame attaches to me or to anyone else. I think that the Board would be going beyond their duty, and beyond what is just, if they were to consider the political complexion of any newspaper. I quite admit that general principle, but it would be equally absurd to expect them to give these advertisements to papers which they cannot conceal from themselves are in the habit of violating a perfectly well-understood law.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What law?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The law of the land. I do not believe that advertisements have ever been refused in a case where it could be seriously contended that the law had not been broken by the newspaper in question. No such case has been or can be adduced. If anyone thinks that this is being done in the case of a paper which has not broken the law—if they will bring it to my notice the matter will be examined into and full justice done.

MR. M. HEALY: No answer has been made to the criticisms of myself and my hon. Friends. If the proprietors of papers have broken the law, what is the branch of the law against which they have offended? Is it murder, or forgery, or any other of the numerous offences which find a place under the wide and sweeping term "the law of the land"? Let us take the case of the Cork Herald or Cork Examiner. What branch of the law has the proprietor of either of these papers broken? Yet they are subjected to this mean and contemptible device of boycotting. Another branch of the law is criminal libel. Is that the particular branch of the law of the land which the Irish newspapers who are refused Government advertisements have violated? It is no answer for the right hon. Gentleman to say, "The newspapers have been violating the law of the land," unless we are told what branch of the law of the land it is they have been violating. If the proprietors of the papers I have named have been guilty of illegality how is it that no member of their staff has been prosecuted? We all know that the Chief Secretary is a firm upholder of law and order, and would not allow illegality to go on for years and years without taking some steps to vindicate it. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman cannot regard the mean and contemptible device of stopping advertisements as the best means of vindicating the law. If the law has been broken, why does he not prosecute the proprietors of these newspapers? The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the officials of the Local Government Board undertake to hear and determine in camera the question whether newspapers have broken the law. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell me in what manner the Cork Herald or the Cork Examiner have broken the law, and why, if they have broken it, proceedings have not been taken against them?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*(6.32.) MR. KNOX: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a few plain questions. The first is whether the rule he has laid down that no paper, the proprietor of which has committed a crime, is to get Government advertisements, is applicable to every crime? Does it apply to the crime of libel in England as much as to the crime of conspiracy or the publication of meetings of suppressed branches of the League in Ireland? Has he considered, with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the English Local Government Board, whether the same principle is to apply to advertisements issued by the English Board? If it is to be applied to both countries, we in Ireland will have no special ground of complaint. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman lays down that the rule shall only be applicable to Ireland, I want to know what becomes of his promises of equal laws for England and Ireland? I should like to know also how the right hon. Gentleman is giving notice of events of which he is bound to give notice in districts where the only newspapers with any considerable circulation are papers which, according to his theory, have broken the law? Is he going to publish official newspapers for the purpose of bringing the advertisements before the public? And if the right hon. Gentleman deigns to answer these questions, he might also give some reply as to the case of religious intolerance which I brought before him, and which, owing no doubt to inadvertence and not to intentional discourtesy, he has omitted to mention.

(6.35.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): A surprising statement was made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary a short time ago. He said that no question of politics entered into this matter. That reminds one of the statement that no question of religion enters into Jury-packing. If no question of politics enters into the question, how is it that everywhere throughout Ireland, since the right hon. Gentleman has been and before he was at the Irish Office, the only newspapers that have got the Government advertisements are the Conservative papers? We know that in every department of Dublin Castle the officials discuss among themselves what are the politics of the various newspapers, and in every case, unless there be special reason to the contrary, we know that the fact of a paper being Nationalist or not decides the question whether it is to get the advertisements. It is utterly ridiculous and preposterous to pretend the reverse. We know that the question of politics enters into the matter of giving advertisements, and we shall not hesitate to express our opinion here with regard to it on every possible occasion. The thing has been aggravated, and the injustice and scandal have become perfectly flagrant under the administration of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman asked for a case in which advertisements have been refused to a newspaper that has not broken the law. There is the case of Mr. Condon, the proprietor of the Carlow Nationalist. He was merely asked to give securities for good behaviour, and, as has been admitted in this House, that is not even a punishment. It was not alleged that he had broken the law, and he has not broken the law since, because if he had, I suppose the right hon. Gentleman would have prosecuted him under his Coercion Act. Then there is the case of the Leinster Leader. What crime has that paper committed that it should be deprived of all the Government advertisements? It will not do for the right hon. Gentleman to ride off on State platitudes and generalities, by saying that no man is deprived of an advertisement who does not break the law, when he knows that, as a matter of fact, the assertion is completely without foundation.

(6.40.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): When the right hon. Gentleman expressed surprise at the suggestion that politics were taken into consideration in deciding in what newspapers these advertisements should be inserted, he seems to have forgotten the admissions which, since he has been a Member of the House, has been more than once made from that Bench. Some years ago, the distribution of advertisements was looked upon as one of the spoils of office; for with the event of a new Government, a new list of newspapers to which the Government advertisements were to be given was drawn up in every large public Department. It is only within comparatively recent years that the system was abandoned in this country, and a general approved list of newspapers, irrespective of politics, to which Government advertisements were given, was adopted and sanctioned by the Treasury. The system which used to be recognised in this country, and is now abandoned, is still in full force in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman says he is responsible for what he calls the principle involved in the Minute; but he went on to say that the Local Government Board had full discretion in the matter. It is with a very large amount of discrimination and discretion that the principle involved in the Minute of the right hon. Gentleman is applied in Ireland. It is applied in such a way that a considerable number of narrowly circulating newspapers are kept in existence. There are a number of small papers in Ireland which could not continue without the subsidy which is given to them by means of public money, partly through the Local Government Board. But I object to the passing of this Vote without distinctive challenge on wide grounds. The Local Government Board is charged with the duty of looking after the administration of the Poor Law in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman justifies the dismissal of the Cork Board of Guardians and their displacement by three salaried officers on the ground that the Board neglected their duty. My charge against the Local Government Board is that it neglects its duty as a Board. Its administration is not only of an autocratic but of a very selfish character. One would suppose that the chief care of the officers of the Local Government Board was to secure themselves in the salaries which they draw, and that the duties which they are supposed to discharge are matters of a very slight importance in comparison. Of the £39,000 or £40,000 which is asked for £31,000 is set down for salaries. If the Local Government Board in Ireland had discharged its duty to the poor people their condition would be very different. One of the well recognised and fundamental principles of the Poor Law administration in this country is proper classification and separation of the inmates of the workhouse. I invite any one to inspect some of the workhouses in the West of Ireland. There he will find there is no classification whatsoever worthy of the name. It is perfectly true that there is a division of the sexes. The adult males are separated from the adult females, but the playground used by the children of both sexes is also used by the insane females. The Local Government Board has had its attention directed to the point year after year for the last 10 years, and yet the same bad system continues. Take the case of the food of the people. There is a Return in the Library of the House, which I moved for some years ago, and which sets forth the amount of food and its kind in each of the unions in Ireland. The quantities shown in that Return are startling. I have had a rough analysis or commutation made of the amount of nutritive elements in the quantities of food allowed to the poor people, and I am assured by competent medical authorities that the supply of nitrogen and carbon in the bread and milk allowed is not sufficient to keep an adult person in normal health even without any labour at all. The people in the workhouses, especially in the West, are kept on so low a scale of diet that it is marvellous how they continue to live at all. The condition of the people is deplorable, not only in regard to food and want of classification, but also in regard to the life they lead in these institutions. To see men wandering about aimlessly and hopelessly unoccupied from morning to night is something shocking. You have Inspectors whose duty it is to see to the condition of these people. What have these Inspectors ever reported about the want of occupation? Not a word. Another branch of the Poor Law administration is the supply of medicines to the poor. In this Vote you ask for salaries for Medical Inspectors. I should suppose one of the elementary duties of these Medical Inspectors is to see that the medicines are what they ought to be. I submit that that is an absolute impossibility, at any rate in some cases. I hold in my hand a list of the prices which one Board of Guardians have recently accepted as contract prices for the supply of drugs to the workhouses, and also a list of the prices charged for the same articles at the Apothecaries' Hall, where the prices are regarded as trustworthy and standard. For spirits of ammonia the Apothecaries' Hall charge 3s. a lb., but the drug is supplied to the Board of Guardians in question at 1s. per lb. Camphor liniment is charged for at the Apothecaries' Hall at the rate of 2s. 8d. per lb., but it is supplied to the Guardians at 8d. per lb. Cod liver oil is supplied by contract at 2s. 6d., whereas at the Apothecaries' Hall the charge is 6s. Mercury pills cost 2s. 8d. per lb. at the Apothecaries' Hall, but under contract the charge is 10d. per lb. The charges in the case of ointment are respectively 2s. 6d. and 1s. The fact is that what the contractor supplies are inferior or spoiled articles which are of no value whatever for remedial purposes. Connected with this matter is another: the places at many of the dispensaries in which the drugs are kept are quite unfitted for the purpose. Many of them are exceedingly damp, and the Local Government Board Inspectors seem to take absolutely no notice of the condition of the places. Even when the drugs have lost all their virtue they are dispensed. Again, I would like to say a word as to the removal of paupers of Irish birth from Great Britain to Ireland, while there is no corresponding relief for Ireland in the case of English people who have got into Irish workhouses. What is the use of the Reports made upon this subject if the Government is never to be moved. Over and over again the Local Government Board has reported upon the extreme grievance on this particular point under which Ireland suffers. The Chief Secretary has admitted the grievance in this House within the last month. The Attorney General for Ireland has admitted the grievance, yet we have a continuance of it. The grievance has been removed in England and Scotland, but Ireland is still left to suffer in the matter. In a workhouse in my own constituency there is a family of persons. There are five children, not one of whom was born in Ireland; and yet, because the father happened to be born in Ireland—he was employed in Deptford—the wife and these children, who were left in Glasgow, were transported to the charge of the Letterkenny Union. The injustice of that is recognised by the Government, but they decline to bring forward any measure to put a stop to it. The poor of Ireland are utterly neglected by the Local Government Board. For the reasons I have mentioned I cannot allow this Vote to pass without any challenge. I, therefore, beg to move to reduce Item A by the sum of £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries and Wages, be reduced by £2,000."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

(6.56.) DR. TANNER: There are one or two points in connection with this Vote I desire to refer to. Colonel Speight is the Inspector of the Board told off to attend the Cork Union. Upon the occasion of his visits to the City he always frequents the most Conservative places. He takes up his quarters at one of the Conservative Clubs in the City, and dates his letters from there. It would be much more decent if an official paid by all parties took up his quarters at a more fitting place. The salaries of four Medical Inspectors are asked for in the Vote. I cannot help thinking one Medical Inspector could do all the work. What is the use of engaging four Medical Inspectors who all live in Dublin, and only leave that city upon very special occasions indeed. It is ridiculous to draw such salaries for medical inspection. I can speak with emphasis from my own experience when I say that usually when these Inspectors come down to a locality their work is practically nil. They have nothing to do. They come as a matter of form and ceremony, and they sit in a chair by the Chairman of the Board for half-an-hour, and then they go back again, having done their duty for that day. I am really convinced that two if not one Medical Inspector would be sufficient for all the Poor Law business. Then, again, there are the Engineering Inspectors and the Assistant Engineer Inspector. What their duties are I scarcely know, for we never meet them anywhere. I am happy in the acquaintance of one of these gentlemen, and I know that he has a fair salary, and that he has other business. Two of these Inspectors get £600 between them and their expenses being paid, but it is simply ridiculous that this money should be paid for doing no work. I cannot but think that if some inquisition were made into these Estimates we should find that many of these salaries are simply means by which return is made for services rendered to the Government or the Tory Party in the past, and there is ample verge for largely cutting down expenditure. Certainly, I am at one with my hon. Friend who has moved in this matter. I know that a number of these gentlemen are enormously overpaid, with little or nothing to do. I can only speak now as an ex-Poor Law Guardian, for my occupation is gone, the right hon. Gentleman having suppressed our Board, but I can say that during a four years' attendance on the Cork Board I do not recollect the attendance of an Engineering Inspector, and the only occasion when I have found one at work was recently at Limerick. Something certainly ought to be done in the way of retrenchment under this Vote. With two Inspectors drawing £300 each I do not think it can be necessary to appoint a temporary Assistant Engineering Inspector at £100. I am convinced that this Vote covers a great waste of public money, money which is simply paid away for the purpose of keeping Toryism alive in Ireland. It is a feeble and unsuccessful attempt too. I sincerely hope that full light will be thrown upon this matter, and that the English people will come to understand it.

(7.5.) Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(7.10.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 182; Noes 118.—(Div. List, No. 187.)

Question put accordingly, "That Item A, Salaries and Wages, be reduced by £2,000."

(7.20.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 124; Noes 186.—(Div. List, No. 188.)

Whereupon Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Original Question be now put."

Original Question put accordingly,

"That a sum, not exceeding £102,602, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board in Ireland, including various Grants in Aid of Local Taxation," and agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(7.30.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I think the system under which this Vote is left to be explained and decided by the Secretary to the Treasury is a very injurious one to the very important interests which are dealt with in Ireland by the Board of Works. The Secretary to the Treasury is, from the nature of his position, unable to devote that attention to questions connected with the Irish Board of Works that might be expected from officials on the spot, and we always feel that in pressing him for information, that although we have to acknowledge his uniform courtesy and his willingness to do the best he can, yet that his good intentions do not cover his failure to deal with important subjects in a manner to which they are justly entitled. The responsibility of the Treasury, of course, in reference to matters connected with public works is great and important. I do not criticise the right of the Treasury to be represented on this Department to the fullest extent, but I think that an arrangement which practically leaves the whole care of this Department to the right hon. Gentleman, and the defence of its work and proceedings to him, is most faulty and not entirely to the advantage of the Board of Works, preventing a satisfactory result being arrived at. The Government of Ireland is a government by Boards. We are the most be-Boarded country in the world, and instead of having all these Boards represented by the Chief Secretary and the Secretary to the Treasury, we require, at least, two or three Ministers whose duty it should be to deal with the important subjects that come under the consideration of Parliament in connection with these Boards. This is especially true as regards the Board of Works, the Government Engineering Department for Ireland. Ireland is a country which requires greater attention, greater knowledge, and capacity in an Engineering Department than any country with which I am acquainted, owing to the backwardness of its resources, the total want of development of industrial works, and other circumstances, with which the Committee have been made familiar from time to time. We have a very good illustration of the want of attention and want of knowledge on this Board in what has not happened,—we have had no introduction or explanation of this Vote. This is a Vote for £37,000 for the salaries of this Government Engineering Board, to which is entrusted such important matters as the direction and construction of sea harbours, piers for fishery purposes, the issue of loans to tenants under the Land Act for the improvement of their holdings, and, further, the direction, to a very large extent, of the policy involved in the construction of Light Railways in Ireland. Yet we have had not a word of introduction or explanation from the Chief Secretary or the Secretary to the Treasury. I should have thought that on the occasion of introducing this very interesting subject, a subject which the Chief Secretary has specially marked as his own, the discussion of the expenses of this Engineering Board, which has for its duty the superintendence of these works for the improvement of the industrial resources of Ireland, upon which the Chief Secretary counts so much, we should have had some general statement as to the work of the past 12 months. But we are left absolutely to pass the Vote without any explanation or information as to the current year, except such as is contained in this small paper which has been issued. We are without information on these three important subjects, to which I have alluded, the erection of fishery piers, loans to tenants for the improvement of their holdings, and the intention of the Government as to the construction of Light Railways and Tramways in Ireland. Now, I am not myself competent to go into any of these subjects, for the simple reason that I am without information. I know something of the Board of Works in times past, I know something of its failures in reference to particular works that have come under my knowledge, but again and again we have complained strongly of the total absence of information with which we are asked to approach this Vote, either from documents or statement, by the official charged with getting the Vote through the House. With regard to the question of Fishery Piers and Harbours, of which I shall have to say something in detail by-and-by, I want to say generally that I think it would be most desirable if the Chief Secretary would obtain some information for the House before next Session, so that we may know what we are about. He has placed in the Land Purchase Bill a clause of a very vague and nebulous character relating to fishing in the West of Ireland, of a skeleton character, which I suppose is intended to be filled in, and I earnestly hope that in the interval before we have this Bill before us, he will take steps to inform himself and this House as to the capacity of the Irish coasts for the development of sea fisheries, and as to the necessity which exists for the extension of work begun in 1883, and for which a sum of £250,000 was voted by Parliament for fishing piers and harbours, how far the work has been successful for the object in view, how far the money has been properly spent. I would suggest that he should appoint a Royal Commission for obtaining this information, by evidence taken on different parts of the coasts, so that when we meet again Parliament may have a record of the work of the Department. I would also suggest that proposals for this subject should be kept apart from other matters in the Purchase Bill, and dealt with free from political excitement and prejudice. The development of sea fisheries in Ireland is a matter of enormous importance to the country, and it is an object upon which Imperial money might be advantageously laid out, judiciously and after suitable inquiry. A proposal of the kind might result in benefit to the country and satisfaction to this House. It is a subject removed from Party politics, and one which, if the Government obtained full and necessary information, might well be dealt with in the coming Session. With regard to the Board of Works, and its failures from an engineering point of view, I regret, I exceedingly dislike, to be obliged to attack by name any officials in Ireland connected with the Board, and I do not propose to do so on the present occasion. I desire to hurt nobody's feelings, but I state, as a fact which has been abundantly proved, that the Board of Works has failed, both in design and in execution, with regard to the works entrusted to its care, and the money of Parliament has been scandalously wasted in a fashion which, as regards those instances which have come under my knowledge, appears to me most extraordinary and unreasonable. It is impossible to suppose that the mistakes of the Board are entirely due to ignorance, and I am driven to believe that the incapacity is due to a want of care on the part of the permanent officials, who are directly accountable to none, who have no representation in this House, and who, from long habit, have become careless as to the result of their actions. They simply sit in their office, make proposals, and draw plans, without any regard whatever to the actual local conditions, which ought to be considered before any engineering works are undertaken. I would instance two cases, with which I am well acquainted, as examples of the statement I have made as to incapacity or negligence in fulfilling the first duty of an Engineering Board. Let me take the example of Arklow Harbour, in County Wicklow. For the improvement of the fishery pier there Parliament in 1882 or 1883 voted a sum of £35,000. The result of that expenditure may be indicated by stating that where, according to the Admiralty charts, there was a depth of 20ft. of water at low tide before the expenditure, there is now only a depth of 4½ft. So your £35,000 have been spent in diminishing the depth of water at the entrance of the harbour by 15 or 16 feet, or at the rate of something over £2,000 for every foot shallowed. I believe this is the result going on all round the coast to a greater or less extent. It has certainly been the case with regard to the Harbour of Greystones, another example in County Wicklow. This harbour, before the expenditure of £13,000, had a depth of five or six feet at low tide, but a pier was built out into the sea, and the result has been to turn what was before pretty safe anchorage for small coasters into dry land. But, as I say, we are without information as to the expenditure of £250,000 upon fishery piers and harbours, of which Greystones is one. The Board of Works takes very good care not to give us this information in this Return of four pages put before us. They deprive us of the means of checking the conclusions they come to that the works are in good order, and that they have fulfilled the objects for which they were erected. The Return issued by the Board states that they have built 39 harbours and nine boat slips. The depth of water at low spring tides at the pier heads is given, but in 33 out of the 48 works the ground is dry at low spring tides at the heads of the piers. In eight of them there is a depth of from two to four feet, in eight a depth of from four to six feet, four from six to eight feet, one from eight to 10 feet, four from 10 to 12 feet, and one from 12 to 14 feet. So that out of the total number there are only 18 of sufficient depth to admit the ordinary class of fishing boats. In 33 there is no water at all at low spring tides, and in eight only a depth of from two to four feet, so that in 41 cases, the works are perfectly useless for the purpose for which they were projected. The Committee ought to be informed what is the state of things before more money is spent, and I hope that the Secretary to the Treasury will be able to mention some of the practical advantages which the fishermen and boatowners have gained by these works. So far as my information goes, the practical advantage is non-existent. There is too much reason to fear that this large sum of £250,000 has gone the way of the rest of the expenditure entrusted to the Board of Works in past years in works to a large extent useless, and often mischievous. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000.

THE CHAIRMAN: Before I put this reduction, I must point out that this is a Vote for the personnel of the office of the Board of Works, on which it is perfectly relevant to discuss the organisation and administration of the office; but there is a special Vote for the works themselves, and, therefore, to examine the details of the works, would not be relevant to the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £23,661, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. PARNELL: I may be allowed to explain that the object of my remarks, with regard to the works, was to impeach the designs of the engineers of the Board of Works. The construction of the works had probably been sound, and the materials good, but I chiefly complained of the selection of the sites and the designs adopted by the Board as unsuitable, and made without the knowledge of the local effect of the action of the tides, waves, and winds. I respectfully submit that, as far as the engineers of the Board of Works are concerned, I should be in order in discussing the policy of the designs, for which they are responsible, and that I should not be in order in discussing it on the question of the actual provision of the money for erecting the works in these places.

THE CHAIRMAN: I perfectly understood the purport of the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I did not interrupt him, because I thought he did keep within the scope of the Vote. My observation just now was to prevent, by anticipation, discussion travelling outside the Vote.

*(7.59.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have no reason to complain of the tone and manner in which the hon. Member has brought forward this question. It may be that some better plan might be found than that of making the Secretary to the Treasury answer for the Board of Works in Ireland. That is a question of policy which has been present in the minds of the Government for some time, and possibly arrangements might be made which would give the Government the assistance of some one with more detailed knowledge of the works of the Board than the Secretary to the Treasury can have. The hon. Member has just referred to Arklow, and he stated that formerly there were 20 feet of water where now there is much less. I have examined the Papers, and endeavoured to obtain the best information I could, both as to the condition of things which existed formerly, and that which exists now, and I think the facts show that before this pier was built, there was often very little water for boats coming into the harbour. I am glad to have the hon. Member's testimony that the work has been well constructed, and he has neither found fault with the material nor the construction. He makes complaint of the design and the situation. At the time when these plans were put forward, according to the information I have obtained, there was considerable local opposition to the building of the north groyne. The Board of Works, it is only fair to say, adhered to the opinion that a north groyne was necessary, so as to make a certain amount of scour from the river; and I am not prepared to say that the information I have received from them leads me to the conclusion that there will not be, from time to time, some bar made outside the harbour, but so far as the entrance to the harbour is concerned, I believe the position of matters is very much improved. The Board of Works have consistently adhered to the view that a north groyne is necessary to complete the work, and that it would enormously improve the entrance to the harbour.

MR. PARNELL: Will you build it?

*MR. JACKSON: Under the Special Act, which the hon. Gentleman has quoted, there is a certain amount to be applied; and the Act contains a clause that, if the expenditure includes a certain sum, any additional expenditure shall be borne by the locality. From time to time there have been negotiations with the view to obtain for the locality authority to go on with the work.

MR. PARNELL: The right hon. Gentleman perhaps knows that the locality were prepared to go on with a certain portion of the work. Was ever any proposal made to the locality to accept the whole burden rendered necessary by the engineering failure of the Board of Works?

*MR. JACKSON: I do not want to go too much into detail; but I am under the impression that that statement is not quite correct. I think there has been a suggestion made—

MR. PARNELL: Not by the Treasury.

*MR. JACKSON: As is known, there are on the spot blocks of concrete which clearly belong to the harbour works, and if it had been possible, while the works were in construction, to have utilised part of the plant of the contractor who built the main pier, no doubt a saving would have been effected as compared with what would be the case now, if these blocks were utilised. I believe the estimated value of the blocks is something like £4,000 or £5,000, and in all probability, according to the best information I can obtain, £4,000 or £5,000 additional would about cover the cost of building the north groyne. I hope it may be found possible in some way to complete this work, because we are entirely at one that this north groyne would be a great advantage and ought to be constructed. And it would, I think, have been constructed in the first instance had it not been for the local opposition. The hon. Member has referred to Greystones. I am willing to admit frankly that the work at Greystones has not been successful. I make the admission at once, because I honestly believe that it ought to be made; and, I believe, the Board of Works would be quite willing that I should make that admission. There have been difficulties, which some people, perhaps judging by the light of subsequent events, say should have been foreseen. With reference to the harbour at Greystones, I would remind the Committee that there has been a tremendous movement of shingle. I may note that the railroad at the top of the cliff has been taken further inland, the company finding it cheaper to undertake that work than to protect the cliff from the action of the sea.

MR. PARNELL: The movement of shingle has been always going on.

*MR. JACKSON : I know that some people hold the view that this movement of shingle ought to have been ascertained and appreciated at the time. I say comparatively little about that, because I do not believe I have got a very good answer. At the same time, I think there is this to be said, that the movement of shingle has been much more severe than was contemplated at the time, as evidenced by the removal of the railroad. As regards Greystones, I have done what I could to make myself acquainted with the facts. I have met the hon. Member for the division on the spot. I heard what the local people had to say, and the Board of Works suggested that a temporary groyne, such as may be seen round the south coast of England, should be thrown out, as a defence against the shingle tilting up. On the part of the Treasury, I sanctioned the expenditure for that; but the people of the locality objected to the work, on the ground that it would interfere with their fishing nets. The work was, therefore, abandoned. I make no complaint of the local opposition, because, if the people haul their nets along the coast in pursuit of their fishing industry, there is no doubt that such a work would be, to some extent, injurious. The question is, What is to be done? The Board of Works say there is only one course to be taken, and that is, to build another pier or groyne, so as to check the movement of the shingle. That is estimated to cost about £7,000; and I have been for some time endeavouring to make the best arrangements I could. I do not hesitate to say that I was sanguine of getting help from the locality at one time, but I have not been successful in that. I have been in communication with the Irish Government, who have a surplus at their disposal and I may say that I have obtained the sanction of the Irish Government to the expenditure on this groyne, and I hope that may prove successful. I have shown the Committee, I think, that, notwithstanding want of knowledge in such matters, I have endeavoured to do the best I could to remedy what, I am bound to admit, has been an unsuccessful work. I do not say the same about Arklow, because, as far as I can judge after visiting it, the work is a substantial work, and I hope that, if it be possible to build the north groyne, we may have a great improvement there. The hon. Member referred to the account which was presented to the House with a view of giving it full and detailed particulars on the expenditure of those fishery piers under the Sea Fisheries Fund, and he has criticised rather severely the design and situation of those piers. It is only fair to the Board of Works that I should say that, as far as the responsibility of that Board is concerned, it is entirely limited to carrying out the works approved by the Committee, because, as the hon. Member will have noticed, it is stated that the arrangement was, that the Fisheries Commissioners should recommend the sites, the works being carried out by the Board of Works. I believe it to be the fact that in all those schemes the action of the Board of Works has been limited to the preparation of the plans and designs for works to be erected on sites selected by the Fisheries Commissioner. Those plans and designs had to receive the approval of the Fisheries Commissioners before they were carried into effect; and when this approval was given the work was carried out under the control and superintendence of the Board of Works. I would here draw the attention of the Committee to a point which I cannot but feel redounds greatly to the credit of the Board of Works, and it is with regard to the manner in which they have carried out the works entrusted to them within the total amount of the Estimate. Everyone who understands anything about the matter will, I think, admit that large estimates for works connected with marine structures are necessarily of a somewhat hazardous character, and that it not unfrequently happens that works of this kind, especially when carried out on an extensive scale, as has been the case here, are not carried out within the estimates. In this particular case, however, the total original cost was estimated to be £239,215. These works have been carried out and completed, except in the case of four works which have since been inserted at a cost which would bring up the total estimate to £240,000. The Board of Works have done things that were not included in the original estimate, but which were found to be desirable during the progress of the works originally sanctioned. This additional work has cost nearly £20,000, yet it has all been done within the sum originally estimated. I have had some experience in carrying out marine estimates, and I repeat that from my experience it redounds to the credit of the Board of Works that they have been able to carry out those works practically within the estimates. Of course, there have been savings in some cases and excesses in others; but, taking them altogether, the works have practically been completed within the amount originally estimated. The hon. Member has called attention to the fact that a considerable number of these piers were dry at the entrance during low water. I may state that, according to the information given to me, out of 40 fishing piers in Scotland there are only two which have any water at low water in spring tides. I can also speak from my own knowledge of a good many places in England where a considerable amount of fishing is carried on there is also no water at the piers at low tides. I do not, however, believe that this fact seriously interferes with the fishing interest.

MR. PARNELL: Were those piers in Scotland carried out at the public expense?

*MR. JACKSON: They were carried out by means of money voted by Parliament; but I was going to show, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, that if it be a fact there is no water at some of these piers at low water at spring tides, this is not a condition which is at all unusual or exceptional, inasmuch as in many other districts the same condition of things appertains, and that notwithstanding the fishing which is carried on is reasonably successful. I think I have now answered the several points raised by the hon. Member. I hope I have given him satisfactory replies with regard to Grey-stones, and also with regard to Arklow, and that with regard to the carrying out of the works recommended by the Fisheries Commission. The Board of Works deserve not blame but credit for having effected those works within the original estimates and with but comparatively little complaint.

MR. PARNELL: What about the light railways?

*MR. JACKSON: I beg the hon. Member's pardon; I must accept the proposition put by the hon. Gentleman that it is desirable that something should be said with regard to them. I would, however, point out that I have already stated in answer to the hon. Member for Longford that the right time for making a statement with reference to the light railways would be on the discussion of the Vote for which the sum of £50,000 is provided. That is the only reason why a statement on the subject has not been made to-night. (8.25.)

(8.56.) MR. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): There are one or two points which have been touched upon by the Secretary to the Treasury about which I desire to say a word. He dwelt very much upon what he thought was the fact that the people of Arklow opposed the plans of the Board of Works. Now, I have in my hand a Memorial from the shipowners, merchants, and traders of Arklow, addressed to the Board of Works, and in it they say the plans of the Board of Works were objected to by a few people who were not of much account, and pray that—

“When a reference is made to you from the House of Commons or elsewhere, you will, in the interest of all concerned, and in justice to the guarantors, who were instrumental in getting the grant and loan, adhere to your original plan and, if any slight change is made, instead of abolishing the north groyne, raise it about two feet higher and insert in it a post to allow vessels to remain fast.”

Yet the right hon. Gentleman stated that the reason why the north groyne was not made was that the people of Arklow opposed it. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to complete the harbour at Arklow on the plan originally made. He stated just now that there were between £4,000 and £5,000 worth of concrete blocks unused. Those blocks are lying upon the shore now, and in addition to this loss there was £5,000 spent on the repair of the breakwater before it was more than half finished. My contention is that the £4,000 or £5,000 spent uselessly in making these blocks and the £5,000 spent in repairing the damage done would have been ample to complete the harbour according to the original scheme. Not a stone of the North Groyne has been laid. In fact, the debris of the old construction lies as an obstruction in the fair way, and it is a peril to the boats on coming in and going out. The people there are very heavily weighted by the £20,000 they guaranteed to pay, and seeing that almost £10,000 of the money provided in the first instance has become derelict, I do think the Treasury ought to complete the harbour according to the original design. After the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has dealt with the subject of Greystones, it would be ungracious of me to make any comments on it. We have had to wait a good while and to make many applications; but I thank courtesy the right hon. Gentleman for the and the invariable interest he has shown in the matter. To return to Arklow, the harbour works were badly done in the first instance, and I myself have seen the water washing through and through the pier. The fact that it was necessary to spend £5,000 in repairs is proof enough of how badly the work was done in the first instance. Considering the great interests that are involved, Arklow being the principal fishing station on the East Coast, I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will make an effort to have the works completed in accordance with the original contract.

(9.7.) MR. PINKERTON (Galway): The right hon. Gentleman said the responsibility of the Board of Works is confined to the plans and specifications.

*MR. JACKSON: No, I did not say that. I said our responsibility was limited to preparing the plans which were approved by the Fishery Commission, and to carry out the works.

MR. PINKERTON: Am I correct in understanding that the responsibility rests with the Board of Works of approving all the plans submitted to their consideration?

*MR. JACKSON: Well, of making them.

MR. PINKERTON: That is exactly the responsibility I wish to father on the Board of Works. I put a question on the Paper on Friday about Galway Harbour.

*MR. JACKSON: Of course, the harbour of Galway is not included in these Votes. It belongs to the Harbour Commissioners.

MR. PINKERTON: The position of this Harbour Board is very curious. They have incurred a debt to the Board of Works, who have appointed a receiver, and, therefore, I think I am entitled to consider the action of the Board on this subject under this Vote. I find that in 1880 £45,000 was borrowed from the Board of Works. Two engineers submitted plans to the Galway Harbour Commissioners, and Mr. Price was selected to execute the work.

*MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member is mistaken about that. The Harbour Commissioners employed an engineer to make plans. Those plans were submitted to the Board of Works, and the Board of Works was asked to lend money. The Board had no responsibility for the design.

MR. PINKERTON: I said two engineers were asked by the Commissioners to supply plans, and Mr. Price was finally selected to act as engineer. Plans and specifications were submitted to the Board of Works and approved by them, and £45,000 were expended in constructing a harbour of a very peculiar character. A deep dock was constructed, but the water was 10 feet deeper than the entrance channel. We are told the Government are not to blame for harbours silting up, but at Galway they have neglected to take the precaution to provide any channel to the dock. The right hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the Galway Harbour Commissioners were not perfectly unanimous with regard to the propriety of expending this money, and that it was only after the approval of the Board of Works was given that a resolution in favour of the expenditure was carried by a single vote. The expenditure has not benefited the town in the smallest possible degree; in fact, at the present moment, the Board of Works find it necessary to have a Receiver and to reduce the salaries of all the officials. In order to effect economy they have refused to sanction a grant of £40 for the lighting up of the harbour, and, as a consequence, several persons have recently been drowned in the dock. You have two courses open to you: you should either spend more money in deepening the channel, or relieve Galway of the payment of the debt. I do not hold the Government responsible for any silting up. There is a possibility of any harbour, however well constructed, silting up in consequence of the action of the waves. I know a harbour constructed under the Irish Parliament which is now a grazing field. But with regard to the Galway Harbour the Government have no excuse to offer, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman either to indicate his intention of spending more money in deepening the channel, or of relieving the people from the responsibility of paying the debt.

(9.15.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway); I can corroborate all my hon. Friend has said, and I think I can give another reason why the Secretary to the Treasury should take the case of the Galway Harbour into consideration. The harbour is actually in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, or in other words of the Board of Works, of which he is the head. The dock was, to a great extent, executed as a relief work. It was commenced at a time when there was a great need of work in Ireland, and it was necessary there should be a large scheme of emigration from Galway or the provision of public works. The Harbour Commissioners built a really very fine dock considering the place, but they forgot the entrance. The dock is very nearly useless at present, but the thing could be easily remedied if the Secretary to the Treasury would make some effort to deepen the channel. The original grant has been expended, but certainly public money could not be better expended than in providing this channel. I have no connection with the Arklow Harbour, but the Secretary to the Treasury has admitted that something ought to be done there, and has expressed a strong wish to find a fund. The sum of £8,000 used to be voted annually out of Imperial Funds for harbours in Ireland; but unfortunately the late Mr. Blake, who took the deepest interest in the fisheries, trusting to the generosity of the Government, thought that if the £8,000 was stopped for two or three years the Government would renew it. But at that time the Treasury were a little too clever for Mr. Blake. They said we will give you £250,000 out of the Church Fund—a purely Irish Fund by the way—on condition that we are allowed to stop the £8,000 which has been granted each year for the last 40 or 50 years. I believe Mr. Blake was under the impression that as soon as the £250,000 was spent the £8,000 would be renewed, and I think if the Secretary to the Treasury will consult with the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) he will find that that right hon. Gentleman was under the impression that the £8,000 ought to have been re-granted to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman certainly stated so in my hearing.

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a subject which does not properly come under this Vote.

COLONEL NOLAN: I was under the impression that the £8,000 was granted under the Board of Works Vote. [The CHAIRMAN: No.] The Secretary to the Treasury has dwelt at some length upon the exact responsibility of the Board of Works with regard to the plans of several harbours in Ireland. Experts differ as to how much water there should be at the head of the pier of a fishery harbour. If you can have eight or ten feet of water at low spring tide it is an overwhelming advantage, but, unfortunately, to secure that makes the harbour very much more expensive. I think the Secretary to the Treasury has under-estimated the Board's responsibility as to the plans and designs of harbours. I have not seen the original Papers in the case of the Grey-stones Harbour, but I do not think the Board of Works ever pointed out that the shingle would be a serious obstacle. In the case of a projected harbour some miles from Belmullet, the Board did point out that the shingle would prove a great obstacle, and as a consequence the harbour was abandoned. The Board of Works were extremely jealous in regard to the construction of fishery harbours. The Fishery Commissioners were very anxious to get an independent engineer to advise them with respect to designs, but the Board of Works would not recognise any engineer but their own. Not only that, but the Board detailed junior engineers to accompany the Fisheries Commissioners when choosing the location of the harbour, and one of these engineers would not give advice. He used to transmit his views to the Chief Engineer in Dublin, and then the Chief Engineer was willing to place plans and designs at the disposal of the Fishery Commissioners. Under these circumstances, surely the Board were responsible for all the engineering defects. Unless it can be shown—and I do not think it can be—that in spite of the remonstrances of the Board's engineers the Fishery Commissioners insisted upon locating a harbour in a given place, the Board are clearly responsible. Now, there is a pier at Claddagh, the repair of which is estimated at £100. The head of the pier has settled down, and there is a large crack in the pier. The work of repairing will, in my opinion, cost more than £100, but it ought to be commenced at once. Surely the Secretary to the Treasury could find the money out of this £38,000. When this Government came into Office the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) spoke of simultaneity in the remedial measures which would be taken in Ireland and England. But the Government are not adopting such a policy. They are postponing the construction of harbours in Ireland, and I do not think there is any possibility of the harbours being completed during the tenure of Office of the present Government. If Parliament is really to do anything in this, I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will pay some attention to this part of the subject. I understand the Secretary to the Treasury deprecates discussion upon the subject of Light Railways on this Vote, and prefers that it should be deferred; and the right hon. Gentleman is so invariably courteous in all his business arrangements that, so far as I am personally concerned, I am ready to accede to his request, but I hope that we shall have due notice of the time when this subject is to be brought on, so that Irish Members may be able to take part in a discussion upon a subject in which much interest is felt. There is another point not of large importance, but important to the labouring classes, and it arises directly under this Vote, and that is, the expenses of engineering inspection in regard to the erection of labourers' cottages. The Board of Works is responsible for these expenses. The Secretary to the Treasury put the engineering expenses at about £2 10s., but they are really very much more, and I have seen vouchers for £4.

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a matter which should come under the Local Government Vote, not the Board of Works.

COLONEL NOLAN: The Board of Works find the engineers. If the Secretary to the Treasury agrees, then I will take the opportunity of raising the point on the Report of the Local Government Vote, but I hope Mr. Speaker will not then refer me back again to the Board of Works Vote. However, I will not continue my observations on that point now.

(9.32.) MR. PARNELL: Just a word or two in reply to the right hon. Gentleman. He seemed to be under the apprehension that I had admitted that the materials used in the works at Arklow Harbour were suitable and the work well done; but in referring to the materials of which works had been constructed in Ireland, and in admitting they were good, I had in my mind works under the Fishery Piers Act for which £250,000 was voted—not the works at Arklow Harbour. It was in reference to a point of order you, Sir, raised that it would not be in order to go into the question of the construction of fishery piers, they having been constructed under a different Act to the works at Arklow Harbour. I have always maintained in the case of that harbour, and it is capable of proof, that the Board of Works committed great errors of judgment in the selection of site and in the method of construction adopted, owing to which the work either crumbled or was washed away. A concrete method was adopted and based upon a foundation of the most insecure character, and the repairs were executed with the most faulty and rotten material. In regard to what the right hon. Gentleman hopes may happen so far as Arklow Harbour is concerned, considering the years during which this matter has been brought forward from time to time, I think we are entitled to something more definite. The right hon. Gentleman hopes something will be done. Has he made up his mind that something can be done? The position of things is this—the Treasury refuses to make any further grant for the works, and says the whole of the expense should be borne by the locality. The locality, however, has refused to bear the whole of the expense, and asks that, at least, the Treasury should make a proportionate contribution to the cost. Up to the present time the Treasury has refused, and I wish to know whether the expression of a hope by the right hon. Gentleman that something may be done indicates that the Treasury are considering the desirability of departing from this resolution, and of taking any further share in the work.

*(9.35.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The right hon. Gentleman will remember that in July last year I asked him whether he would consent to a Return giving particulars as to the amount of £4,000,000 advanced by the Board of Works for the improvement of landed property under 10 & 11 Vict., cap. 32. Is he now, as then, unable to assent to this Return being laid upon the Table? He has held out some hope that he would assent to it, though not in the form in which I asked for it. I know, from matters that came to my knowledge when in Ireland, that there is a very strong feeling that a good deal of this money has been wasted in the same way as advances for harbours.

I feel that we should have the means of following the allocation of this money in the manner I suggested in my question on July 4 last year, that we should have a Return, giving the names and addresses of persons to whom advances have been made, the amounts, the dates and various particulars, so that we may, to a certain extent, follow this money. If the right hon. Gentleman says that the period of time over which this would extend is too long; if he says he cannot go back over 40 years, but that he might go back for five or ten years, that is quite another matter; but if he would assent to that, probably it might meet our purpose. From the point of view of the National Exchequer, and as representing those who have shared in these advances, I do think we are entitled to this information, and I must press for a reply whether the right hon. Gentleman will assent to the Return in the form I have indicated, or in what amended form?

(9.39.) MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): As pertinent to the Vote under discussion, there are a few cases which have come under my observation in the South of Ireland which strongly confirm the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) as to the incompetence and neglect of the Board of Works. The city I have the honour to represent has in the course of two years expended £40,000 on the repair of a portion of the dock wall, necessary through originally faulty construction. Nearly every pier on that important water way, the Shannon, is in the most defective condition. The harbour of Foynes is admitted by the Board of Works to be full of mud.

MR. JACKSON: I do not wish to prevent the hon. Gentleman speaking on this subject; but the harbour at Foynes, as I dare say the hon. Member is aware, is not under the Board of Works.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I pass from that. Passing westward, I may mention that there are two piers built at considerable expense, which, together with that at Tarbert, are fast crumbling into decay and will become ruins. At Kilrush, a rising town which has recently been brought into connection with two railway systems, the pier accommodation is quite inadequate for the requirements of the district, and I am glad to see from the papers that application is about to be made for £30,000 for improving the harbour and allowing deep draught vessels to come in and discharge their cargoes. On the sea-coast we have ample evidence that the designs of the Board of Works have had no more success in the South of Ireland than elsewhere. There is another matter which has, I suppose, given rise to a hundred questions to the right hon. Gentleman—the works at Killaloe. The Board of Conservators complain that these works, carried out on what is known as Mr. Bateman's system, will result in great danger to important fishery rights in the Shannon, valued at £40,000 a year.

THE CHAIRMAN: This will come under the Vote for Works, in Class I.

MR. O'KEEFFE: The subject is so important that I will take another opportunity of referring to it.

(9.45.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): North, East, and West the right hon. Gentleman has had his attention directed to examples of Board of Works mismanagement, and I have to refer to a notable instance in the South, in the often-mentioned Ballycotton Pier. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman went very much out of his way to visit this pier, and doubtless he has all the circumstances in relation to the question in his mind. I will not go into these at length. If the Board of Works had paid attention, as it was their duty to do, to the complaints of the Grand Jury through their County Inspector as to the cause of the defects observable, there would have been no necessity for the visit of the right hon. Gentleman, or for the long newspaper correspondence and the long series of communications between the Board of Works and the County Grand Jury. With that sweet reasonableness that characterises him in this House the right hon. Gentleman will understand me when I say that the Grand Jury of the county could not have brought forward their complaints simply out of opposition to the Government, because the Grand Jury is an essentially conservative body, nominated, not elected, and not amenable to popular influence. When the pier was about to be handed over to the Grand Jury, that body, in accordance with their duty, sent down the County Inspector, Mr. Kirkby, to examine and report upon the pier. After a careful and lengthened investigation of many days, Mr. Kirkby reported against the Grand Jury taking over the work from the Board of Works. He reported the work defective in many respects, and advised the county not to incur the responsibility of repair and maintenance. Then the Board of Works, instead of sending down a competent man to overhaul the work, assumed a most truculent attitude, and insisted that the Grand Jury should take over the pier volens, disregarding the Report of their Inspector. They went so far as to discredit Mr. Kirkby's professional capacity. They said he was utterly incapable of judging the character of marine works, and that he went outside and beyond his ordinary duties in making the Report he did. But, eventually, when they sent Mr. Wolfe Barry, the eminent marine engineer, he, after careful inquiry, found that the complaints made were well-founded to a very great extent, and that the defects indicated by Mr. Kirkby existed; that the platform of the pier had subsided owing to faulty construction, and that violent south-westerly gales had washed away the facing. Mr. Wolfe Barry made various recommendations, among others, that galvanised iron bands should strengthen the head of the pier. He also reported that the remains of the old pier should be removed if the pier was to be of any advantage to the fishing boats. Well, this went on for a couple of years, and I and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork addressed frequent questions to the right hon. Gentleman, and I felt almost ashamed of pressing the right hon. Gentleman so pertinaciously. But, of course, we felt that it would be too bad if a public work intended to be a benefit for a large fishing population should fall into ruin owing to the reluctance of the Board of Works to move in the matter. At last there was this Report of Mr. Wolfe Barry, which, to a great extent, confirmed the Report of the Grand Jury Inspector, and I hope this will be a lesson to the Board of Works to pay attention to the representations of Grand Juries and Local Authorities on these matters, though I am not sanguine that, constituted as it is, the Board of Works will ever learn from experience. I understand that the Treasury are about to advance a further sum for the removal of the debris of the old pier, which has long been a source of danger, and I hope the Secretary to the Treasury, in whom we have some confidence in these matters, will induce the Board of Works to carry out the other recommendations of Mr. Wolfe Barry.

(9.58.) MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): There is a matter I desire to press upon the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and I hope it may not be in vain; and that is the application made by the Commissioners for the erection of a pier at Blackrock, Dundalk. I know that before I entered Parliament a memorial was addressed to the Board of Works on the subject, but not a word have the people heard about it. I may say I have visited the spot, and I know the necessity for the fishing industry. There are, I am given to understand, no natural difficulties to encounter; the bottom is good, and there is a ledge of rocks which acts as a natural breakwater. I may mention also, though it does not concern this Vote, that a pier would be of great advantage for the launching of the life-boat there, which is manned by the fishermen of the locality. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would consent to receive a deputation on the subject.

(10.0.) SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): We have every reason to reciprocate the courtesy which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury invariably extends towards Members on these Benches—a style which is not always adopted by his Colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman has the happy knack of giving the soft answer which turns away wrath, but I should like to remind him that soft words butter no parsley, and we shall feel bound to torture him if he will not give us some sort of satisfaction with reference to the work of the body in Ireland, of which at this moment he is the legislative chief. One is getting sick of calling attention to the case of Arklow Harbour, but it is necessary to do so again because we can get no satisfactory answer to our inquiries. I happen to be interested in the harbour, because I am one of those unfortunate individuals who have to pay for the incapacity of the Irish Board of Works. Money expended on this harbour has been practically thrown into the sea. We have no desire to obstruct the business of the House, or to waste time, but I think we have a legitimate and strong ground of complaint in regard to the incapacity of the Irish Board of Works. I should like to show how these things are done in Ireland, because I think the action of this Board will constitute a strong case for allowing us to manage our own affairs. Take, for instance, the case of the canal between Lough Allen and Lough Macacuan. It was considered necessary to join these two lakes by a canal, and the Board of Works took the job in hand. The canal, as a result, was so exceedingly well constructed that at certain points there is no water at all, and at other points there is so much water that it is impossible for boats to pass underneath the bridges, while along the greater part of the canal there is no tow-path at all. Yet the people of the county through which the canal passes have to pay taxation for money which has been literally thrown away. This affords a very good exemplification of the beauty, wisdom, and common sense of British rule in Ireland. I hope that the Secretary to the Treasury will give his attention to the matters I have referred to.

(10.8.) COLONEL NOLAN: I desire to complain of the excessive character of the charges made by engineers in connection with the inspection of labourers' cottages. This is mainly owing to engineers being brought from a distance, and I would suggest that in future, wherever it is possible, local engineers should be employed. This would tend to promote the erection of labourers' cottages in districts in Ireland in which they are much required.

(10.12.) MR. CLANCY: I wish to join in the expressions which have fallen from my hon. Friend with reference to the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, but I fear he is too apt to padlock the bag containing the public resources, and to refuse to sanction expenditure when that might be advantageously allowed. Now I wish especially to refer to the case of Howth Harbour, as well as to that of Galway Harbour. I have been given to understand that when once a vessel gets into Galway Harbour it cannot get out again, while if it gets into Howth Harbour it cannot remain there. A year ago, by urgent pressure, I induced the right hon. Gentleman to make a grant for the purpose of clearing out the harbour, but only the entrance has been cleared, and the Government have refused to grant a single penny further to complete the work. The result is that though boats can now enter the harbour at low tide, they are, when once inside, in greater danger of being shipwrecked than they would be outside. This is no exaggeration, for I have frequently visited the harbour, which is in my constituency. I would suggest that out of the unappropriated proceeds of the extra duty on whisky a sum of £5,000 or £6,000 should be granted, in order to make this harbour safe for the vessels which have to use it. With regard to Galway Harbour, the policy of the Board of Works has been of a mean cheese-paring character. The low-paid officials have had their salaries reduced, while the highly-paid officials have had their salaries left untouched. Surely this policy of reduction should begin at the top instead of at the bottom. It is a humiliation to me and to the other Irish Members to be coming here to ask that these works shall be carried out, works which surely we ought to be able to deal with without coming to a House, three-fourths of the Members of which have no knowledge of the localities concerned. I hope that a future Parliament will remedy that state of things.

(10.20.) DR. TANNER: I wish to call attention to the case of Ballycotton Pier, which is in a very bad and dangerous condition. I was pleased that the right hon. Gentleman thought it right to visit the pier. Of course, he is not personally responsible for the jobbery which has taken place in connection with this pier, but I think we are entitled to remonstrate with him on his inaction. Would the right hon. Gentleman be surprised to hear that the centre of the pier has now become a lobster ground? It was originally filled up with earth and gravel, instead of with proper material; that filling up has been washed away, and, as I have already said, it has now become a bed for crabs and lobsters. Captain Mount, a large landed proprietor and a Conservative, who contributed a considerable sum towards the cost of erecting the pier, has again and again expressed his dissatisfaction with the jobbery which has been carried on in connection with the pier. The pier at this moment is nobody's child. The Board of Works assert that they have handed it over to the Grand Jury of the county, but that body will have nothing to do with the structure, and so the pier is going from bad to worse, and the shore is obstructed by large numbers of concrete blocks which are lying about. Is it right, is it honest, is it decent, that this state of things should continue to exist? I say that the pier affords a strong argument in favour of Home Rule, for it shows how badly things are mismanaged under the present system. The entrance to the harbour, too, is rendered very dangerous for vessels coming in, and I think it would therefore be as well if the pier were removed to another point. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that we expect an answer with regard to that projecting structure. There are other points, but if we were to speak about all the matters which come in connection with this Vote, and to deal with them in detail instead of discussing them in a single sitting, we should be carrying on the Debate for a week. When the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Mayo and myself went over one of these structures built by the Board of Works we thought it almost impossible to land upon it when a high sea was running, and yet the poor people who have to use the pier have, to a large measure, to live from hand to mouth, and ought to have that faulty structure remedied. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to try and do something for these poor people. Can he not do something for the people of Antrim by the erection of some structure in Antrim Bay? There is no doubt that if adequate shelter were provided there a great deal of good would accrue to the population, who are year after year plunged in the most abject destitution. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take a trip to the Western coast of Ireland, because although I do not desire to see his Government remain in office I think that even when in opposition he may do something to remedy the condition of affairs which exists there, and which, to a great extent, is owing to the action of Her Majesty's Government. I do not like to make an appeal to any of Her Majesty's Ministers, I prefer fighting them; but I think they ought to extend some sort of recognition to what is going on in the West of Ireland, and that we ought to have some sort of response from the Chief Secretary when these matters are brought to his cognisance. I hope he will not only be advised on these matters, but will look into them personally, because if he did that instead of taking all his light and leading from his colleagues or subordinates he would, I think, try and do better for Ireland and the Irish people.

(10.33.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to call attention to what is being done in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, where, as we have heard to-night, £3,000 has had to be paid for the loss of a number of cows through pleuro-pneumonia. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury will remember that I protested against the grazing going on in the Phoenix Park, and also against the railing off of a portion of the Park in order to provide the hay for the Lord Lieutenant's deer. Cows are not allowed in the London Parks, and I ask why should they not be excluded from the Phoenix Park? They have already this year occasioned a loss of £3,000, and I am sorry to hear that some of them belong to the Chief Secretary, in addition to those of the Lord Lieutenant; and while these animals were suffering from pleuro-pneumonia the Chief Secretary was answering in the most accurate manner in this House the questions put by Irish Members, forgetful of his property in Phoenix Park.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I deny that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman thinks he had no cows there, but we are informed that a number of valuable animals in the Park belonged to the right hon. Gentleman. I think it is undoubtedly a wise and proper thing on the part of the Board of Works to have taken away the Chief Secretary's and Viceroy's cows and dealt with them as they have done, because Dublin has undoubtedly been a centre for foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland. If cows are unnecessary in the London Parks they cannot be necessary in the Phoenix Park, and therefore they ought to be entirely removed, especially when the recent enormous loss is considered. Why, Sir, £3,000 is more than the British Government ever made out of cows in Ireland since the Act of Union. The other matter on which I have to protest is the railing off of so many acres of the park to provide hay for the deer. By making this enclosure the Government are shutting out the people—a thing which they do not do in London. Everybody admits that it may be necessary to put a railing round the young trees for protection, railings which can be withdrawn as the trees increase in size, but to rail off four or five acres of public land in order to grow hay for the Lord Lieutenant's deer is an infringement on the public right. Why should not the ground be used by the public, by the gentlemen who play polo, by the Horse Artillery, the police, and the cricketers? But you have no right to rail in a portion of the park for the use of the Lord Lieutenant's deer. I protest against these continuous invasions of the public right in the Phoenix Park, and assert that they ought not to be permitted any longer.

(10.38.) MR. P. J. POWER: I should like to have some information from the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the pier at Tramore. The pier which was constructed there, and for which a considerable sum was locally subscribed, was partially swept away. A second pier was erected on the same site by the Government, but it was so badly constructed that in a few years it also was swept away; and now we have a fishing and watering place which is without a pier. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will pay as a visit at Tramore, where we shall be able to show him that, although an amount of local money was subscribed for the pier, it has been, through bad engineering, swept away twice. We do not want a pier on the same site, but we think we have a right to ask that a pier should be erected. I think I shall have the advocacy of the hon. Member on my right, because I remember that I went out for a sail with him off Tramore, and I remember his using very strong language with respect to the way in which we had to land, owing to the default of the Board of Works. If the right hon. Gentleman has any information to give, we should be very glad to hear it.

*(10.41.) MR. JACKSON: I will endeavour, so far as I can, to answer some of the questions put in the course of this discussion. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway has raised a question as to the Galway Harbour, which he says has not been put into a proper condition, and that the channel has not been cleared out by the Board of Works. I do not think that any blame attaches to the Board of Works with regard to that harbour. They undoubtedly approved the plans submitted to them, but their approval related simply to the proposed construction of the works and the question of security. The plans were prepared by the engineer of the Harbour Commissioners, and all the Board of Works did was to accept those plans as showing that the design was likely to be effectual, and upon that they granted a certain sum of money. But during the progress of the works, the Harbour Commissioners took it upon themselves to enlarge the harbour, and they did this without communication with the Board of Works, subsequently coming to the Board for a further sum of £3,000. As far as I can see, the work was substantially well done.

COLONEL NOLAN: There is no passage.

*MR. JACKSON: But that was not the fault of the Board of Works. The money advanced by the Board of Works was expended, and there was not sufficient left to pay for all that had to be done. I am under the impression the plan might be adopted by the Board of Works of sending the engineer nearest to the locality to look after these cottages. It is possible that engineers might have to be sent considerable distances, and even be sent on two or three occasions. It must be borne in mind that the responsibility rests with the Board of Works, and they cannot delegate it or shift it from their own shoulders. If they advanced money on these cottages, and the inspection turned out to be different from what they expected, they would be responsible. The hon. Member for Limerick referred to several piers, one of which was damaged by a recent storm, and the cost of the repair of which will be about £100. Reference has been made to Ballycotton. I have heard of Ballycotton many times. I have visited Ballycotton, and I have taken a great interest in it from time to time. It was at the request of hon. Members sitting below the Gangway, that I agreed to have a special inquiry made into the condition of Ballycotton Pier, and, as the Committee knows, that inspection took place. Well, certain recommendations have been made. One was, that the clearing away of the remains of the old pier and the general deepening of the harbour would be of advantage in all probability. I must say, as regards that, no blame attaches to the Board of Works, because that work was not included in the original contract. After being on the spot, and after listening to the recommendations of the engineer who went with me, and after careful inspection of the whole work, I came to the conclusion that it was desirable to clear away the old pier, and sanction has been given to that work; while, at the same time, sanction has been given to clearing away some of the rocks so as to afford more shelter. The hon. Member for Mid Cork has given it as his opinion that the pier head is in course of destruction. Mr. Wolfe Barry made the recommendation that it should be surrounded with iron bands. I am bound to say that the Board of Works is presided over by a gentleman of very large experience in the protection of these works, and the engineer to the Board is a gentleman who has had exceptional experience in regard to marine engineering; and I am bound to pay some attention to their Reports and opinions. They are responsible, and they accept the responsibility. When this Report was made, they pressed upon me very strongly that the pier should be given a chance, and they were willing to stake their professional reputation that this pier would suffer no harm. It seemed to me only fair that an opportunity should be given to test their opinion. I have had from time to time some careful measurements taken and Reports made as to the condition of this pier, and I will tell the Committee the latest one that I have received. It must be borne in mind that the stone coping at the top of the pier is about 35 feet above the base, and, therefore, any settlement of the pier under the water must in that height make a very great difference in any crack which may have taken place on the surface. Now, there is one joint in the stone coping which is taken as the test one; and on the 1st February, 1889, this joint, No. 4, was open $3\frac{5}{8}$ inches; and on the 1st January, 1890, it was $3\frac{7}{8}$ inches, showing, therefore, that the only difference in a year was nearly a quarter of an inch. I am still assured by the engineers to the Board of Works that they are still willing to accept the full responsibility for the condition of the pier. And so convinced am I that I have had no hesitation in accepting their representations. If there were the slightest indication that it was necessary to apply the iron bands which have been recommended by Mr. Wolfe Barry, of course there would not be the smallest hesitation in applying them. I do not think the hon. Member for Cork need be under any apprehension whatever as to the solidity of the structure. An hon. Member spoke of Blackrock, but I do not carry in my mind the information which would enable me to answer him. I will make some inquiry as to whether any representations have been made or not. The hon. Member for North Dublin referred again to Howth Harbour. I believe the entrance to the harbour is now quite satisfactory, and boats can get in and out. It must be borne in mind that Howth is a very large harbour, and was originally built for the Mail Boat Service, though it has long ceased to be used for that purpose. I have visited it, and I know all about it; and I do not hesitate to say, so far as I can judge, there is ample accommodation for boats to go in and out with perfect safety. I must say frankly that I do not think the case of Howth Harbour calls for any large expenditure, because I think it is most admirably adapted to its purposes. I can call to mind a great many harbours in England which are used for boats, and which have not nearly so much water in them at low water as Howth. I do not think there is a strong case for clearing out Howth Harbour. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Longford referred to the case of the cows in Phoenix Park. I am aware that on former occasions he has called attention to that matter. With regard to Phoenix Park, I may say that the Board of Works have acted throughout in consultation with the Veterinary Department. Whatever evils have been caused have been due to the fact that the whole of the park was treated as one field. I think that during the prevalence of cattle disease it will be necessary to give up keeping cows in the park. At the same time, I think that a few deer add to the appearance of the park and to the enjoyment of those who frequent it; and in order that we may keep the deer, it is necessary to grow a little hay for their food during the winter. Attention has been drawn to Tramore Pier. With regard to that, I can only say that it is impossible for me to carry in my mind all the information which may be asked for. I have, however, made a note of what has fallen from the hon. Member for Waterford. The hon. Member for Cork referred to Arklow Harbour, and with regard to that I have to remind him that the Government have undertaken to complete the works there if the Local Authority will become responsible for a loan of £5,000. We thought at the time we made it, and we still think, that that was a reasonable proposal, and we had thought that means might have been found to induce the locality to accept the proposal. The estimated cost of the works is £10,000.

(11.4.) DR. TANNER: I spoke also of a pier on the west coast that is of no use at all, and urged that something should be done to meet the wants and wishes of the inhabitants of a very poor locality.

*(11.4.) MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member spoke of having seen the waves running 15 feet high. I should imagine he was there on a very stormy day. I have, however, made a note of his observations, and full consideration will be given to the subject. I trust now that hon. Members will allow the Vote to be taken.

(11.5.) COLONEL NOLAN: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman—and on this subject we ought, I think, to hear the opinion of the Conservative Members—whether he will consider the propriety of restoring to us the £8,000 a year we used to get for harbours?

*(11.5.) MR. JACKSON: That is rather a large order.

Mr. Jackson

(11.5.) COLONEL NOLAN: I do not want a pledge; but I ask the right hon. Gentleman to go carefully into the matter and make inquiries of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach), who was Chief Secretary for Ireland when this money was given.

(11.5.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The point the hon. Member is referring to comes under another Vote.

(11.6.) MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) I desire to draw attention to the terms on which the Board of Works advance loans to the national teachers. At present, re-payment must be completed within 38 years, and that imposes a very heavy burden on the teacher, because if he retires in 30 or 35 years' time, he has to pay the whole cost of the building. I would suggest that the time should be extended to 61 years, and that the rate of interest should be reduced from 5 per cent. to 4 per cent. Another matter is that out of 8,000 teachers in Ireland, there are only 703 by whom this Act has been taken advantage of. That looks bad for the administration of the Act. I trust the Secretary to the Treasury will make a note of this; and that if it is possible to amend or alter the practice he will do it, and so confer a great boon upon the Irish teachers and advance the cause of education. It is hard to expect a school teacher to teach properly if he has not a proper dwelling. With regard to the sureties for loans and the rules under the Board of Works Act, at present it is insisted on that one of the school managers shall be one of the sureties. There is nothing, however, in the Act of 1875 requiring that. The Act says that any three solvent persons are sufficient, and surely that ought to be sufficient for the Treasury in advancing loans. The present system is very hard on a manager who, perhaps, is already a surety for two or three schools, and has two or three other heavy charges on him in his parish. I have been requested to bring this matter under the notice of the House, and I think it is one worthy of the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

(11.9.) DR. TANNER: Before we take a Division on the Vote, I should like to express my strong disapprobation of the conduct of the engineer, to whom reference has been made, who draws such a large salary. I believe he has wilfully misled the right hon. Gentleman as to the pier in question. The right hon. Gentleman, when on the spot, must have noticed the pier riddled about in all directions with long bolts. As I have said, the centre of the pier has become a nesting ground for lobsters. I want the right hon. Gentleman to explain that away, and I must say I think you should have better officers to go into these matters and should insist on having better work done. As to Kinsale, it is one of the largest fishing ports in the South-West of Ireland, but the people have had a bad fishing year, and have not been able to pay up as they would have been had the season been a better one. I desire to ask that some allowance should be made for the bad season in dealing with these people. And now, in the interests of my constituents, I desire to ask a question as to the projected tramway from Macroom to—

THE CHAIRMAN: That question does not come under this Vote.

DR. TANNER: It was the Public Works Report that misled me. As to the Assistant Surveyors of Buildings, I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is going to pay attention to the grievances of these men. They occupy the position of the class of senior clerks in the English Office. They have long hours and very onerous duties, and they require special qualifications for the duties; they require to know all about buildings, and to be thoroughly up in architect's work, and it is very difficult for them to fulfil all the conditions at a very low rate of remuneration. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will condescend to give me an answer on this subject. Then, as to the protection of ancient monuments. There is an Inspector on the Vote who is paid £50 a year. But he draws also £200 a year as an Inspector of National Monuments. Now, I must say that this gentleman—who is a very respectable person, and whom once I used to know—does not do his duty. I regret to have to say it; but having had during the course of last year to be at Athenry, one of the most interesting places in Ireland for anyone who takes an interest in antiquarian remains to visit, I noticed how necessary it was that efficient inspection should be made. Athenry is the old station of the Kings, as its name signifies. There is an old castle there, one of the most perfect of its kind, but it requires two or three supports here and there to keep it from crumbling away. There is an old abbey at Athenry containing the tombs of several illustrious persons. One is the tomb of a great King, and is in a wonderful state of preservation, considering the atmospheric disadvantages it has had to bear. As I say, I know the gentleman who is Inspector of Monuments, and I think that if a representation were made to him he would see that the necessary steps are taken to preserve these monuments.

(11.16.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think it desirable that the Government should be allowed to get the Vote. I should like to ask what is the exact amount advanced by the Government which has cost them £9,000 to lend under the Land Improvement Act. It seems to me that it costs £1 to advance 10s.

*11.17.) MR. JACKSON: I can give the hon. Member no information on the matter. As to the Assistant Surveyors I have heard no complaint, but I will make inquiries. I have no knowledge of the circumstances referred to in relations to Kinsale Pier; and in connection with the ancient monuments referred to, I may point out that the subject does not come directly under the cognisance of the Board of Works.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

3. £3,935, to complete the sum for the Record Office, Ireland.

(11.19.) MR. T. M. HEALY: This includes, I think, an item for the Brehon Laws and Annals of Ulster, for which for the last 10 years there has been practically a standing Vote, though, so far as I can make out, we are no nearer the conclusion of this interesting work. Is it not curious that some of the most difficult translations in the Gaelic language should be in the hands of an Englishman who does not know a word about Irish?

THE CHAIRMAN: These matters do not arise under the present Vote. One of them comes under the Stationery Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is another Estimate?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

(11.23.) DR. TANNER: In the case of this Vote, as of all others where you have a decrease, it is obtained by cutting down some of the smaller salaries. The Government would act more wisely if they cut down some of the large salaries. At the same time, there is a great deal too much money spent under this Vote. All the work of this office could be done by three or four clerks. This is a mediæval remain, and the sooner it is done away with the better.

*MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member is entirely wrong. There is a reduction of £2 this year, as compared with last.

Vote agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed, see that for the registration of all births and deaths in Ireland and the marriages of Roman Catholics £3,200 is taken, while for the marriages of Protestants there is £1,690 required. I do not begrudge the £1,690 for the registration of Protestant marriages, because I know the work is done well, but what I want to point out is the fact that the Catholic marriages in Ireland are very badly registered; indeed, a very considerable percentage of such marriages are not registered at all. The Irish statistics with regard to marriages are quite wrong. There is a large discrepancy between the English and Scotch and the Irish percentage of marriages in proportion to the births and deaths. The explanation of this is that many Irish marriages are not registered. The fee for registering a marriage is only 6d., and as a consequence the registration in the West and South of Ireland is somewhat carelessly performed. This is a very important matter, and I trust it will receive the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury.

(11.28.) MR. T. M. HEALY: We were promised last year and the year before that something would be done under this Vote towards sifting the prices alleged to be paid in Ireland for agricultural produce, but, as far as I can glean, the Government have not done a ha'porth to reduce the extraordinary sums they say the Irish people get for oats and potatoes, beans, barley, and so on. When the Irish peasants are receiving 3d. or 4d. a stone for their potatoes, the price is given in the Registrar General's Return at 6d. or 7d. Last year the Chief Secretary promised that he would look into the question of price, and we pointed out that it was not the price obtained in the Dublin Market that was to be taken into account, because one of the misfortunes of the Irish peasant's positions is that the moment he cuts his oats or wheat and thrashes it on the field, he has to sell it right off. The man has no barn, and he is not able to wait until he can take it to market. It is a very serious matter if it is represented to the Land Commissioners and other bodies that the price of wheat is 5s. more a barrel than it really is. The Land Commissioners have, to a large extent, been depending upon the Statistical Returns published by this Department. I am far from saying the Department is acting in any way in aid of the landlord party in the country. My belief is that these gentlemen are inclined to act fairly, but what I do submit is they do not give the peasant's market price in compiling these statistics, but simply the average price obtained in the large cities. I trust we shall hear from the Government what steps they have taken since last year to correct the very inflamed views held by the Department on this point. If anyone will turn to Thom's Directory for 1890, he will find the value of crops given as follows:—Leinster, £1,700,000; Munster, £1,300,000; Ulster, £3,100,000; Connaught, £873,000. Upon this estimate the Irish Secretary founds the argument that Ireland is extremely prosperous. We do not propose to delay this Vote; but we trust the right hon. Gentleman will avail himself of the opportunity of informing us what has been done in this matter.

(11.35.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. and learned Gentleman accurately recollects that I made some statement in this House on a previous occasion with regard to the statistics; but the statement was not made in relation to this Vote; it was really in connection with the Act of 1887. The Land Department very rightly came to the conclusion that they could not modify rents merely upon the general statistics obtained by the Registrar General, and they devised machinery to collect agricultural prices in order to enable them to carry out the provisions of that Act, which machinery has been since brought to the point of perfection. The Land Commissioners have kept in mind the undoubted value of the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman on a former occasion, and they have endeavoured to find out not merely what are the prices obtained in Dublin, Cork, Belfast, and other large towns, but what are the prices realised in the market towns of Ireland. I am not now in possession of the full details, as the question does not arise on this Vote; but, if the question is raised on the Land Commission Vote, I shall be most happy to give any information I can.

(11.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I protest against statements being made at Primrose League meetings and at other meetings that the price of hay in Ireland is 45s. a ton, when, as a matter of fact, the peasants cannot get more than 20s. a ton. I suppose that in London you pay 30s. or 40s. a ton for coal, but you can buy coal at the pit's mouth for 4s. 6d. a ton. I have known the price 1s. 10d. a ton. When you are paying a high price for coal in London you are inclined to suppose that the Northumberland miners are drinking champagne and living in affluence. It is exactly the same in Ireland when agricultural prices are taken from central markets. By the time the produce has reached the central market it has passed through the hands of a number of middlemen, all of whom have to make a profit.

(11.41.) DR. TANNER: It ought to be borne in mind that most of the statistics to which my hon. and learned Friend has just alluded come from very unreliable sources. Most of the statistics come from the Royal Irish Constabulary—notably the District Inspectors—and I want to know whether there is any portion of this money paid to these policemen?

(11.43.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: I observe that there is a note against the entry relating to these clerks to the effect that they are to be replaced by Lower Division clerks. It would appear as if this office is in a strange state of transition. It might be a matter of some interest to know in what direction the Government propose to move in the matter of re-organisation. Their action may probably throw light on the mode in which they intend to deal with other Departments in the country. I would point out that the Secretary of this Commission is in a very exceptional position, because once in every 10 years he is concerned with Census work. Instead of being paid for the work actually done every 10 years he receives every year an annual sum of £100 or £200. I submit that nothing can be more ridiculous than to pay years in advance for services which are rendered only one year in 10. I wish to know whether it is a fact that this gentleman's salary is again to be raised in consideration of the Census work he takes in hand this year. If any increase of salary be allowed to him on this account it will be a distinct departure from an engagement entered into, I think, by the present Financial Secretary to the Treasury. Another point respecting the Registrar General is, I think, worthy of attention. Last year a Bill was passed inflicting all kinds of pains and penalties on officers in the public service who divulged official secrets. The Act was presumably intended for general and impartial application. Well, Sir, the Registrar General, for whose pay provision is made in this Vote, was proved in a rather notorious case a fortnight or three weeks ago to have volunteered information of a confidential character in regard to what took place in his own office. Dr. Grimshaw, it was deposed at the trial I speak of, volunteered the information that the Constabulary were making inquiries in the office with regard to the supposed wife of a medical man. I should like to know how it is an officer in that position can volunteer information of a private character, with perfect impunity, in view of the very stringent provisions of the Act to which I refer. This certainly is a matter which deserves consideration if at any time an application is made for an increase of this gentleman's salary.

(11.48.) MR. JACKSON: It was clearly understood that when the salary of the gentleman who looks after the Census was increased it was to cover the work of superintending the Census. Of course, the work connected with the Census is only for one year. It is the case, as the hon. Member has said, that one second class clerk, two third class clerks, and two transcribers are to be replaced by Lower Division clerks. As to the point the hon. Member has raised about the divulging of official secrets, I have no knowledge of the circumstances.

(11.49.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: Has any application been made for an increase in the salary of the Registrar General or the Secretary?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I think not.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the great discrepancy in the fee paid for Catholic marriages and that paid for Protestant marriages, and will he say something about the accuracy of the Returns of the Catholic marriages in Ireland?

(11.50.) DR. TANNER: I want to know how much of this Vote goes into the pockets of the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary? If I do not get an answer I regret to say I shall have to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

(11.51.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot give any expression of opinion worth having as to the value of the statistics relating to Catholic marriages. I have no ground for supposing that they are of a less trustworthy character than the statistics in general. As to the question of the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), the police who act as enumerators get a small sum for stationery and postage, and when they have to sleep away from barracks they get 2s. or 3s. for their expenses. Of course, travelling expenses are also paid out of the Vote.

*(11.52.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to inform him that the statistics of Roman Catholic marriages in Ireland are recognised universally as far less accurate than the statistics of Protestant marriages? Whatever the cause may be he will find this stated in every book of comparative vital statistics, and I hope he will look into the question and correct what is really a scandal.

(11.53.) COLONEL NOLAN: I wish to point out that the reason is that the fee paid is very small. It is no fault of the Catholic clergy, but I have every possible reason to suppose that the statistics are grossly inaccurate.

(11.54.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Perhaps, Sir, it is due to the fact that the Irish Members do not sufficiently preach against early marriages. Of course these foreign people do not understand the matter, or they would probably concur with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in thinking that the great fault of the Irish people is that they marry too young. I contend that the statistics demonstrate that there are fewer marriages among the Irish people, and that they marry at a riper age than any other people under the sun. Perhaps if the unfortunate priests got another halfpenny or penny for returning the marriages the result might be the valuable one of clearing away the obscuration of the mind of the poor Irish Secretary.

(11.55.) DR. TANNER: I must take exception to any of this money being put at the disposal of members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and I shall take every opportunity of pointing out to this House the way in which these men are overpaid. On Vote after Vote you find that these men are bribed to do their nauseous work in Ireland. It is a great and hideous mistake to employ the police to do this work. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,260.

Motion made, and Question, "That a sum, not exceeding £9,357, be granted for the said Service,"—(Dr. Tanner.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

5. £11,507, to complete the sum for the Valuation and Boundary Survey, Ireland.

(11.58.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: How is it that in this office the first class and other clerks are not treated in the same way as in the Registrar General's Office?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I cannot answer that question straight off.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee to sit again to-morrow.

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY BILL [LORDS].—(No. 260.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.3.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): This Order has been on the Paper on many occasions, and now, seeing that Her Majesty's Government do not think it necessary to give us any information as to the Bill, and perhaps the time is inconvenient for doing so, I must object to the Bill being proceeded with.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The Bill is simply to remove certain difficulties of administration that have occurred in the colonies, and to simplify procedure.

DR. TANNER: I object.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): At this period of the Session an objection raised at this stage may be fatal. It seems to me the Bill is a very useful one, and I hope the hon. Member will allow his objections to remain for discussion in Committee.

DR. TANNER: As a general rule I am desirous of meeting the wishes of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, but there is really nothing to prevent this Bill, if it is a useful and non-contentious measure, being set down as a first Order to-morrow or on Thursday. I certainly object to its being taken after midnight.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL (LORDS.)

(No. 230.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): May I ask if there is any intention to go on with this Bill?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I had hoped to do so. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will agree with me that it is a useful measure, and I do not gather that any great objection is raised. It is a matter for the consideration of the House whether the Second Reading should be taken now.

SIR HORACE DAVEY: I do not object, and I should be glad to have the Bill read a second time, but I think an undertaking was given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton that there should be an opportunity for a Second Reading Debate.

Second Reading deferred till this day.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution [11th July], reported.

"That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, the sum of £11,850,436, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Jackson.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CON- GESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 199.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn."—(Mr. Secretary Jackson.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): On this Motion I beg to ask what provision the Government intend to make in respect of the financial matters with which the Bill deals? Is it intended to make the sum to which Ireland is entitled available for Irish purposes, and, if so, will the purpose be carried out by a clause in the Appropriation Bill, or in some other legislative proposal during the present Session?

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I also ask what is the intention of the Government with regard to the £1,500,000 of Church surplus money now liberated, and whether in this or in next Session, the Government have considered the possibility or desirability of making some provision towards educational objects in Ireland, especially University education?

Sir R. Webster

MR. T. M. HEALY: It would be well for the Chief Secretary, who has a taste for writing epitaphs, to be present at the solemn obsequies of this measure, and I am sure we would give him a suitable reception on the touching occasion. My hon. Friend has raised a question of the greatest interest, as, indeed, he intimated his intention of doing, and I think it is only right an answer should be given before this Bill is allowed to depart into the limbo of abandoned measures. A sum of £45,000 is liberated, and we are entitled to know what is to become of the money. To use the classic phrase of the First Lord, this money was "earmarked," and we should like to know what is to become of this money after being subjected to this operation. At the same time we should like some statement whether the Government intend to re-introduce the Bill in the same form as now. I think if the Bill is to be re-proposed, the Government will be ill-advised unless they take into account the objections of the Irish Members to the Irish Church surplus being collared in this way. If the Government intend, for Imperial purposes, to pass this Bill in another Session, they should provide Imperial funds for the purpose of buying out Irish landlords, not use Irish local resources for that object.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I did not hear the commencement of the hon. and learned Member's observations, but in regard to what I did hear, I may say I have undertaken that in any case £40,000 shall go to Ireland in the course of the present financial year. The hon. Member has my pledge to that effect, and he may rely upon it being carried out. I do not undertake that the money shall be secured to Ireland in the course of the present Session, but in the course of the present financial year.

Question put, and agreed to.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY AND REDEMPTION BILL.—(No. 169.)

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—(No. 240.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope the Government will disabuse their mind of the idea that this is a non-contentious Bill. The Irish Members have very strong objections to it.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I can assure the hon. Member that, so far as England and Scotland are concerned, the Bill is a non-contentious Bill. I have been able to remove the objections of English and Scotch Members, and I shall be very glad to confer with hon. Members from Ireland with a view to removing some of the objections they hold.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I only wish to express a hope that the Government will find themselves able to go on with the Bill, and pass it.

MR. SEXTON: I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken very reasonably, and I am not without hope that the objections of the Irish Members may be removed by reasonable Amendments.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the names of the Committee before taking the Second Reading?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I asked the deputation of Trustees I received the other day to provide me with three names to put into the Bill as respecting private banks, but I have not yet received any communication from them.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE

Order for Committee read.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the House may understand that when this
VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Bill is put down for Thursday they will have it in a form which will indicate the mind of the Government upon it. I think the Bill ought not to be postponed any longer, because the new proposals of the Government will require a little time for consideration.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I should be sorry to pledge myself to Thursday. The Government have considered the matter very carefully, and are anxious to avoid any fresh controversy. I hope to be able on Thursday, or, if not then, on Monday, to inform the House of the general nature of the proposals of the Government.

Committee deferred till Thursday.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE
(IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 334.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. T. M. HEALY: This is a most useful Bill, introduced in the interest of the new tenant proprietors under the Ashbourne Act. It is a proposal entirely in the interest of small owners, and, much as I differ from the Attorney General for Ireland, I am forced to express my acknowledgement to him for this useful measure. Without pledging myself to details I think my hon. Friend would do well to allow the Second Reading to pass.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I concur in all that has been said by my hon. relative. It is an excellent Bill, and badly wanted by the small tenant owners.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The fundamental principle of the Bill is unquestionably right, but it is different to anything which at present obtains in this country. It would be very useful to watch the operation of it, but at the same time there would be considerable inconvenience in having two systems working side by side. As applied to the whole of Ireland, there might be much to be said for the Bill, but, valuable as it may be, I do not think we are called upon to take the Second Reading without discussion after 12 o'clock.

Second Reading deferred till tomorrow.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND.)

Order for Motion for Select Committee read.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I believe it is generally desired that progress should be made by the Committee, and if anything is to be done this Session, the Committee should be appointed without delay. I do not know that we shall be better able to proceed with the Motion another evening.

MR. SEXTON: We desire the appointment of the Committee, but we desire also, to make some representations on the terms of reference. What the Welsh Members intend, I do not know, but for the discussion, not a long one, of points we desire to raise, I would ask that the Motion should be taken at an earlier hour.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member must not understand me as making any engagement. I have no doubt objections might be met, and I may remind the hon. Member that discussion might be taken after 12 o'clock.

MR. SEXTON: The objection to that is, that discussion may be terminated at any moment by any Member raising objection.

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will accept the Amendment standing in my name?

Motion deferred to Thursday.

MERCHANT SHIPPING LIFE SAVING APPLIANCES RULES.

MR. C. WILSON (Hull, W.): The President of the Board of Trade is not in his place, but perhaps some other Member of the Government will inform us when we shall have an opportunity of discussing the Rules for Life Saving Appliances at Sea. There are one or two Amendments on the Paper, which

Mr. A. O'Connor

I think the right hon. Gentleman has agreed to accept.

*MR. JACKSON: The Motion is not moved.

MR. C. WILSON: The President of the Board of Trade is now in his place, and I would ask him to say if he is prepared to accept any of the Amendments to the Rules on the Paper?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I doubt if this is in order, but I may simply say I am not prepared to accept the Amendment.

MR. C. WILSON: Not the last one on the Paper?

BIRSTALL WESLEYAN CHAPEL TRUST SCHEME CONFIRMATION BILL.

(No. 362.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On Motion for Adjournment.

(12.30.) MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask if the Government propose to take Wednesday next for Government business, and also whether it is a fact, as reported in the Press, that Lord Wolseley has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland, in succession to Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have not information on either point.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give notice that if such appointment is made I will call the attention of the House to it before the end of the Session.

DR. TANNER: I wish to ask whether the Government intend to make, or have made, any attempt to arrest the absconding Constable Palmer, as it now transpires that the steamer in which he travelled to New York has just arrived at that port?

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

*Tuesday, 15th July, 1890.*REPRESENTATIVE PEER FOR IRELAND.

Reported from the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., with an amendment: The Report thereof received; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

REPORT OF THE EDUCATION
COMMITTEE.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I wish to ask the noble Lord the President of the Council a question, of which I have given him private notice, with regard to the time when we may expect that the Report of the Education Committee will be presented to Parliament. It is usually presented before the discussion takes place in the House of Commons upon the Estimates. If the noble Lord can tell us when we may expect to have the Report it would be very useful.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): As my noble Friend is aware, the Report consists of Divisional Reports and the Reports on the Colleges. I may inform him that the Report proper went to press on July 3rd, and the Divisional Reports are also in preparation. I believe the whole document will be very shortly in your Lordships' hands.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH): My Lords, I can state in a very few words the circumstances which have made it necessary to ask your Lordships to suspend the Standing Order which prevents the Electric Lighting Confirmation Bills being read a second time in this House, unless they are brought to it before a certain date from the other House of Parliament. A large number of applications for Provisional Orders were received by the Board of Trade in December last—no less than 161—from Local Authorities, relating to places outside the Metropolis, and therefore the model Order which was adjusted last year was not applicable to them. Two new model Orders had consequently to be adjusted this year. The objections made to the model Orders were very numerous, nearly 1,000 in number. Their nature was very complex, necessitating frequent communications with the Local Government Board and other Public Departments, but early in May the model forms of Order were circulated. Subsequently, the different Orders upon them had to be adjusted with the promoters of the undertakings, and the Local Authorities and those who might have objections to them. It was not possible, therefore, to introduce the Bill for confirming those Orders before the 23rd May, and then, the Orders being of an unusually voluminous character—they were not less than 54 in number—the printing was necessarily of a very elaborate description. The delay in proceeding in the other House of Parliament was very largely owing to the difficulty in getting the materials from the printers, and therefore, so far as that is concerned, no blame attaches to the Board of Trade. Under all the circumstances, and having regard to the important nature of the duties devolving on the Board of Trade in connection with electric lighting, and the very onerous nature of the inquiries with regard to electric lighting which, during the last 12 months, the Board of Trade have had to carry out, I have now to ask your Lordships to suspend the Standing Order for a fortnight. My Lords, I think I am in a position to say that no further relaxation of this Standing Order will be required during the present Session, if your Lordships should see fit to grant this suspension. I have spoken privately upon the subject to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, and I believe he will tell your Lordships that he sees no objection. Under those circumstances, I beg to propose the Motion which stands in my name.

Moved, "That the Sessional Order of the 10th of March last, 'That no Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a second time after Friday the 27th day of June next,' be dispensed with in respect of Bills to confirm Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, and brought from the House of Commons on or before the 28th instant."—(The Lord Balfour.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, the notice which has been given by my noble Friend opposite is of a somewhat novel nature, and rather more comprehensive than usual; but he has explained to your Lordships fully the reasons which render the suspension specially necessary in this instance, and in the circumstances I should not think of opposing it. There is no doubt that electric lighting being a novel subject, a great many details of a preliminary nature had to be dealt with. A great number of Bills had to be prepared by the Board of Trade this year, and I believe the officials of the Department have done their best to introduce them in time, but for the reasons given by my noble Friend they have been delayed. I think, therefore, your Lordships will do well to suspend the Sessional Order in this case.

On Question, agreed to.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.

(No. 165.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I think it would be expedient that I should state at the outset as distinctly as I can what is the scope and object of this Bill, because I think there has been a good deal of misconception in relation to its object and effect, which it is desirable as far as possible to remove, inasmuch as those misconceptions have led to some exaggeration on the part both of those who have advocated and of those who have opposed the measure. I have seen comments made upon the Bill, and speeches made in its support, which seemed to indicate the idea that the Bill was intended to meet the case of persons promoting or becoming the Directors of companies and issuing fraudulent prospectuses or prospectuses containing false statements, careless whether those statements were true or false, making no inquiry, and contenting themselves with giving their sanction to anything which was put before them. Now, I think it is well that it should be known as distinctly as possible that, as far as fraudulent acts of this description are concerned, the existing law is strong enough to deal with them. There ought to be no mistake entertained about that. Then it has been supposed by some that, owing to a recent decision of your Lordships' House, there has been some weakening of the law in that respect. This is an entire mistake. If there be any fraud in any form or shape whatsoever, the person who is guilty of that fraud can now be made responsible. All that has been determined is that where a statement has been made which turns out to be untrue, if that statement has been made by a person who honestly believed it to be true, he is, as the law now stands, under no liability. This Bill, therefore, is not designed to deal, and will not deal, any more effectually than the law does at present with cases of fraud. Its purpose is to deal with those persons who, although honest, may nevertheless have made untrue statements, for which the law, for reasons to which I will allude in a moment, will hold them to be responsible. In considering the measure, and whatever form and shape the Bill may ultimately take, I think it is expedient that it should be kept clearly in view that the object and scope of the Bill is to deal not with fraud, but with acts for which, nevertheless, it is reasonable that those who have committed them should be responsible. There can be no doubt that there has been too often a tendency, in the issue of prospectuses of companies, to put before the public statements which are not founded in fact, and which are put forward without any sufficient care or anxiety being displayed to see that those statements are true, the result being that on the faith of statements made on the authority of persons of no character or respectability people have frequently, or sometimes at all events, been led to invest their money and embark in undertakings which they would have been unwilling to do if the truth had been before them. Now, I will state at once what I understand to be the principle of this Bill. The principle to which I give my assent, and to which I ask your Lordships to give your assent, in giving it a Second Reading, is that if a person putting forward untrue statements with the view of inducing others to invest their money or embark in any undertaking, has made those untrue statements without reasonable grounds for believing them to be true, that person ought to be held responsible to those who have suffered in consequence of believing those untrue statements to be true. Now that, plainly and simply, is the object and purpose of this Bill. I regard all the rest of it as merely detail and machinery, open fully to consideration—I shall have something to say about that in a moment or two—but that principle, I would submit to your Lordships, is a perfectly sound one; that those who put before the public statements which are intended to be acted upon, intended to induce people to part with their money and invest it in a particular undertaking, may at least be called upon, not of course to vouch the truth of all the statements for which they make themselves responsible by issuing them, but at least not to make themselves responsible for untrue statements which they have not reasonable grounds for believing to be true. The truth is, the effect of the measure will be to make persons dealing in the class of business affected by the Bill responsible for the want of reasonable care, so that if they publish a statement of that description without having taken any means to ascertain, or without having any reasonable ground to be satisfied of, the truth of the statement, they should be liable to those who were misled by its falsity. That does not seem to me to be in any respect an extravagant principle, and I am happy to find that some who have been loudest in their opposition to the measure as it now stands have unequivocally given assent to that principle. I have to-day received a report from a very important Chamber of Commerce, the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, on the subject of the Bill, which begins by giving their full support to the principle of the Bill to the extent to which I have enunciated that principle; and I do not know that I have seen any distinct attack made upon the proposal to create a liability to that extent. It seems to me it is only to that principle that your Lordships would give your assent by accepting the proposal to read this Bill a second time. When one comes to the details of the Bill, I admit there are certain matters in it which are open to criticism, and as far as I am personally concerned, I may say that when I was asked by those who promoted the Bill in the other House to move the Second Reading of it here, I felt bound to state that I could only do so if it were understood that as to the details and machinery of the Bill I was left perfectly free and unfettered to suggest or accept any alterations which, consistently with that main principle, would, in my judgment, make the measure a safer and better one. I think it right to make that statement distinctly to your Lordships on the present occasion. But there has been, I think, some exaggeration as to the effect likely to be produced by this measure. Great exception has been taken to what has been called "throwing the burden of proof on the person who makes the statement," because the Bill as it at present stands renders the person making the untrue statement liable unless he can prove that he had reasonable ground for believing it to be true. I think, in truth, that objection is more imaginary than real. I do not think it would make any practical difference in the working out of the measure whether the provision should take that form, and the onus be so placed, or whether the Bill should read that the person should be liable unless he had reasonable ground for believing that the statements were true, or unless it were so shown. I do not think an alteration of that kind would make any substantial change in the effect of the Bill. At the same time, I know that the particular expressions used have created some alarm. For example, the case was put to me that you might have a Director who had been party to issuing a prospectus, but who, at the time the question arose, was in such a state of ill-health that it was impossible for him to give evidence, or he might even have died and his representatives might be sued; and in such a case it would be impossible to prove what reasonable ground there was in that instance for believing the statement to be true. In my view, I do not think in the mode in which the Act would be administered, and the way in which cases would be tried when brought into Court, it would make much difference which way the onus lay, and I do not regard that as a point of very supreme importance. Then exception has also been taken to the use of the word "misleading" in that part of the Bill which makes a Director or other persons responsible "for any statement which was untrue or misleading." I cannot help thinking that the insertion of that word "misleading" has been due to a failure completely to appreciate the law which has been laid down with respect to untrue statements appearing in documents such as those referred to in the Bill. Perhaps it was supposed that there might be such a partial statement of the truth as to mislead. But it has been clearly laid down by the House of Lords, in a recent case, that not only is the person issuing a document of this description liable if the statements are contrary to the truth, but also if the statements are so partial that the suppressions rendered what was stated untrue. The law in that case equally regards what is stated as untrue, and by a recent decision in your Lordships' House the law in that respect may be considered as well settled. That covers, therefore, every case, either of actual mis-statement or of suppression of facts which makes the statement untrue. Therefore, if the word "misleading" is to be added to the word "untrue," I do not myself quite appreciate the cases to which it is intended to apply. It must be intended to apply to all cases where the statements are true; otherwise, the law in regard to statements which are untrue would cover such cases; and when you include statements which, though absolutely true, might mislead, it is difficult to see how far the adoption of such legislation might lead. Therefore, I admit at once that I feel the force of the objection to the word "misleading." Whether there should be anything added to the word "untrue," or whether that would be enough by itself would be a matter for consideration. There is another point upon which strong exception has been taken, and that is that the Bill renders liable not only the Directors, but every person who has authorised or who is responsible for the issue of the prospectus. I have some doubt whether those words would not cover some persons who ought not to be included, and whether, on the other hand, they would not fail to cover some persons whom we should all undoubtedly desire to see included. The persons whom it is desirable, and whom one would like to see, hit are the promoters who are at the back of the Directors, and whose statements really float the concerns—whose statements are put before the Directors, and who are the persons who really create and launch the company, place it before the public, and seek to benefit by it. I do not feel quite sure that those persons would come within the term "those who have authorised the issue of the prospectus," because it may be doubtful whether those who are, as it were, a further stage back, acting before the prospectus is issued, and then retiring from the scene, the Directors having taken their places, can be held to have authorised the issue of the prospectus, because, ordinarily, you speak of "authorising" something which is done on your behalf. I throw out that doubt, because it seems to me it would be expedient in one direction to strengthen this provision, namely, so that you shall hit the promoters whom you desire to hit. On the other hand, fears have been expressed that the words might include those whose names are merely on the prospectus in an executive capacity, such as the bankers who receive subscriptions, and the solicitors who are to be the legal advisers of the company, and who certainly could not be expected or understood to vouch every statement put forward by the Directors of a proposed company when they issue a prospectus to the public. The words "responsible for" are, I admit, very wide, and to my mind they are objectionable words. I frankly say that for this reason, that responsibility is a question of law. When you say that persons are responsible that is a legal question, and it is for the law to determine who is responsible for a particular act. I think it is very difficult, therefore, to imagine what construction ought to be put upon such language as this when it comes for judicial determination before any of our tribunals. I have ventured to trouble your Lordships with these criticisms for this reason, that I cannot help thinking that those who are engaged in passing legislation of this description are, perhaps, a little less likely to perceive the difficulties that would arise in carrying it out than those who are constantly engaged, and who, like myself, have been engaged for some years in interpreting legislation and in administering the law, because the tendency to be critical grows upon one, and in considering provisions of this description, when one comes upon language used that is not in common use, one asks one's-self "What interpretation should I put upon it if it came before me for judicial decision?" Very often, looking at proposed legislation from that point of view, difficulties are seen which do not readily occur to the minds of those who are simply engaged in the task of endeavouring to remedy an evil, and, therefore, are not so much concerned in its critical examination as I venture to think they ought to be. My Lords, I have referred to these two or three details because they are matters to which special attention has been drawn by those who have objected to this new legislation. There are some other details in the Bill about which a good deal has been said, and probably will be said again, but with which I do not think it would be right to trouble your Lordships in moving its Second Reading. I have pointed out what I conceive to be, and what I think manifestly is, the whole scope and object of the Bill. I cannot myself doubt that that object might be attained, and might be very usefully attained, by casting liability where that liability ought to rest, without in any way endangering those who act reasonably and properly in regard to affairs of this description.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Herschell.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I think my noble and learned Friend has made a case for asking your Lordships to read this Bill a second time. I confess that if I thought this Bill was to remain in its present form, I should not have the slightest hesitation in asking your Lordships to read it a second time this day six months—perhaps I ought to make an exception to that under present circumstances, and say at an earlier period. In the objects of the Bill, as stated by the noble and learned Lord, I heartily concur, and if those objects can be attained by altering almost every sentence in the Bill, I certainly shall be desirous of giving all the assistance I can in remedying the defects which have been pointed out; but if the Amendment of it should be found ineffectual to produce something like a reasonable measure, I shall reserve to myself the right to take a different attitude towards the Bill at a later stage on the Third Reading. The Bill is supposed to have been rendered necessary by the decision of this House, to which my noble and learned Friend referred, in the case of "Peek v. Derry." That decision was arrived at unanimously by the House as to what the state of the law is and has always been upon the subject matter with which this Bill deals. It certainly would require very considerable consideration of that subject before one would very lightly attempt to alter the principles of the law upon which that case was decided—certainly more consideration than appears to have been given to it by those who have produced this specimen of intended legislation. The decision in the case to which I refer would have been exactly the same if the Bill had been law at the time this decision was given, which shows the value and importance of the effort to set right that decision, or which it is supposed will be a setting right of that decision. But the great objection to the Bill is, as my noble and learned Friend very candidly stated, that it is so conceived that whatever the object of the measure is, it is impossible to trace that object through its language. Take as an example the very expression to which he has referred, that is, the use of the words "untrue or misleading." I think your Lordships will be prepared to accept my noble and learned Friend's statement as a matter of simple logic; if it is untrue, it is untrue, and the untruth of a statement may be arrived at by showing its actual falsity, or by showing that it states the truth so partially that that which is stated is for that reason untrue. Therefore, you do not in that case require the word "misleading." But if you do require it for proper exposition of the object of the Bill it must mean that something is to be made the subject matter of an action which is true, but which a jury or Judge shall suppose, or some ruined speculator shall suppose, is of a misleading character and misled him. What is to be the criterion of what is "misleading," and what is to be the canon of intelligence which is to be applied as a test to the intellectual calibre of the person misled? It is almost impossible not to see that this Bill is a patchwork attempt by various individuals to add something to meet the supposed necessity of making directors responsible for what in popular language and in good common sense are called reckless or untrue statements. Directors are liable now for untrue and reckless statements, and there is nothing in the judgment referred to which in the smallest degree casts any doubt upon the liability of Directors for such statements. It is almost impossible to read this Bill without a smile when one sees, the objects being what I have stated, how those who have contrived the Bill have carried them out. Having first laid down the proposition as to making untrue or misleading statements, they proceed to carry out the object in the following manner. The Bill says that Directors and others shall be liable to pay compensation to persons who sustain loss or damage by reason of any untrue or misleading statement, unless they prove—

"With respect to every such untrue or misleading statement not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert, that he made reasonable inquiry and examination into the statement and had reasonable ground to believe, and did then, and up to the time of the allotment of the shares, debentures, or debenture stock, as the case may be, believe that the statement was true and not misleading."

Therefore, he must prove that he believed the statement to be true, and he must also have formed a judgment that it was not misleading, and unless he proves that he is to be liable. Further, he is to be liable unless he proves—

"With respect to every statement or extract purporting to be a statement of, or an extract from, any Report or valuation of any engineer, valuer, accountant, or other expert, that it was a true and fair statement of, or extract from, the Report or valuation, and that after reasonable inquiry and examination he had reasonable ground for believing, and did then and up to the time of the allotment believe, that the Report was made in good faith by the person whose name it bears, and the person making it was competent to make it."

He is to form all these judgments before he can shield himself from the attack of some person who has lost money by the speculation into which he was presumably desirous of entering. My Lords, what I desire to say about it is, that if that were once to be passed into law I should think every respectable man would avoid becoming a Director of any company at all. It would be impossible to get any man of repute and respectability to take such a position. It may be that those persons who, in popular language, are called "guinea pigs," are fair subjects of attack as a sort of vermin of commerce; but there is another class, the blackmailers, who are even worse, and I think the blackmailers would receive a considerable addition to their numbers if this Bill were passed un-amended. There is in this matter an existing evil, and I do not attempt to limit the importance of endeavouring to legislate on the subject. For instance, there is frequently a careless and negligent adherence to statements made without due inquiry into their truthfulness, and I should be glad to assist in framing a measure which would enforce an obligation to take reasonable care against persons who lend their names to the statements of others for the purpose of recommending investments. I once heard on high Parliamentary authority that the Second Reading of a Bill only affirms the principle that a subject requires to be dealt with by legislation. Had it not been for that consideration, I should not have thought that such a Bill as this should have received a Second Reading; but convinced by that high authority (I refer to Mr. Gladstone) that that is the true view of a Bill, I content myself by saying that I assent to the Second Reading of this Bill, reserving to myself the liberty of saying what I may have to say at a later stage.

LORD BRAMWELL : I have to present to your Lordships a Petition from the London Chamber of Commerce, I cannot say exactly against the Bill, and certainly not against a measure such as has been sketched by the noble and learned Lord who moved the Second Reading. I need not say that the opinion of the petitioners is entitled to very great respect. They represent the merchants of this City of London. They are neither promoters of companies nor "guinea pigs," as my noble and learned Friend has characterised a certain class of people; but they view this Bill with very great alarm indeed, and they give very weighty reasons for their fears. They say that at present capital is largely invested, and your Lordships know very well that it is so, in Limited Companies. They say they firmly believe that if this Bill passes as it stands no man of means, no man to whom litigation is of any consequence, would allow himself to be made a Director of one of those companies, because the way in which the Bill is framed and the language of the Bill is so wide and so extensive that it would be utterly impossible for any man to feel safe from the effects of such a measure if your Lordships should pass it. They further find fault with what I cannot help calling the misleading language of the Bill, language which is so vague that it would be difficult to interpret it, and I should tell your Lordships that they say they think the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee. Whether your Lordships should think fit to do that or not, I am sure I do not know, but that is their opinion. I agree with every word of that Petition, and I think this is a most dangerous measure as it stands. Indeed, my noble and learned Friend practically admits that. The Bill is the result of a scare due to the decision of this House in the case of "Peek v. Derry." It has been said, most erroneously, that that decision has left it open to persons to issue prospectuses crammed with falsehoods which they know to be such. That is utterly erroneous. In the case of "Peek v. Derry" it was held that where fraudulent statements, untrue statements in a prospectus, fraudulently untrue, or put into the prospectus with an indifference as to whether they were untrue or not on the part of the persons who put them in, any person who has been misled and suffers damage would have a right of action against those whom I cannot help calling the offenders who have told the untruth, either knowing it was untrue or indifferent whether the statement was true or not. I quite agree with what my noble and learned Friend on the Wool-sack has said, that if this Bill had been law at that time the decision of your Lordships' House would have been just the same. I cannot help saying this, in order that your Lordships may make a proper estimate of the decision in that case: that your Lordships' House in its decision did no more than the plaintiff himself had done, for, after the whole mischief was discovered and the subject-matter of the complaint was known to Sir Henry Peek, he, a man of experience, knowing very well what he was about, moved a hearty vote of thanks to the Directors, whom he afterwards sued for their conduct in managing the affairs of the Tramway Company, which, in the result, turned out badly. He was a most candid witness, for when he was asked whether or not he would say they had committed a fraud he said, "No, I will not do that; that is for the law to say. I have been told they have done something wrong, and therefore I have brought an action against them, but I will not say that they committed any fraud at all." That was the plaintiff himself, a gentleman who knew what he was talking about. Yet somehow it has got into the minds of the public that that case has removed all restraints upon Directors, promoters, and others interested in getting bogus companies floated, and that they may do so with perfect safety and impunity. That is a grievous mistake, and I must really say on this occasion what I have very often felt a great disposition to say before, but I have refrained out of respect to learned friends of mine who have taken a different view on the matter. I think there was positively not a pretence for that action. I will not trouble your Lordships with the statement of what it was supposed the defendants had done wrong. I am not saying that the defendants in that action had not done wrong, but it was a wrong of a most trivial character, and Sir Henry Peek did not say he had been misled, or that the untrue statement had in any way warped or biased his judgment. Now, one word more upon the subject of this legislation. I am not quite sure that it was not I who suggested it, if one may be allowed to quote one's-self. In the course of the opinion I expressed in that case I said it might be desirable to make Directors warrant the truth of the statements made in the prospectuses they issued, but I said that I very much doubted the advisability of it, because the consequence would only be that respectable men would not suffer themselves to be charged with some inaccuracy, and that in addition to that it was exceptional legislation. That is a matter which I recommend to your Lordships' attention, if the settlement of the details of this Bill should come before you. But there is one remark which I want to make, and it is this. It is a great mistake to suppose that there are very many absolutely dishonest companies. I believe, from information that I have received from persons who are thoroughly well acquainted with such matters, that although there are no doubt a great many unwise companies which are got up and launched by sanguine and foolish people, the dishonest companies that exist are very few indeed. Your Lordships should remember that the cases you hear of are not the cases of prosperous companies which go on conducting their business properly. The cases of companies which come under the notice of the public are chiefly the bad cases, those which are unfortunate, and with regard to which something has gone wrong, while people do not bear in mind that there are great numbers of solvent and prosperous companies which are not heard of. I think, therefore, this sort of outcry against these Limited Liability Companies, and everybody connected with them, is altogether unjustifiable. After what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said, I cannot object to the Bill being read a second time, which practically means the adoption of the very reasonable proposition that my noble and learned Friend, who introduced the matter, has laid before the House; but I confess that I agree with the Lord Chancellor that if it were a question whether this measure should become law as it stands or not, I should most heartily have voted that it should not.

LORD Esher: My Lords, will you allow me to say that I support the Second Reading of this Bill, for the same reasons and in the same way that it has been supported by my noble and learned Friends, namely, that it is a most detestable measure, not one single line of which will bear the slightest examination. In addition to what has been already said by my noble and learned Friends, I will try to point out one or two other "small" defects in this Bill, which will have to be torn out of it before it can be made even a decent measure. In my opinion the 3rd clause of the Bill is open to the greatest objection, because it provides—

"Every person who is a Director of the Company at the time of the issue of the prospectus or notice, and"— this is stronger still, that

"every person who is named in the prospectus or notice as a Director of the Company or as having agreed to become a Director of the Company, either immediately or after an interval of time"

"shall be liable" unless he proves a great many things. Therefore, somebody may put into a prospectus the name of a person as a Director who has never heard of the company, who has never promised or undertaken that he will be a Director; they might put in his name at a time when he is at the other end of the world, and he is to be liable! Under this provision a man who might really know nothing about the prospectus of the company, and who might actually have been at the other end of the world at the time it was put forth and published, and who has had nothing whatever to do with it, who had never sanctioned his name being placed upon it, might, because some person had placed his name upon the prospectus without his consent, find himself called upon, in order to escape liability, to prove that he had made reasonable inquiries into the truth of the statements in the document, and had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, down to the time of the allotment of the shares in the company, that such statements were true and were not misleading. Why, anything more contrary to natural justice cannot be conceived. Because the name of a person may have appeared in a prospectus in which there is a mis-statement, he is to be put upon the proof of all these things as the Bill now stands, which I am certain he could not possibly prove. That is one of the "slight" defects in the Bill, though it is said that does not affect the principle in the Bill, which, however, nobody can find in it, and which has been apparently invented for the purpose of obtaining a Second Reading. Another matter to be considered is that by the law of England an honest mis-statement made by a person with no intention to deceive, but which may, and does mislead another, does not give to that other person any cause of action. That is to remain the law with regard to every other mis-statement that is made by anybody under any circumstances, but you are to have a totally different law with regard to persons whose names unfortunately appear in a prospectus. Another matter is this, and I think it would be well for your Lordships to consider it. As this is made a wrongful act, it can be sued for because it is wrongful. Does anyone realise what the consequence of that is? Under the provisions of the Bill one Director might be made liable to the last farthing of his fortune without being able to obtain any contribution from his brother Directors who have done the same thing that he has. These, I think, are a few small matters to be considered in the Bill; and if it were not for the rule which has been laid down by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that by reading a Bill a second time the House is merely assenting to its principle—but which, as I ventured to say the other night, leads to more bad legislation than anything else I know—I should have moved that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

EARL GRANVILLE: There are two or three reasons why I should not take part in this conversation: one is, that I am a layman; and another is, that not only am I a Director, but I am a Director in two companies. However, as I inherited an interest in both those companies, and as I receive no remuneration whatever for my directorial duties, I am hardly a "guinea pig," and, therefore, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say that I am very glad Her Majesty's Government support the Second Reading of this Bill. Adopting the principle which has been described, both by my noble and learned Friend Lord Herschell and by the Lord Chancellor, as being the principle of the Bill, that principle has not been objected to by the two noble and learned Lords who followed them. At the same time, I think it is most important that two things should be carefully avoided: one that, by a side wind, you should injure the practical working of limited liability undertakings; and, secondly, the danger as has been already pointed out of preventing substantial, respectable, and trustworthy men from becoming connected with such concerns, by making them afraid to undertake the duties of Directors. Now, I feel that we are very safe, in this way: that the Bill is in the hands of noble and learned Lords who will look well to the details of the measure, and will examine them with the greatest care; and I will take this opportunity of saying that, though I have been many years in the House, I have never known it to fulfil in the degree it has lately done one of the most important functions of a Second Chamber, namely, revising the drafting and details of all the Bills that come before it. I think your Lordships should pass the Second Reading of this Bill; it would then go under the charge of my noble and learned Friend to the Standing Committee on Law, from which we may expect that it will emerge a measure which will improve the present legislation on the subject and be beneficial to the community.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I will, of course, give the fullest consideration to the—I do not know whether I am to call them friendly—criticisms which this Bill has received. I quite feel what my noble Friend behind me has just said in reference to the importance of not doing anything which could injure the working of the Limited Liability Acts; and I am a little sensitive on this subject, because I cannot help thinking that in some quarters the enthusiasm with which this measure has been supported hitherto has not been absolutely and exclusively due to a desire to protect investors from those who would prey upon them; but that some of it has been due to a jealousy of the Limited Liability Acts, the working of which I know there would be in many quarters a great disposition to hamper and impede. Your Lordships must be very careful, I think, not so to legislate as to give any effect to the desires of those who would be willing that the working of those Acts should be interfered with. I am glad to say that I am one of those who think this measure will tend to prevent untrue statements being put forward recklessly, though it will not, and cannot, of course, absolutely safeguard those who are eager to accept any tempting offer. If we could only persuade the clergymen and widows throughout the country—for they seem to be the largest investors in those companies which from their nature come before the Court ultimately—that a very high rate of interest is incompatible with absolute security, these tempting offers of receiving 7, 8, 9, 10, and even more per cent. for their money could not be spread as at present broadcast over the country, or would be spread in vain; and those persons who are now deceived by them would be content to invest their money where it would be as safe as in Consols, or even in some of those investments which can hardly be put on a level with Consols. The truth is, that in these cases people's money is subscribed because they seem to have the greatest difficulty in learning, even when they have been more than once bitten, that they cannot have a high rate of interest without having at the same time a high condition of risk.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

Lord Herschell

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AMENDMENT ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.

(NO. 168.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I need trouble you but for a minute or two upon this measure, which has passed the other House of Parliament, and has received, I believe, the full support of the Local Government Board in its passage through that House. Its purport is to correct what I think was obviously an oversight in the Metropolis Management Acts. There exist in various parts of the Metropolis footpaths which are repaired by the parish, but which have to be flagged by the tenants. A provision in those Acts enables the parish to flag them, and casts the expenses of doing so upon the occupiers of the adjoining houses. Why that burden was cast upon the occupiers it is very difficult to understand. Similar burdens appear throughout the Acts to be cast upon the owners; and this special provision has been found to operate with grievous hardship in some parts of the Metropolis, where the Vestries have flagged the highways. The burden is cast upon the occupier, however short his tenure. It has actually happened that at the time the flagging took place the tenant, who was in occupation under a quarterly tenancy, had not only given notice to quit, but had positively quitted, the premises, and would never have anything more to do with them, at the time when the whole burden of the flagging of a portion of the footpaths was cast upon him. There can be no doubt that was not the intention of the Legislature, and the proposal of this Bill is merely to deal with those footpaths in the same way as other permanent improvements are dealt with—that is, to put the burden of them upon the owner, as defined by the Metropolis Management Acts, instead of upon the occupier, who may be a person having a tenancy which will cease immediately the work is done.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Herschell.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I do not rise to say anything with regard to the substance of this Bill, but merely in reference to the legislation of which it is a type. There is another measure called the Metropolis Management and Building Bill, which has reached your Lordships' House, and will come on for discussion in a few days, and also another private Bill which is promoted by the London County Council, in which there are 10 clauses referring to no less than five other Acts. I think that anybody who wants to thread the maze of such legislation as that should have a clue which he will not possess. Therefore, I would suggest to the noble and learned Lord whether he does not think it possible to bring on together before the House the two Bills relating to the Metropolitan Management Act; and I would venture to suggest that, at all events, the clauses of the one Bill should be included in the other. I merely call attention to the fact, because it seems to me that this is making legislation a good deal more confused than it necessarily need be.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am sure I shall be most happy to entertain my noble Friend's suggestion. If the Bills were both referred to the Standing Committee no doubt we might put the whole of the clauses referred to into the two Bills, but I do not know whether we could put the whole of one Bill into the other and send it down to the House. It would be practically disagreeing with everything, because you would be transferring one to the other entirely. We might put it into the Bill, and then, if the House so wished, throw it out on Third Reading. Certainly, as far as I am concerned, I will do my best to have them put into one Bill.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT, 1882, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 164.)

House in Committee (according to order): Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

BARRACKS BILL.—(No. 163.)

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION) BILL.—(No. 199.)

Read 3^a (according to order), with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1867, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 169.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT BILL.
(No. 180.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, with the permission of the House, I will withdraw the Motion which I have placed on the Paper for the rejection of this Bill.

Bill read 3^a (according to order).

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I have a purely technical Amendment to make in the Schedule. It is to substitute the word "provisions" for the word "article" in the title of the Schedule, so that it will read "provisions of agreement."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL.
(No. 98.)

Amendments reported (according to order), and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

WOMENS' SUFFRAGE BILL.—(No. 201.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I shall not detain your Lordships many minutes. I fear you may think it has had a very bad advocate in times before this, but I have never heard a word said against it in any quarter, nor has there been any notice of opposition given to it. Therefore, I am at a loss to conceive that anything except my bad management of the Bill can have caused its rejection. This question has now received support from the fact of certain women being allowed to vote for County Councillors. As I stated the other night, the Duke of Buckingham said it was a move in the right direction, meaning that it was a move in the direction of recognising the right of women to vote for Representatives in Parliament. I did not hear the speech of the Lord Privy Seal the other night, or I should have asked to withdraw the Bill which I then presented. In endeavouring to obtain the franchise for elections to Municipal Bodies in Ireland, I felt that it was right your Lordships should know there is a considerable opposition to the system of voting even by men in boroughs in Ireland. This would make the franchise uniform, and I think it would be a liberal and advantageous measure. Many have expressed themselves in favour of the principle of the Bill. I blame no one for having opposed it, and I know that some of those who have opposed me have not been able, through dissensions in their own Party, to advance that measure, for the success of which they were themselves anxious. If this Bill be now read a second time it can do no harm. I do not wish that my name should be associated with it. I only wish it to be considered as an act of trust on the part of this House in the capacity of women, although not wishing in other respects to remove them from their duties as women. There has been no argument brought forward against the passing of this Bill. It has been said if it were passed the House of Commons would take advantage of the good example set them and would also pass it, and many are pledged to carry a measure for this purpose. Women of great talent have lately come before the public, such as Mrs. Fawcett and her daughter. Surely such women are well-qualified to choose a Representative. I may mention another lady who has done incalculable good among the soldiers at Portsmouth by establishing lectures and reading-rooms for their improvement and recreation. Women are certainly entitled to select the gentlemen who shall represent them in Parliament. There are many public questions in which they are deeply interested, and they certainly should be allowed to choose a Representative, who will, as they may consider, act wisely in those great questions, such as the protection of children, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and other questions in which women are interested. My Lords, I beg to move that this Bill be read a second time.

Lord Denman

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Denman.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid I must answer this Motion as I have already answered similar previous Motions. It is not in accordance with the comity of Parliament that a Bill should be introduced in one House of Parliament for the purpose of reforming the other, and we cannot, therefore, entertain a Bill for that purpose. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—
(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question, whether the word ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the negative; Bill to be read 2^a this day three months.

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (PREVENTION) BILL.—(No. 117.)

Read 3^a (according to order), with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.—(No. 165.)

Petition that the Bill may be referred to a Select Committee; of the London Chamber of Commerce; read, and referred to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

CENTRAL LONDON RAILWAY BILL.

QUESTION — OBSERVATIONS.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I wish to ask my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees a question in reference to the Central London Railway Bill. Your Lordships will remember that on the introduction of the Bill there was an understanding that if it went to a Select Committee there should be some means of ascertaining what evidence had been given with regard to St. Paul's Cathedral. I desire to ask my noble Friend what steps he has taken in that matter?

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I have inquired, and I find that the evidence with regard to St. Paul's Cathedral would be scattered generally through the engineer's evidence, and would not solely appear in the case made for St. Paul's Cathedral. I thought, therefore, the best plan would be to have two or three copies of the evidence placed in your Lordships' Library, where any Peer who wishes to study any part of it can have access to it.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 15th July, 1890.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

MARTIN'S NATURALISATION BILL [LORDS.]

THIRD READING.

(3.5.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I desire to call the attention of the House to this Bill, although I have already made a special Report upon it, which has been circulated with the Votes, but which, I am afraid, may have escaped the attention of hon. Members. It will be within the knowledge of the House that at one time naturalisation could only be accomplished by an Act of Parliament, just as divorce could only be obtained by an Act of Parliament. But the law of divorce was altered, and so, also, has been that of naturalisation, an Act having been passed to enable foreigners, who desire to be naturalised, to obtain a certificate from the Home Secretary, after a residence of five years, and after giving satisfactory guarantees in regard to conduct. That is the usual process adopted in regard to naturalisation; but from time to time cases arise in which applications are made for naturalisation in accordance with the old process of proceeding by Act of Parliament, in which the applicant has not resided here for five years. Acts have accordingly been passed enabling persons who have not resided here for five years to obtain naturalisation. The two cases now before the House are cases of that kind. In the first, Madame Martin has resided here for a little over two years. By birth she is a Spaniard, and she married a Spaniard, who went to reside in France, and became a naturalised Frenchman. Since then she has become a widow, and she has resided in this country for two years. She now desires to obtain naturalisation. She is not an old woman, but she is prudent, and is anxious that, in the event of her death, and the disposition of her property, there shall be no dispute as to her nationality. Madame Martin is now a widow living in England. The point is whether the Legislature, having prescribed a general law, an Act of Parliament should step in giving facilities to persons who are rich enough to obtain naturalisation before the five years have elapsed. I have, therefore, thought it desirable to call the attention of the House to the matter. In the second case, the applicant desires to become a partner in a City firm, and he cannot do so until he becomes an Englishman. He has only lived in the country for 18 months. In each instance the character of the applicant, as far as I can ascertain, is unexceptionable. In order that the House may have an opportunity of considering the matter, I move the adjournment of the Debate until Friday. In the mean time, any hon. Member who is interested in the matter can devote his attention to it, and see whether it deserves any further action or protest.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Courtney.)

*(3.10.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Although the case of Madame Martin is quite new to me, I should like to say a few words upon it. I think the question has already been decided in the case of "Laneville v. Anderson," in which the question of domicile in connection with a testamentary disposition of property was discussed by the House of Lords at full length. The effect of that decision is that it is not necessary for an individual to be naturalised, if he or she intends to settle here. I would suggest, therefore, that there is not sufficient reason for an Act of Parliament, as naturalisation could be effected in due course otherwise than on the grounds for which it is now asked. I do not wish to stand in the way of these Bills, but it seems to me that when a general naturalisation law has been passed, there ought not to be exceptions.

SIR ROGER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I wish to direct attention to the fact that this lady is possessed of real property in France, and is considered to be a French subject. It is unnecessary to remind the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) that the law of France deals with real property in a special manner.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The case of "Laneuville and Anderson," of which I have been speaking, was exactly a case in point.

Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Friday.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVANTS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government will consent to extend the Reference of the recently appointed Select Committee on certain points affecting the rights and claims of Members of the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India, so as to include various grievances of which the Civil Engineers in the employment of the Government of India complain in respect to their promotion, and to the manner in which posts in the Public Works Department are allotted?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The subject raised in the hon. Member's question is rather for the House to consider than the Government.

MR. BRYCE: Will the Government oppose the extension of the Reference if a private Member were to propose it?

SIR J. GORST: That question ought hardly to be addressed to me.

Mr. Bradlaugh

THE BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, considering that the International Labour Conference at Berlin is expressly stated in the Emperor of Germany's opening address to be a Conference of European States, that the Letter of the British Plenipotentiaries, of 19th March, 1890, states that "Southern Countries" are interpreted to mean Italy and Spain, and that Sunday rest was a prominent feature of the deliberations and resolutions of the Conference, he can say whether the case of more southern, tropical, and semi-tropical, non-European, and non-Christian countries was in any degree considered by the Conference; and, if not, whether the Secretary of State, in sending the resolutions of the Conference to the Government of India, has drawn attention to that circumstance, and has taken care that the Government is left perfectly free to deal with the matter, with sole reference to the situation and feelings of the natives of India, and is to be in no way hampered by the example of European countries; and whether it is quite understood that the postponement of legislation by the Government of India was entirely spontaneous, and in no way suggested by the Secretary of State, with a view to more stringent legislation founded on European examples?

SIR J. GORST: With regard to the proceedings of the Berlin Conference, the hon. Member will find them all fully stated in the Papers laid before Parliament. The Despatch in which the Secretary of State forwarded the proceedings to the Government of India, will be produced as soon as the correspondence relating thereto is completed. The answer to the last paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. The action of the Government in India was entirely spontaneous.

BETROOT SUGAR IN INDIA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the Indian Agricultural Department have made any trials with the view of introducing the cultivation of beet and manufacture of beetroot sugar into India, or will do so in view of the present shortness and dearness of sugar in that country necessitating importation?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; trials have been made at Scharmpore and other places, but they have not been attended so far with any conspicuous success.

THE LAWRENCE ASYLUM PRESS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what reply has been given to a Memorial addressed to His Excellency Lord Connemara by the printing and cognate trades of Madras, complaining of the competition which they have to sustain with the Lawrence Asylum Press, a quasi-Government institution, and protesting against the contemplated extension of its operations; whether the Asylum Press is exempt from the payment of Income Tax; whether it has recently added a new branch, namely, the sale of books on commission; and whether the erection of enormous new premises has commenced, and at what estimated cost?

SIR J. GORST: The whole subject of the Memorial in question and the position of the Lawrence Asylum Press is now under the consideration of the Madras Government. So far as the Secretary of State is aware, no decision has yet been arrived at.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether, in the meantime, the construction of the new premises will be proceeded with?

SIR J. GORST: I think that is a matter in the discretion of the Government of Madras.

HALL-MARKING.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state to the House the tenor of any communications received this year from the Viceroy on the subject of hall-marking, or whether he will lay upon the Table any correspondence on the subject?

SIR J. GORST: No official communication has been received from the Government of India respecting the matter referred to, except a very recent telegram in reply to a Despatch of May 15th. As the correspondence is not yet closed, the Secretary of State cannot at present state the tenor of this telegram.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman be surprised to hear that Colonel Ardagh, the Private Secretary of the Viceroy, wrote to say—

“The case is one in which Imperial interests are involved, and the decision remains with Her Majesty’s Government, who have been made fully aware of the entire position of hall-marking.”

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; I am not at all surprised to hear that the Private Secretary of the Viceroy has written on the subject.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I did not complain of Colonel Ardagh’s letter, but I simply asked whether, as late as the 16th of June, Colonel Ardagh had communicated with the Secretary of State to the effect I have just read.

SIR J. GORST: I stated that the correspondence with the Viceroy on the subject of hall-marking has not yet closed, and, until it is closed, I am not in a position to make any statement.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Then I did not rightly understand the right hon. Gentleman at first to say that there had been no official communication except a telegram?

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman understood me quite rightly. I said that there had been no official communication except a telegram.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Then there has been official correspondence between the Viceroy of India and the Secretary of State on the subject of hall-marking?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Then I beg to give notice that upon the Indian Budget, or at some other time, I shall read extracts from the correspondence.

CHARGE AGAINST AN INDIAN MAGISTRATE.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that, in the case of “Kapur Chander Lal v. Rounuk Thakur and others,” in the district of Tirhoot, Mr. Luson, Joint Magistrate, who tried the case after appeal had been entered against his decision, had interpolated the name of a defendant and altered his judgment after he had issued it, and given an attested copy of it both in the original judgment and the copy; though the judgment and the charge-sheet did not contain the name of the prisoner (Maharaj), yet he was sent to gaol, with a warrant containing a specific sentence; whether his attention has been called to the fact that the High Court Judges who heard the appeal declared—

"We cannot regard the omissions as clerical errors, such as would entitle the Joint Magistrate, under Section 369 of the Code, to make any correction in his judgment or other portion of the record,"

and that—

"In this case the effect of the alteration has been to make it appear that a man who has never been either charged, convicted, or sentenced, has been duly convicted and sentenced, the alterations so made being after he had repealed;"

whether Mr. Luson is still a Magistrate; whether he has been promoted since the above facts became known to the Government of India; and whether the Secretary of State proposes to take any, and what, action in the matter?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has no information upon the facts alleged in this question. He proposes to send the hon. Member's question to the Government of India.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the considerable difference in the rates of pay of every grade in the Metropolitan Police compared to those given by the Corporation of London to the City Police; and if, bearing in mind that the duties of the Metropolitan Police are both more arduous, more irregular, and more hazardous, owing to the excess of population, of crime, and of street demonstrations, he will give consideration to the matter with especial reference to the difficulty experienced by the police attached to the inner or town divisions in finding respectable lodgings for their wives and children, at moderate rentals, sufficiently near their respective police stations; and further, if, having regard to the frequency of Sunday leave and Sunday rest being interfered with by vast processions, requiring extra duty on the part of hundreds of men, he will consider whether the nine hours' continuous duty qualifying for refreshment allowance might not be advantageously reduced in such cases?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; the present law as to receiving Police Pensions is as stated. I understand that personal attendance is not required in the case of naval or military pensioners, but declarations have to be submitted by them under Section 6 of the Appropriation Act of 1889. It is my object and desire to save police pensioners from any needless inconvenience and expense, and I am advised that Sub-section 8 of Clause 7 of the Police Bill now before Parliament will, if passed into law, be effective in this direction.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Metropolitan Police pensioners are, under the present law, unable to draw their pensions save upon personal attendance at Scotland Yard, or upon submitting a declaration taken before a Magistrate, and that no such condition attaches to the payment of Naval and Military pensions; and in such cases, if he will make such addition to the Police Bill, as, while fully protecting the public, may enable a police pensioner to draw his deferred pay with as little inconvenience or expense to himself as is practicable?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; undoubtedly the City scale is, and probably will always be kept, higher than the Metropolitan; but there are certain compensating advantages which are enjoyed by the Metropolitan Police, and it is obvious that a scale of pay can be applied more easily to a comparatively small Force in a wealthy area than to a very large Force supported to a great extent by a poorer class of ratepayers. Moreover, it should be clearly understood that any general increase of the present pay of the Metropolitan Police cannot be effected without legislation authorising an increased rate. With regard to the suggestions in the second paragraph of the question, these are matters all of which are now engaging the careful attention of the Commissioner and of myself, with every desire to adjust the existing regulations to the alterations which have arisen of late in the conditions of police service.

ADJUTANTS OF VOLUNTEER ARTILLERY.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it be true that considerable difficulty is experienced in inducing Officers of the Royal Artillery to take the post of Adjutant to the Volunteer Artillery; whether this difficulty arises chiefly in consequence of the insufficiency of the present pay, allowances, and travelling allowances, to meet the unavoidable expenses connected with the appointment; whether, in view of the important position assigned to the Volunteer Artillery in the scheme for the defence of the country, it is of the greatest importance that they should receive the best possible instruction; and whether he will consider the desirability of endeavouring to obtain such instruction by attaching to the appointment of Adjutant an additional allowance of 6s. per day, thereby rendering them more attractive to the Officers of the Royal Artillery?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): From time to time difficulties have arisen as to the appointment of the Adjutants in question, but it is hoped that they may be overcome without incurring the serious expense suggested by the hon. Member. The subject is under consideration.

CABLE BETWEEN HALIFAX AND BERMUDA.

SIR E. WATKIN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Cable between Halifax and Bermuda is yet laid; and, if so, when it will be in operation?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The laying of the Cable from Halifax to Bermuda was completed a few days ago, and I understand that the line is now in operation. Telegrams were exchanged yesterday between the Treasury and its Representative in Bermuda within four hours.

ARMENIA.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state when Mr. Clifford Lloyd's Report and other Papers upon the present condition of Armenia will be in possession of the House; and whether, with a view to the serious state of affairs in that country, he will do his best to hasten their publication?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Papers up to a recent date respecting Asiatic Turkey have not long since been presented. Further Papers will be given when the full Reports of recent occurrences have been received.

MR. BURNETT'S REPORTS.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can see his way to have Mr. Burnett's Reports on matters affecting the working classes sent to workmen's clubs and institutes without charge?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The suggestion of the hon. Member is one well worthy of consideration, and I will bring the matter under the consideration of the Treasury, without whose authorisation no gratuitous distribution of Parliamentary Papers can be made.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: When will part 3 of these valuable Reports be laid on the Table?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot say, off-hand, but I will inquire.

PERPETUAL AND HEREDITARY PENSIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can yet state, or whether he will lay upon the Table, a Minute showing the course the Government intends to pursue in reference to the several perpetual and hereditary pensions, payments, and allowances still uncommuted, and the abolition of which was unanimously recommended by a Select Committee of this House so far back as 1887?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Minute was placed in my hands to-day, and will be laid on the Table to-morrow.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE (Finsbury, Holborn): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that, although by virtue of numerous Acts of Parliament Orders in Council published in the London Gazette have from the date of publication therein the same force in law as Acts of Parliament, in case the London Gazette is applied for at the offices of the publishers within six months of the date of publication, a charge of one shilling is made for the same, and after that date an increased charge is made for such copies as remain in print, and that it frequently happens that copies of the London Gazette containing Orders in Council having the force of Acts of Parliament are allowed to be out of print, so that they cannot be purchased even at an increased charge; and whether, having regard to the large sum paid to Her Majesty's Government by the publisher for the privilege of printing and selling the London Gazette, Her Majesty's Government will take measures to provide that Orders in Council having the force of Acts of Parliament should be on sale at prices not exceeding those charged for Acts of Parliament?

MR. JACKSON: I think there is force in the point raised by my hon. Friend, and I will consult the Statute Law Committee upon it, who are at present considering how to make Orders in Council, Warrants, or Minutes founded on Acts more available.

THE CENSUS.

MR. ARTHUR ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Report of the Departmental Committee on the Census, which was promised many weeks ago, and has been laid upon the Table for some time, will be circulated?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No one can be more astonished than myself to find that the Paper has not already been distributed. It will be in the Vote Office to-morrow.

REMUNERATION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in consequence of the increased length of the Sessions of

Mr. Gainsford Bruce

Parliament, Her Majesty's Government will propose an increase in the remuneration of the officials of the House of Commons?

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): May I ask whether, in view of the proposed length of the Session, the Government will consider the desirability of providing remuneration for Members of Parliament, as well as the officials?

*MR. GOSCHEN: My right hon. Friend has requested me to answer this question. We are, of course, fully conscious of the value of the services rendered by the officials of this House, but we do not think that either their hours of attendance or their emoluments will compare unfavourably with those of other public servants.

SIR R. FOWLER: I beg to give notice that I will call further attention to this subject.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will now state, for the convenience of the House, whether Bills are to be proceeded with or Supply taken after to-day's sitting, and, in the former case, what Bills, in the latter, what Votes?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I intend to proceed with the Irish Estimates to-morrow, Thursday, and probably Friday also.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): It would be convenient to know precisely when the proposals of the Government upon Local Taxation will be laid before the House?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will take care that the Government proposals with regard to the Local Taxation Bill are before Members in sufficient time to give them an opportunity of considering them. It is not possible yet to fix a day for their discussion. I will make the proposals known to the House either on Thursday or Monday. I will abide by this answer.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): When will the Report of Supply be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If a Vote is taken at or about 11 o'clock, the Government propose then to take Report of Supply. The Irish Estimates will be taken tomorrow, Thursday, and possibly also on Monday.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: As I have a question on the subject, I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has anything to add to the answer just given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting the Local Taxation Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: At what time does the right hon. Gentleman propose to move the Closure?

[No answer was returned.]

HELIGOLAND.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the copies of the terms of the Capitulation of Heligoland in 1864 and 1868 as to the Government of Heligoland, ordered to be printed by the House, will be printed and delivered?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is hoped that the Papers will be issued in the course of the week.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask when the Papers relating to Heligoland that were promised on 24th June will be laid upon the Table of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Almost immediately.

MALTESE MARRIAGES.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, before the Colonial Vote is reached, the Project of Law regarding marriages in Malta, which has been drafted in the Colonial Office for the purpose of being presented to the Legislative Council of Malta, so as to carry out the engagements recently contracted by Her Majesty's Government with His Holiness the Pope; and whether it is the fact, as has been reported, that this draft Project of Law has given rise to grave objections on the part of the representatives of the Church of England and other Protestant Churches now existing in Malta?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The draft of an Ordinance regarding marriages in Malta has been prepared by the Government of Malta and submitted for the approval of the Secretary of State, who has called for further information before considering its provisions. It is not proposed to lay the draft upon the Table. It would be most unusual, if not without precedent, to present drafts of colonial measures which are under discussion. Objections have been made, as stated in the question, but to provisions which the objectors have anticipated the Ordinance will contain. Full consideration will be given to any objections.

*MR. BRYCE: Was there not an engagement to afford an opportunity of discussing this question on the Colonial Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot charge my memory with having made such an engagement. It is not possible for the Government to initiate an arrangement of this kind in the manner suggested by the hon. Member.

*MR. BRYCE: Is there not a draft Ordinance in existence, and has it not been shown to a good many people in London?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is a draft Ordinance, but it is under consideration, and, therefore, cannot be laid before the House.

TORY ISLAND.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is true that the poles for the postal telegraph land lines, to connect with the lines and cable now being laid between the lighthouse on Tory Island, on the north-west coast of Ireland, and the main land of Ireland, by Lloyd's, are to be conveyed from England to Ireland by sea, notwithstanding that plentiful supplies of timber exist on the spot; and whether he will give such instructions as will lead to the completion of the Post Office work by the time the work carried out by Lloyd's is ready for public use?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that the poles on which the wire will be erected to connect the cable from Tory Island with the postal telegraph system are now being conveyed by sea from the depôt at Belfast. There is no suitable timber on the spot. The terms of the Department were accepted by Lloyd's in a letter dated the 25th ultimo, and I hold in my hand a later letter from the secretary of that Institution thanking the Post Office for the steps it has promised to take to expedite the erection of the land line.

MAIMING HORSES AT TULLYGLASS.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on the night of the 7th instant, a yearling colt belonging to the Knight of Glyn was killed on an evicted farm of his at Tullyglass, a three year old colt stabbed in 30 places, and a two year old colt cut in two places; and whether any arrests have been made in consequence?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that on the 8th instant a yearling colt belonging to the Knight of Glyn was found killed on an evicted farm of his. The colt's skull had been battered in, and there were several wounds over the body as if inflicted with a hay fork. A three year old colt was also found stabbed in 30 places, apparently with a hay fork, and a two year old colt was likewise found cut in two places. No arrests have so far been made.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is there any extra Police Force at the place?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know, but will inquire.

GUN LICENCES.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Philipps, clerk of Petty Sessions at Timoleague, in the county of Cork, was recently prosecuted by the Inland Revenue Authorities for having carried a gun without a licence; whether the case was first dismissed by the presiding Magistrates; whether, when notice of appeal was given by the official who prosecuted, a fine of £2 10s. was imposed on the defendant; and whether the conduct of the Magistrates will be brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that Mr. Philipps was prosecuted by the Inland Revenue Authorities, as stated in the first paragraph, and that the Magistrates intimated their intention of dismissing the case in view of Mr. Philipps' explanation that he was merely conveying the gun to his new residence. The Inland Revenue representative, however, pressed the case, and stated that he would appeal against a dismissal, whereupon the Magistrates, after consultation, decided to impose a fine of £2 10s. with a recommendation to the Revenue Commissioners that the penalty should be reduced to a minimum, as there appeared, in the Magistrates' opinion, that no fraud had been attempted in the case, or any intention to break the law. I am not aware of anything in the case requiring the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

THE BANK OF IRELAND.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that the Bank of Ireland, with an authorised issue of £3,738,428, has an actual issue of not more than £2,700,000, or £1,000,000 under its powers, and that some other Irish banks have an actual issue of notes largely in excess of their authorised issues, and other Irish banks again are prohibited by the condition of the law from having any issue, the Government will take any measure to so adjust the issues as to give banks which are in excess of their authorised issues further facilities in that direction should their capital and resources warrant it, and to confer upon banks of non-issue, which at present labour under serious disabilities, such issuing powers as their respective business and resources entitle them to?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The question of the hon. Member raises very broad points of policy, amongst them that as to the propriety of conferring new powers of issue on banks which are at present non-issuing. The question of the extension of private issue is one of very great importance and delicacy. Any action, such as is suggested in the question of the hon. Member, would require legislation, and such legislation is clearly not possible at present. I have been anxious to deal with the whole subject of the paper currency, but it would require time and a clear course to carry any large measure of reform.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any objection to a regular inquiry with a view to legislation?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am conversant with the general facts of the case, and I do not think that an inquiry would be of much advantage.

OUTRAGE IN LIMERICK.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has now ascertained that Mr. Gubbins, into whose house an explosive machine was thrown on 20th June, is an inhabitant of the parish of Oola, in County Limerick, and not of the town of Tipperary; whether a man named John Rafferty has been arrested and returned for trial, and admitted to bail; and why Rafferty has been admitted to bail?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member, in putting this question, apparently intends to refer to my reply to a question put by the hon. Member for South Tyrone on 26th June. My reply then given was quite accurate. An explosive outrage was committed on 25th June, at the dwelling house of Mr. Joseph Duggan, in the main street, Tipperary, and, as I then stated, though I was at the time emphatically contradicted by the hon. Member who puts this question, Mr. Duggan is a shopkeeper. His business is that of a hardware merchant. The other outrage which the hon. Member now mentions is a wholly different one.

MR. SHEEHY: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last paragraph of the question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know why. I may be able to obtain further information.

CHARGE OF "MOONLIGHTING" AGAINST A POLICEMAN.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen a paragraph in the Echo of Saturday, headed "Moonlighting by a policeman," which stated that Constable Palmer has been convicted of smashing the windows of two houses in Tipperary, and has been sentenced for the second offence to two months' imprisonment with hard labour, but that the District Inspector of police said there would be a difficulty in finding him as he had left the country, and that the Magistrates made no observations on the conduct of the police in allowing the prisoner to escape; whether the Returns made to this House of outrages reported to the Royal Irish Constabulary include any outrages committed by members of the Constabulary themselves; and, if so, can he state in how many instances; and whether, if the facts are as stated, he will order a full inquiry to be made into the conduct of the police in allowing this constable to escape from justice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The answer to the first paragraph is, Yes. In answer to the second paragraph, the agrarian outrage Return only deals with offences which have an agrarian motive. The Return of ordinary outrages will, of course, include any committed by policemen. I am not aware whether there be any such. Thirdly, the police have no power to arrest, as there was no warrant issued against Palmer.

In reply to a question from Mr. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.),

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: The policeman was suspended at once from duty.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to assert that when the summons was issued the police had no power of preventing the constable from making his escape. Could they not at least have watched his proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In all probability his proceedings were watched.

MR. SEXTON: Why, in the case of a serious offence of this kind, committed at midnight by a constable, was he not shadowed and his escape prevented?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not believe it is the custom to shadow a person who has been summoned to appear before an ordinary tribunal.

MR. SEXTON: Did not the constable break the windows of several houses on the night in question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not gather that he did, or that the circumstances of the outrage were such as to constitute it a felonious act.

MR. R. L. JOYNT.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if Mr. Robert Lane Joynt has been appointed a Magistrate for the County of Clare; whether any property qualification in the county is necessary to such appointment; and, if not, on what other ground did he obtain the office; and whether there was any necessity for an appointment to the Magistracy at the time; and, if so, why did not the Lord Lieutenant of the County recommend to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland a resident and fit Catholic in Clare to the office of Magistrate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that Mr. Robert Lane Joynt has been appointed to the Commission of the Peace for the County Clare. He was recommended by the Lieutenant of the County as a fit and proper person to be a Magistrate, and appointed in the ordinary course. He has a residence in the county and is agent over the extensive property of Colonel White, who is obliged through ill-health to live out of Ireland. Mr. Lane Joynt was appointed to attend at Ballyvaughan Petty Sessions, where the services of an additional Magistrate were required. It rests solely with the Lieutenant of the County to submit names.

KILRUSH QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is a fact that there is an unsettled case at the instance of Patrick Lynan, Queen Street, Kilrush, in the Kilrush Quarter Sessions Court, for the past six years and nine months, and which has on some point of law been adjourned from Sessions to Sessions; and whether he will inquire into the cause of the delay?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I am making inquiry on the subject, and must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question until Monday.

"SHADOWING" IN IRELAND.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Mr. P. D. Kenny, of Birmingham, lately shadowed in Ireland by the police, writes to the Daily News, saying that and whether, in view of these statements, he has any further information to communicate to the House as to this case?

"Politics are no part of his business," denying "that he belongs to the National League of Great Britain," or "that he gave any one authority to describe him as about to attend an Irish meeting," and adding "that there was no reason in fact for the conduct of the police;"

Mr. Jordan

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware whether Mr. Kenny wrote the letter referred to, but it is altogether at variance with his utterances reported in the Nationalist Press. Mr. Kenny has publicly stated that he was a member of the National League of Great Britain, and he is reported as having attended meetings of suppressed branches of the League.

IRISH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to resolutions passed, on Wednesday last, at a meeting of lay and clerical members of the Irish General Assembly, demanding, for the Presbyterians, a fair share in the Parliamentary representation of Ulster, and also "the abolition of dual ownership in land;" and if he will use his influence with the Government to carry out and give effect to these recommendations?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not received a copy of the resolutions in question.

MR. PINKERTON: I will send a copy to the right hon. Gentleman.

GALWAY HARBOUR.

MR. PINKERTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the sum of £45,000, borrowed by the Galway Harbour Commissioners from the Board of Works for the purpose of improving their harbour, was advanced by that Board after careful examination and full approval of the plans and specifications submitted by Mr. Price, C.E., and that resolution, passed by the Harbour Board in favour of carrying out these new works, was only carried by a majority of one; if, after an expenditure of £45,000, a deep dock was constructed without an entrance channel, the water in the dock being 10 feet deeper than in the channel outside; and if, seeing that the port has derived no benefit from this expenditure, and as the Board of Works approved of and are responsible for everything that was done in the harbour, the Government will consider the advisability of either expending a further sum to deepen the entrance channel so as to complete the works as at first designed, or relieve the port from the burthen of this debt?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware by what majority the Galway Harbour Board agreed to the execution of the works of improvement which they themselves initiated. The Board of Works only approved the plans submitted by the engineer to the Harbour Board so far as they affected the security for the loan which they were asked to advance, and a loan of £28,000 to be supplemented from the funds of the Harbour Board was advanced in 1880. During the execution of the works the Harbour Board, without consulting the Board of Works, enlarged the area of the dock. Owing to this the funds available proved insufficient; a further loan of £8,100 was granted by the Treasury with great reluctance. I cannot admit that any responsibility attaches to the Board of Works.

EVICCTIONS AT CASTLEISLAND.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any moneys are due to the Board of Public Works, Ireland, on the farms from which Messrs. James Leahy, Jeremiah Nugent, and Michael Donovan, have been evicted at Castleisland, County Cork, and of which Mr. Thomas Henry Marmion is now in occupation; if moneys are due on them what are the amounts; and what steps have been taken, if any, to recover them?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the loans advanced were to James Leahy, £39; to Michael Nugent, £40; and Michael Donovan, £50; of which £37, £35, and £47 remain outstanding. Proceedings have been taken against Leahy and Donovan, who, however, have been found to have no means. No proceedings have been taken against Nugent, who is only one gale in arrear.

INCREASED PAY FOR TELE- GRAPHISTS.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the statement in the Times of to-day is correct as regards an improved scale of pay for telegraphists throughout the United Kingdom; what are the further advantages which, according to the Times, have been accorded to telegraphists in the matter of overtime, Sunday work, Bank holidays, and sick leave; whether it is a fact that 192 officials have been debarred from participation in any benefits to be accorded to others; and, if so, what is the reason for this punishment?

*MR. RAIKES: An improved scale of pay has been granted to telegraphists throughout the United Kingdom. I have not had time to examine the statement in the Times. All overtime, including Sunday work in the provinces, will be paid for at the rate of a time and a quarter. Telegraphists whose services are required on Bank holidays will be remunerated for them by extra pay at the ordinary, not the overtime rate, in any case when a holiday cannot be afforded on some other day. As I have, I think, already stated in this House, no deduction will henceforth be made in pay during sick absence in cases which the Postmaster reports to be of genuine illness. This was notified to the staff some weeks ago. I greatly regret to add that in consequence of a brutal and cowardly assault, committed last Friday by a number of telegraphists, at the Central Office, upon an unoffending person temporarily employed there, I have felt obliged to exclude from participation in these advantages those telegraphists whom there is ground to suspect of complicity in this outrage until they have cleared themselves of any share in it.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Was this unfortunate man who was mobbed severely injured and unable to work in consequence?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not know the actual extent of the man's injuries, but I do know that the man was mobbed, hustled, jeered at, beaten with a stick, and spat upon.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to know whether the man was so severely injured as to be unable to pursue his business?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not know the precise nature of the personal injuries received by this man.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): What would be the increase in the charge for the Service under the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman?

*MR. RAIKES: I think it would have been better if notice had been given of the question. Speaking generally, I believe that the cost of these additional advantages for telegraphists and sorting clerks will amount to no less than £200,000 a year.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to throw upon the persons suspected of the mobbing at the Central Office the burden of proving that they were innocent? Is the right hon. Gentleman going to disregard the legal presumption in favour of innocence until guilt is proved?

*EARL COMPTON: I wish to know whether some inquiry will be made into the case? I am informed that it has been greatly exaggerated.

*MR. RAIKES: The matter will form the subject of an inquiry. In reply to the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I have to say that it would, in my opinion, be very difficult in a case of this kind to fix the precise amount of culpability incurred by any one if suspected persons are not to come forward to clear themselves.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are persons to be punished on mere suspicion?

[No answer was given.]

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (WEDNESDAYS.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, for the remainder of the Session, Government Business have priority on Wednesdays."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.15.) MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I must protest against the Motion, as it will interfere with the progress of the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill, which stands on the Paper for to-morrow. It is a scandal that this measure should not be passed. The original Bill on the subject expired in 1882, and ever since that time legislation has been continued in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. The measure before the House this Session is approved by the great majority of the Irish people, and is supported strongly by the most prominent men in Ireland, including the Primate of Ireland, Archbishop Croke, Mr. Davitt, and the President of the Presbyterian Assembly. In view of the difficulty experienced in attempting to pass a Bill of this kind, I am not surprised that there should be a feeling in Ireland that Parliament cannot legislate for that country.

Mr. Raikes

*(4.17.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I wish to put in a plea for the first Order now on the Paper for Wednesday—the Public Health Acts Amendment Bill. The Bill is founded upon different local Acts, and the scheme of the Bill has been confirmed by the House in a remarkable manner by the provisions of Local Acts which have been passed during this Session. I trust that it may become law this Session.

(4.18.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I maintain that the Irish Intoxicating Liquor Bill is not an urgent measure at all. Sunday closing already prevails in Ireland, except in a few towns, and the object of the Bill is to extend Sunday closing to those few towns. The hon. Member for South Londonderry (Mr. Lea) knows very well that it is the intention of the Government, as expressed by their Attorney General, to oppose the Bill, and I have no doubt that the Government, supported by its own majority, and aided by a large proportion of Members on this side of the House, will defeat the measure if it is proceeded with. The result would be that if the Government give way to the hon. Gentleman Wednesday will be wasted.

*(4.20.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I think that the right hon. Gentleman, now that he proposes to take the whole time of the House for the rest of the Session, ought to state on what day he intends to take the Indian Council Bill? It has been upon the Paper from week to week, and all I ask now is that the right hon. Gentleman shall fix a day, so that there shall be no manner of doubt hereafter. I do not think that that is an unreasonable request. I also think that the right hon. Gentleman ought to give some explanation why the Government have made no effort whatever this Session to carry the Employers' Liability Bill, which was named in the Queen's Speech.

(4.21.) MR. H. GARDNER: I hope I may be allowed to enter a plea on behalf of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. The Bill has been before the country for half a century, and has again and again received the support of the House of Commons. It affects a matter of extreme importance to a large number of people, and I think the Government might very well afford facilities for carrying the measure.

(4.22.) MR. JORDAN: I think it is very unfair for the Government to shunt the Irish Sunday Closing Bill again. It is nothing short of scandalous for the Government to put off this question from year to year, seeing that opinion in Ireland is overwhelmingly in favour of it.

*(4.23.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I have listened with very great interest to the remarks made by hon. Gentlemen on the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. I fully admit the importance of the question, but I am not able to concur with the hon. Gentleman who opened the Debate in the remark which he made, to the effect that the Government seek to deprive Members who take an interest in the question of the opportunity they have of passing the Bill. There are 72 Amendments already on the Paper, and two Bills at least stand in front for consideration as amended. Therefore, I am afraid it would be only at a late hour to-morrow that hon. Members would have an opportunity of proceeding with this Bill in Committee. The hon. Gentleman must, therefore, see that there would be but little chance of getting this Bill through to-morrow. But, Sir, I am in the recollection of the House when I state that I believe the House itself has expressed, in the ordinary way, its desire that Wednesdays should now be taken for the better winding-up of the Session, and I could not resist that very general expression of feeling. I hope the hon. Gentleman will see that I am not depriving him of any opportunity of pressing forward his Bill, and I trust that yet, in the remaining days of the Session, he may find some opportunity of doing so. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh,) for my own part I am not able to concur in the view he has expressed. The hon. Gentleman is aware that I am exceedingly anxious that the Indian Council Bill should be considered by the House and passed, but he is also aware that other more urgent business remains to be done. I can only say now that I hope still it will be possible for the House to take that Bill before the end of the Session, and I can assure the hon. Member that he shall have due notice before it comes on. The hon. Member for the Saffron

Walden Division of Essex (Mr. H. Gardner) has spoken on behalf of a long-suffering class, who have waited for half a century for the passing of this Bill. I can hardly think that they will suffer very much more if they wait for another year or two, and I am sorry to say that I cannot ask the House to prolong the Session in order to pass that Bill into law. There is one other Bill, referred to by the hon. Member for Wigan, which stands first on the Paper for to-morrow for consideration as amended. Looking to the character of that Bill and of the Public Libraries Bill, and looking to the fact that they are supported on both sides of the House, I hope an opportunity will be found for passing them into law. When measures promoted by private Members have reached the stage these measures have reached, I think the House would desire that time should be found for taking the remaining stages.

*MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he again proposes to take Navy Estimates? I desire to remind the right hon. Gentleman, that during the present Session, only about four hours of one night have been given to Navy Estimates. On that occasion about £8,000,000 were obtained. The Navy Estimates this year amount to £14,500,000, or about one quarter the amount of the expenditure over which the House has any effective control. May I further ask what arrangements it is proposed to make for the further discussion on the Report of the Commission presided over by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale. Can it be discussed on the Admiralty Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The discussion of this Report has already proceeded for some hours. It will be possible to further discuss it upon the Admiralty Vote, which I hope will shortly be taken. But until the Irish Votes are disposed of it is impossible to make any definite arrangement as to other Votes.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That, for the remainder of the Session, Government business have priority on Wednesdays.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

CHARITABLE TRUSTS (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Rathbone, Bill to amend the Law relating to Charitable Trusts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Rathbone, Sir John Kennaway, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Mr. Cozens Hardy, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. Howorth, and Mr. Bryce.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 380.]

HOP INDUSTRY.

Report from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence, and an Appendix, brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 302.]

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

"To apply a Sum out of the Consolidated Fund to the Service of the year ending on the thirty-first day of March one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one," presented, and read the first time: to be read a second time to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to Inland Revenue Regulation Bill, without any Amendment.

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY
BILL [LORDS].—(No. 260.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question proposed [14th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES,
1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*(4.36) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): On this Vote it will not be a matter of surprise to the Committee that many Irish Members have many matters which they consider of great importance to bring under its notice, for I regret to say—although from one point of view it is not a matter for regret—that the exceptional law passed in 1887 to put down agricultural combinations in Ireland continues to be enforced in a manner that shocks all notions of common justice and outrages the general sentiment of the Irish community. I myself have been asked by several of my colleagues to deal with one particular prosecution, with the circumstances of which I happen to be specially acquainted, and I have gladly consented to do so, because I think it is a case which ought to be made known to the House of Commons and to the people of Great Britain as illustrating the monstrous and even ridiculous lengths to which the law of conspiracy as administered by the Chief Secretary's paid and removable Magistrates is carried in the interest of Irish landlords. The case to which I refer is that of Mr. John Kelly, who, for the second time within the last 18 months has been sentenced to, and is now undergoing, a cruel punishment for no act or word that nine out of any 10 men in any part of the civilised world would, for one moment, consider morally wrong, and which, I venture to add, no jury in Great Britain, empanelled as juries usually are in this country, could be got to pronounce unlawful. This, Sir, is a so-called conspiracy case. I have no intention of inflicting on the Committee a disquisition upon the intricate subject of the law of conspiracy, but to make clear the argument I intend to advance I may be allowed to say one or two words on the matter by way of preliminary explanation. In this country there have been times—times of social and political disturbance—when the Judicial Bench have manifested a tendency to widen the area of the law of criminal conspiracy. That tendency in England has almost invariably been checked by the intervention of the Legislature on the side of the so-called disturbers of the peace. For instance, Lord Bramwell and Lord Esher, 20 years ago, in the Trades Union cases, carried the doctrine of conspiracy against combinations of workmen to such an extent that in 1875 an Act was passed over-ruling their decisions, and now it is the law of the land, so far as Trades Unions are concerned, that no combination to do, or to procure to be done, any act in furtherance of a dispute between employers and workmen shall be indictable if the act complained of would not be punishable as a crime when committed by one person. In our country, too, the same tendency has been observable in times of disturbance, to widen the meshes of the conspiracy net, and even to go beyond the Bramwells and the Eshers, for—and this is an important point, which I do not think any lawyer in this House will venture to contravert—the Judges in Ireland have laid down as law in the case of the “Queen v. Parnell,” and subsequent cases, what Mr. Justice Stephen declares has never been decided by any English Court, namely, that a combination to break a contract is in itself an indictable offence. But, unfortunately, this Parliament has never been as careful of popular rights in Ireland as it has wisely shown itself of popular rights in England. It has never intervened in our case against the Judges and for the people. On the contrary, by the last Coercion Act, if certain decisions under that Act are right, it has revived and enacted, for the special behoof of agricultural combinations in Ireland, the doctrines of Lord Bramwell which have been expressly set aside in favour of Trades Unions in England. Lord Bramwell laid it down that a combination to restrain freedom of will and action by means which were not criminal, but which a Jury might think merely improper, was itself criminal. That is not now the law for English working men. But in a proclaimed district in Ireland, such a combination—and this is the very combination into which Mr. John Kelly is said to have entered, as I shall show—is still criminal, if those entering into it are agricultural tenants or their friends. Now, this is the first point I desire to press with the utmost emphasis on the Committee. Mr. Kelly, if he were a Trades Unionist or an agent of a Trades Union in England or Scotland, could not even have been indicted, much less punished, for the acts for which, because they were done in Ireland, and in behalf of agricultural tenants, he is now in gaol. He was charged with entering into a conspiracy to restrain the freedom of will and action of the tenants of Mr. Smith-Barry in Tipperary, by means which were criminal in themselves, but which, because his scene of action was the estate of Mr. Smith-Barry, and not the theatre of an English or Scotch strike of workmen, become criminal enough to cause him to be consigned to prison as a common malefactor. If there were nothing more in the case than this one fact, his prosecution and conviction would be a serious matter, for who will contend that it is wise or safe to have it so forcibly brought home to the minds of the people of Tipperary, and the rest of Ireland outside its towns—to the minds, in fact, of the whole agricultural population of Ireland—that they are denied rights of the utmost importance which, for 15 years, have been guaranteed by express provision of the Legislature to their fellow working men in the towns and cities of Great Britain? You have taught too many lessons of that sort to the Irish people already, and the result is the deep-rooted detestation of your rule which fills, and rightly fills, their minds. But the case of Mr. Kelly is worse than I have so far described it. He was charged with two offences. He was charged, first, with entering into a conspiracy to compel or induce the tenants of Mr. Smith-Barry not to pay their rents; and, secondly, with using intimidation towards them to that end. Now, I invite the attention of hon. Members to the all-important fact that the second charge was dismissed on the merits. He was found, as a matter of fact, not to have used intimidation. This fact, I venture to submit, clears the ground considerably. Whatever else Mr. Kelly did on the occasion of his alleged crime, we have it on the unimpeachable authority—unimpeachable, at least, on this subject—of two Resident Magistrates that he was not guilty of at least the crime of intimidation, which always evokes so readily the indignant eloquence of the Chief Secretary. But what about the charge of conspiracy of which he was convicted? How was that accusation sustained? I have read every word of the depositions taken before the Magistrates, and can give a copy of those depositions to any one in this House who desires to read them, and, therefore, what I am about to say now is not hearsay, or derived from those objects of the Chief Secretary's constant vituperation, the Irish newspapers. The only acts of his own, proved against Mr. Kelly, were that he went on an outside car through the Smith-Barry estate; that he entered, in company with one or two other persons, the houses of some of the tenants; that he partook of the hospitality of one of the tenants; and that at the house of another tenant he took part in conversation, which is reported as follows by a police spy who was concealed behind a hedge:—

"Mrs. Maher (wife of the tenant): There is the real campaign ground above.

Mr. Michael O'Dwyer: That is the woman to fight.

Mr. John Kelly: I find that the women are a great deal more determined for us than the men."

This is absolutely all. Not another word or act of his own was proved against Mr. Kelly. Well, in all this, taken by itself, there is manifestly nothing wrong, either legally or morally. The Removables could spell nothing out of it to his detriment. Not even the inventive genius of Lord Bramwell himself—so inventive of bogus conspiracies—could discover in it any evidence of legal guilt. It is not, yet at least, a crime to go on an outside car through a proclaimed district of Ireland, or to visit the houses of the tenantry in such a district or to accept their humble hospitality, or to pay a compliment, in a spirit of gallantry, to a peasant's wife; and, therefore, it was that the Removables acquitted Mr. Kelly of having used intimidation. But—and here now is the second great point in this case—the elastic law of conspiracy in an ultra-Bramwell fashion intervened to bag the Chief Secretary's game when all other expedients had failed, and when Mr. Kelly could not be convicted for his own acts alone. If Mr. Kelly himself did nothing illegal, somebody else did something in the same district which might be construed into illegality, and that was enough. On the 2nd December last a Mr. O'Dwyer, who was tried with Mr. Kelly on the charge of conspiracy and intimidation, delivered a speech in Cashel, of a character alleged to be illegal. Mr. Kelly was not present when he delivered it. He was not even in the district before or at the time O'Dwyer spoke, nor for a month afterwards. He did not know of the existence of such a man as O'Dwyer for four weeks afterwards. It will hardly be believed, but it is nevertheless true, that this speech of Mr. O'Dwyer, spoken in Mr. Kelly's absence and without his knowledge, was given in evidence against Mr. Kelly, and it was held that the harmless words Mr. Kelly spoke to Mr. Maher, and which I have already quoted, connected him with that speech, and made him responsible for it. It was held that when he said "the women are more determined for us than the men," he meant by the word "us" O'Dwyer and himself, and that in making this alleged reference to O'Dwyer he identified himself with everything that O'Dwyer had said and done on previous occasions when Mr. Kelly had not even known or heard of O'Dwyer. Moreover, Mr. William O'Brien, the Member for North-East Cork, also delivered a speech in the Cashel District, in June of last year. It was alleged to be of an illegal character. It is more than doubtful whether it was illegal. The Government themselves were so doubtful on the point that they suddenly dropped a prosecution, which they initiated in respect of it. But however that may be, that speech, too, delivered in Mr. Kelly's absence, delivered in Cashel six months before Mr. Kelly had even set foot in that place, delivered without any previous conference with Mr. Kelly—for Mr. Kelly was actually in gaol when it was delivered—was given in evidence against Mr. Kelly, and again his words to Mr. Maher—his use of the simple pronoun "us"—were held to connect him with it, and to make him responsible for it. And on the strength of those two speeches, not spoken by himself, or in his presence, or with his consent, Mr. Kelly was convicted of conspiracy, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment with hard labour—a sentence more severe than that often inflicted on men guilty of base and brutal crime. I ask every candid man who listens to me, whether he sits on that side of the House or on this, whether this use of the law of conspiracy, be it legally justifiable or not, is not, from the point of view of simple justice, utterly monstrous and even ridiculous? Could such a prosecution and conviction have taken place in England? But there is another point. In England, or in Scotland, as I have already shown,

Mr. Kelly could not even have been indicted if he had acted in the course of a Trades Union dispute the part he acted in Tipperary. I may now remind the Committee, in addition, that if he were indicted in this country for acting such a part in the course of any other dispute he should be tried by a Jury, and I state only what everyone knows when I say that in past times of crisis in England Juries have often refused, especially in conspiracy cases, to follow the rulings of Judges, and have thereby laid the very foundations of much of the liberty which Englishmen now enjoy. But in Ireland, for the first time in the history of the law of conspiracy, the question of fact involved is decided by the same tribunal as decides the question of law, and by the Coercion Act now in force Mr. Kelly, and all other men accused of conspiracies such as that now under discussion, are deprived of the protection of Juries, and are tried by two paid and removable agents of the very authority which prefers the charge, and which is vitally interested in getting a conviction. Even if the Magistrates in question were as immaculate as any Magistrates who ever lived—and I am not now alleging against them, or imputing to them, any personal dishonesty whatever, for I am not discussing, in fact, their action at all, but the action of the prosecutors in the case—I say that the substitution of this new tribunal for the old-established tribunal of a Jury in such a case and under such circumstances is well calculated to aggravate the public discontent which under all circumstances accompanies the administration of the present Coercion Act. I have seen the section of the Coercion Act which abolished Juries in certain cases, described as effecting only a change of procedure. A change of procedure, forsooth! A fundamental change in the Constitution in the Russian or Turkish direction, if frankly, openly, and formally made, would be far less objectionable. I think I know what the Chief Secretary will say in defence of the prosecution of Mr. Kelly. I guess it from what he has said before in reference to that gentleman. He will say, in the first place, that he was an agent of the promoters of the Plan of Campaign. To this allegation I reply that it is a self-evident absurdity, seeing that the Plan of Campaign does not exist and has never existed, or been promoted on the Smith-Barry Estate in Tipperary. But if it be true, then it ought to have been proved at the trial of Mr. Kelly, and it has never been proved. I contend, moreover, that the movement on the Smith-Barry Estate in Tipperary, whatever else it may be, has never been proved to be illegal in any way. But if it be illegal, then I say, again, the fact ought to be proved before anyone is accused or convicted of taking part in it. This was the course pursued when it was sought to make men responsible for taking part in the Plan of Campaign. The speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for East Mayo and North-East Cork on the subject of the Plan of Campaign were specially reported, and judicial pronouncements were had upon them; and then only it was that criminal proceedings were instituted against individuals for taking part in the Plan of Campaign. In this case no such course has been adopted, and, consequently, I deny the right of the Chief Secretary to say that Mr. Kelly was necessarily guilty of crime in joining the movement in Tipperary, even if it be proved, which was not proved, that he did join that movement. The Chief Secretary will, doubtless, say, in the second place, that Mr. Kelly is a bad character, that he has been in gaol before under his Coercion Act, that he was in gaol also in the Land League times, and that he has been engaged in infamous work, as he said last year in a speech in Scotland a few days before Mr. Kelly's appeal was to come on before the County Court Judge of Donegal when a sense of decency ought to have prevented him from saying anything at all on the subject. In reply, I say it is perfectly true that this is the fourth time that Mr. Kelly has been sent to gaol, and that three-fourths of the Irish people, knowing the character of his alleged crimes, honour and admire him for his courage and devotion. I have the pleasure of his acquaintance myself, and I should be ashamed of myself if, on this occasion, I did not say that I know him to be an honest, a courageous, and a self-sacrificing man, and that there is in him more moral worth and grit, and a higher appreciation of the duty one owes to his country, than in the whole gang of his persecutors, including some Ministers of the Crown. He has been in gaol before; so have been all the best men in Ireland; and whether Mr. Kelly has been imprisoned by the present Government, or by a Liberal Government, his imprisonment has been equally an outrage on justice. He has been engaged in infamous work, said the right hon. Gentleman last year. Right and wrong have been so confused by the administration of the Coercion Act that possibly the right hon. Gentleman himself is by this time unable to distinguish the one from the other. But, be that as it may, I may tell the Committee that the work of Mr. Kelly for the last three years—the work for which he has thrown up a prosperous commercial career, for doing which he has gone absolutely without any remuneration, except his expenses out of pocket, for doing which he has been shadowed and otherwise persecuted every day of his life—is providing shelter for and looking after the wants of the evicted tenants of Ireland in those districts where the policy of the right hon. Gentleman has found its bitterest expression in the extermination schemes of various landlord conspiracies. That has been Mr. Kelly's work, and that is work of which he need not be ashamed, and for which I hope the Irish people, at least, will see that he is suitably rewarded. The Chief Secretary will perhaps say, finally, that at any rate the decision of the Magistrates has been confirmed by a Division of the High Court in Dublin, and that, therefore, the prosecution has been vindicated by the highest legal authority. The answer is easy. The Court in Dublin affirmed the conviction of the Magistrates, but it did not express any approval of that conviction. The distinction is well known to lawyers. In deciding on a case stated, or on a motion for habeas corpus, the province of the Judge is simply to say whether there is any evidence at all from which a man might infer the guilt of the accused; he is not called upon, and he is not empowered, to say that if there be any evidence it is such evidence as would warrant a conviction. In this case the High Court merely decided that the speeches of Mr. O'Brien and Mr. O'Dwyer, to which I have referred at length, might be admitted in evidence, and so the action of the Government in bringing and persevering with the prosecution stands absolutely without approval by any other authority competent to pronounce on the subject. Mr. Courtney, under all the circumstances, I, for one, have no hesitation in saying that that action of the Government is a stain on the administration of the law and a gross abuse of the forms of justice.

(5.10.) MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian last year made a speech in the country in which he spoke plainly of the jury packing carried on by the present Government, and he said that the Attorney General had been rewarded for it. The Chief Secretary subsequently stated that that was a cruel charge. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, in his speech during the Debate on the Address, expressed surprise that this question of jury packing at Maryborough had not been dealt with, the Chief Secretary denied absolutely that any such thing had taken place. Now I have some claim to speak on this subject. I was present at Maryborough during the whole of these trials. I observed everything that was done, and I am in a position to state that most shameless jury packing was practised by the Authorities of the Crown. I wish to say a few words on the circumstances which led up to these trials. Everybody, I think, knows how it was that District Inspector Martin came by his death. Everybody knows that a warrant was out against Father M'Fadden on a charge of conspiracy because he had recommended some tenants in the locality to join the Plan of Campaign, that for a time the rev. Father "evaded" the police, that ultimately it was attempted to arrest him immediately after Mass with but a small force, that District Inspector Martin drew his sword and raised it above the head of Father M'Fadden, that there was at once a cry raised in the crowd that the Inspector was killing or striking the priest with a sword, that great excitement immediately arose, that the people rushed wildly forward, that one man struck the officer with a stick and killed him, that stones were thrown, and that Father M'Fadden himself was struck on the lips with one missile. This was the nature of the crime which was committed. What action did the Government take in the matter? The first thing was an inquiry before the Coroner of the district. At that inquiry no facts were adduced bringing guilt home to any particular individual. The policemen told their story simply, and the Jury decided that the death of the Inspector was caused by some person or persons unknown. But immediately after that, an outcry for blood was raised by the Tory Press of the North of Ireland, and the Government, it would seem, could not afford to disregard the opinion of their supporters in that part of the country. Consequently, a reign of terror was established in the entire district. At the trial of Coll, who is now undergoing 10 years' penal servitude, the Head Constable swore that he had visited altogether 300 or 400 houses, that he went to Coll's cabin three times in February, three times in March, and once in April, that in June he was there in broad daylight when Coll returned home, and yet, even then, he did not arrest him. That Head Constable Mahony (he was only a sergeant at the time, but he has since been promoted) was the officer who issued passes to the people, and the whole country was at the time in a state of terror through the action of the police. The Crown actually preferred a charge of murder against 22 persons, including Father M'Fadden; and the Resident Magistrates, doing no doubt what they thought would be agreeable to their superiors, and carrying out the wishes of the Crown Solicitor for Donegal, who conducted the prosecution, sent every one of the accused forward for trial on the capital charge. It will not do for the Attorney General for Ireland to get up and tell us that these persons were technically guilty of murder, for I heard the law on the point expounded by Mr. Justice Gibson at Maryborough to the Grand Jury, and the learned Judge distinctly laid it down that any person who on that occasion took an active part in these illegal proceedings, any person who threw a stone or used a stick, would be technically guilty of wilful murder. But it was not contended throughout the whole of the proceedings that Father M'Fadden and many of the others took any part in the proceedings or committed any act of violence. Surely, then, it was a most improper course to send all these persons for trial on the capital charge. A week or two ago there was a case being heard before a Magistrate in a Court close by here, and in which a medical practitioner and an officer were charged with being concerned in the death of an unfortunate lady. In the case of the officer the Magistrate, while saying that there was some doubt in reference to his case, acted on the sound principle of English law that a man was to be held innocent until he was proved to be guilty, and refused to commit him for trial, although he did take the course against the other accused person, in regard to whom the evidence was stronger. But if this had happened in Ireland, and if the subject of the inquiry had been the death of some officer of the law, if it had been possible to give to the case some political or sectarian complexion, every one accused would have been sent for trial, whatever the value of the evidence, upon the capital charge. But what was done by the Resident Magistrates in this case was too much even for the Attorney General for Ireland, and accordingly at Maryborough he discriminated between the prisoners and had Father M'Fadden and 10 other accused persons indicted on a minor charge. Then, Sir, came the action of the Attorney General of which I most strongly complain, and that was the change of venue for the trial. The Committee will observe that these accused persons were brought from a remote corner of Donegal to the centre of Ireland for the trial. They were not tried before a jury of their peers, but they were tried before a Special Jury in Queen's County, the majority of whom were of a different religion. It would have been impossible for anyone not to share the feeling I heard expressed by the Judge with regard to Coll, that one could not but feel a certain amount of pity for this poor Donegal peasant, brought far from his home to be tried amongst strangers, and in a language which he but imperfectly understood. Surely, under such circumstances, the Government need not have also resorted to the expedient of packing the Jury. But what was done? Why, Sir, at the trial of Coll, the first of these prisoners, no less than 42 Catholic Jurors of Queen's County were ordered to stand aside, and not a single Catholic was put on the Jury. As far as could be judged from the demeanour of the Jurymen who were allowed to remain in the box, they entered it with a determination to listen to nothing in favour of the accused. I am credibly informed that they took no notes whatever; and it is currently reported that at the close of the trial 10 of the 12 were in favour of convicting on the capital charge, while the other two favoured a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. Can any thing be said in justification of this action of the Crown? Would it not have been sufficient to try these persons before a Special Jury without weeding out all the Catholics, so as to retain on the Jury men who were the most bigoted political opponents of, and who had no sympathy whatever for, these persons? How unequal are the relative powers of the Crown and of the prisoner in regard to challenging Jurors. The prisoner can only challenge 20 peremptorily; the Crown, on the other hand, considering the length of the panel, has virtually unlimited right of challenge. The panel on that occasion contained the names of 217 jurors, and out of these the Crown ordered no fewer than 42 to stand by before an exclusively Protestant jury was secured. Since the trial a Petition has been presented to the Crown praying for Coll's release, and the answer returned has been, in spite of the circumstances I have narrated, that the law must take its course. When we consider the circumstances under which these men were tried, when we remember how terribly they were handicapped, and how terrible were the odds against them, surely it is a cruel act on the part of the Executive to retain this man in prison any longer. The evidence against him consisted entirely of police evidence. There were six policemen present on the occasion, and four of those were unable to identify Coll. The case for the Crown, in fact, virtually depended on the evidence of one constable only. That man swore that when he saw his officer in danger he ran for his life, that when he came back he saw Martin on the ground, and that in a few moments he witnessed sufficient to enable him to identify 15 persons as having thrown stones. That seems an extraordinary story. He was asked how he managed, in a moment of panic and terrible excitement, to identify all these prisoners? He replied that the more his temper rose the more his powers of observation increased.

Mr. W. A. Macdonald

The Judge told us about a man who had extraordinary powers of memory when leading a forlorn hope. But I venture to think that no English jury would have convicted this man upon the evidence of the policeman who gave such an account of the proceedings. The next case which came on was that of John Borrogher. The jury empannelled had upon it a sort of stock Catholic—a Castle Catholic—a man with no sympathy for the great mass of the people. There were some intelligent and enlightened Protestants on that jury, and they disagreed in the case of Borrogher, who is now a free man. The evidence was practically the same as the evidence given in the previous case. In the first the jury gave a verdict of manslaughter, and the prisoner was sentenced to penal servitude. I ought to mention that in the case of Hall an alibi was proved by three men who, without any stretch of imagination, would be called Government servants—a sergeant of militia, a schoolmaster, and a telegraph clerk. All these witnesses swore to seeing Hall in a position where he was doing nothing; yet the jury were told that the story these three respectable men told was a strange and improbable one. The incident did not end there. Special jurors of Queen's County have been accustomed to this sort of thing for a very long time. They have been dragged away from their homes again and again simply to be mocked and told by the Crown Solicitor to "stand by." They determined to stand it no longer. Three of them strongly protested. On the first day the Judge confined himself to ordering one of them to be taken out of Court. On the second day, in Borrogher's case, he fined each of the special jurors who protested £20. That did not deter the special jurors, who felt they had been outraged and subjected to a cruel injustice, and that it was an insult to be told that they could not be believed, for that was what this wholesale exclusion virtually meant. They resolved to respectfully raise similar protests should opportunities arise. An opportunity did arise, but the Crown had learnt wisdom. One unfortunate man who had been tried twice, the juries disagreeing, was sent to Maryborough to be tried a third time. They packed the jury, and the jury again disagreed. The man was put on trial a fourth time, and once more the jury disagreed. And it was actually intended to try him a fifth time, when a letter appeared in the Freeman's Journal, and that letter attracted the attention of a London editor, an article, too, was written in the Freeman's Journal. The fifth trial of the man was abandoned, and he was allowed to leave the country. How long is this sort of thing to go on? Are the Catholics of Queen's County to be summoned these long distances only to be told they are not wanted? Will the Attorney General say that for the future juries to be empanelled in Ireland shall be honest juries? Will he say that in cases of this sort the question of religion shall not be dragged in? Will he see that men are taken for juries because of their good character and irrespective of their faith? I see the statement that the next Assizes are to be at Maryborough, and I warn the Attorney General that if this is repeated a spirit will be awakened which will certainly find expression. The men of Queen's County have been outraged too long to endure this sort of thing, and it will not help the Government nor the Conservative Party in the constituencies if such incidents are reported to them, and if they read in the newspapers that Catholics are ordered to stand by indiscriminately, and that there is no fair trial nor justice for unfortunate prisoners.

*(5.40.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): Sir, I desire to occupy a short time in reference to the trials just spoken of by my hon. Friend. I think they raise important questions which truly deserve consideration. The trials at Maryborough had their origin in the unfortunate death of District Inspector Martin, on the 3rd February. Mr. Justice Gibson said that the attempted arrest of Father McFadden was highly imprudent, and that, having regard to the feelings of an excited peasantry, it should have been done with the aid of a commanding force of police. There was a large body of police some 200 or 300 yards from the place, yet some few officers were allowed to provoke a disturbance, with the result that the unfortunate District Inspector Martin lost his life. We have already heard that for nine months the prisoners were kept in Derry Gaol, and then these wretched peasants were taken away to Maryborough, a distance of some 200 or 300 miles, and involving to the 150 witnesses summoned in their behalf, a two days' journey at great expense. What I want to do is to lay special stress on the system of jury packing as I saw it carried out at Maryborough on the occasion in question. I do not think English Members fully understand what it means. I do not think anyone save he who has actually witnessed it can appreciate what is really done. There were 217 of these special Jurors on the panel or list—that is to say, every man in the county who is rated at £50, or in certain parts at £100. What took place? The Crown Solicitor sitting with this list—carefully marked, as I saw from where I sat—when a man's name was called, said "stand by" in instances where he was not satisfied with reference to his religion or politics. I am almost ashamed in this Committee to refer to the question of religion as entering into consideration at all. Of 42 objected to, 40 were Catholics and two Protestants, who were suspected of Nationalist sympathies. As a result of the process, 12 Protestants were got into the Jury box. I want to refer to the method by which they were got there. The Jurors were called one by one; and after several had been objected to, this sort of thing took place. A Mr. Delany was ordered to "stand by" by the Crown Solicitor. He asked, "Why am I told to stand by?" The Judge said—

"I cannot answer that question, nor can you ask it. The Crown has got the right and so as the prisoner to object to a juror."

The Judge told Mr. Delany to retire and not to interrupt. Mr. Delany said he was present to do his duty, and the Judge said he must retire. Ultimately, the Judge said—

"Policeman, show this gentleman out. I am reluctant to do anything which might appear harsh to a gentleman of respectability on the jury panel, but it is right it should be understood that a prisoner is entitled to 50 challenges by law"—The McDermott: 50 my Lord!—20' The Judge: '20, I beg your pardon."

The controversy between the Judge and Mr. Delany was continued for some time, Mr. Delany saying—

"I do not want to be disrespectful, but I will say that the juries of Queen's County always did their duty until counsel for the Crown or other officials came here to cast a slur upon them."

Well, this sort of thing went on until there were no fewer than 28 jurors all in a batch who were ordered to stand by. Then, there was another protest. This poor Donegal peasant said he would like to know if there was a single Catholic on the jury, but the Judge, as a matter of course, would not allow that question to be answered; and when the jury had been constituted, and those who had been ordered to stand by were about to leave the Court, or appeared to be about to do so, Mr. McDermott asked that they might not be allowed to leave, as it was not unlikely that they might be wanted on another occasion, as there were other prisoners to be tried. He also alluded to them as Catholic jurors, whereupon the Judge told him that he must not refer to the matter of religion, remarking—

"It is very undesirable, Mr. McDermott, for all interests concerned, to introduce any reference to religion in Court."

I am now going to give the Committee some of my own personal testimony. While all this was going on I was occupying a seat in the gallery, and sitting next to me was an Irish gentleman, a Magistrate, living in the county, who had been summoned as a juror. He was exceedingly kind in the communications he made to me, sitting there as a stranger, and what he said impressed me very much, because the Judge, in his summing up at the end of the case, said to the jury—

"Our law knows no distinction of creed, or class, or race."

This is a very estimable sentiment, no doubt; but the kindly Magistrate and jurymen who sat beside me said as the jurors were being told to stand aside, "I know them all," and as each was called he would say in one case "that man is so and so; they will challenge him, as he is a Catholic; he will not be allowed on the jury." When that man had been challenged he would say, as another was called, "He is a Protestant; he is all right, and will be taken on." That gentleman was right in every case. When the jury had been completed he said, "Every one of them is a Protestant, and their fathers were all Scotchmen." Now, I ask the Committee, What does this in reality mean? Does it mean that no distinction is made in creed,

Mr. H. J. Wilson

class, or race, or does it mean that trial by jury in Ireland is converted into a perfect farce and scandal. Everybody knew, like my friend in the gallery, that all the Protestant jurors would be accepted, and all Catholics rejected, and yet the rejected men were substantial and respectable individuals; seven of them were farmers occupying large farms; one a gentleman farmer, and one a merchant and Justice of the Peace, while three others were described as gentlemen. This sort of thing seems to me to cast contempt upon the whole business. It seemed to me that these proceedings threw a slur on the whole procedure of trial by Jury in Ireland, and that as a friend, and able lawyer, who was once a Member of this House—the late Mr. Charles Crompton—said, in a published letter in reference to this system, the whole thing was a complete farce. When the Jury was constituted counsel for the defence applied that the Jury should be allowed to view the spot where the circumstances connected with the trial had taken place. He said the nature of the place was such that much of the evidence would hardly be properly understood unless the Jury did see the spot. This application was, however, not complied with, and for my part I do not hesitate to say that, having visited the spot, both before and after the trials, it was absolutely necessary that the Jury should have seen it in order thoroughly to understand the case. I confess that I did not understand some of the evidence, and could not attach that weight to it which it deserved, although I had previously seen the place, until I had again visited it, and I think it might have materially affected the view taken by the Jury had they been enabled to view the scene. Of course, the removal of the prisoners for so great a distance to be tried threw an additional difficulty in the way and afforded an additional means of tightening the cord round the neck of that wretched man William Coll. I may say that nothing I have ever before witnessed before a Judge sitting in Court could be compared for one moment with the manner, the language, and the insolent bearing of the then Attorney General (now Chief Justice O'Brien) who conducted the prosecution. His air of easy indifference and buffoonery was simply and utterly disgusting, and the way in which he pleaded against the prisoners was marked with desperate energy. I am glad the present Attorney General for Ireland is here to listen to what I am saying, as I am sure from what we have seen of his demeanour in this House it would never be thought that he could be guilty of such conduct. Those who are acquainted with the duties of a criminal lawyer, far better than I, assure me that it is no part of the duty of the prosecuting counsel in a case of murder to do more than put the facts fairly before the Jury; that he has no right to plead with desperate energy for the hanging of a prisoner, as the then Attorney General for Ireland did. At the first day of the trial the accommodation in the small Court House was very scanty, and the Sheriff gave tickets of admission, as it was necessary to reserve seats for the 217 Jurors who were summoned there. On the second day, almost all the Jurymen were allowed to go to their homes, but still the police excluded the public from the Court. They even used force to prevent the entrance of Mr. O'Doherty—until recently a Member of this House—who was the solicitor for the defence. Others, including the hon. Member for Darlington and myself, were refused entrance, and it was not until the Judge had given the police very peremptory orders on the subject, after they had disregarded his first orders, that the police were allowed to exercise their right of entrance. The action of the police showed that they set the Judge even at defiance. A very significant thing occurred on the fourth day. The Attorney General refused, on purely technical grounds, to produce a Report which one of the constables, who was called as a witness, had made with reference to the death of Martin and the arrest of Father M'Fadden. It was said that the Report was only made as a matter of police discipline; and although it was believed that the document was totally different to the evidence given by the constable at the trial, it was withheld from the Jury. The Attorney General for Ireland considered it to be his duty to try and get the accused hanged, actually withholding evidence at the trial which appeared absolutely essential to the defence. Here, again, I complain of the method in which Crown prosecutions are conducted in Ireland, prisoners not being allowed the benefit of any discrepancy there may be between the different statements of a witness. The Judge's feelings evidently was that the Report ought to have been produced. The evidence throughout the case showed that the Attorney General and those associated with him were anxious not to get at the truth, but to get a man hanged if possible. I do not think I need go further into these details, but I can confirm the hon. Member who has already spoken as to the extremely unsatisfactory character of the evidence for the prosecution, and it is difficult to understand how the Judge came to point out to the jury that almost everything which fell from the police was capable of explanation, whereas he enlarged on every discrepancy which could be made to tell against the credibility of the witnesses for the defence. When the second trial occurred, we had the same state of things over again, with the exception that one Catholic Juror was allowed to go into the box—a boycotted landlord. The protests of indignant Jurymen were renewed, who complained not only of the indignities cast upon themselves and their religion, but against being brought there twice a year from remote parts of the county, and being compelled, under a penalty, to remain there when they knew perfectly well their attendance was absolutely useless and their time absolutely thrown away. Notwithstanding the careful way in which it was selected, the Jury disagreed, and then came a curious breakdown of the proceedings, the other prisoners being ultimately induced to plead guilty, doubtless in the hope of getting light punishments. Instead of that, the sentences were monstrous. It was curious to notice the light in which the prosecution and the Legal Authorities regarded the people they were treating as criminals. Father M'Fadden had been brought there to take his trial, and yet, when bail was wanted for the appearance of another of the accused, that rev. gentleman's assurance that the man would come up when wanted was accepted by the Court. How can it be contended after this that there is no difference between political crime and ordinary crime in Ireland? And now with regard to the case of William Coll, I have here a copy of a Memorial addressed to the Lord Lieutenant asking that the clemency of the Crown may be extended to the prisoner.

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a matter that goes beyond the Vote, which only has reference to the conduct of prosecutions. Remarks with reference to the Judge, as also the hon. Member's present observations, are quite inadmissible.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: If you say I cannot refer to that of course I will not do so. I simply wish to say, in conclusion, that to me it is marvellous how anybody on the opposite Benches or anywhere else can hope that law and order will be respected or observed in Ireland when such a state of things as I have described as having occurred at Maryborough are permitted to exist in Irish Assize Courts.

(6.10.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I confess that, as an Irishman who has from his youth upwards been familiar with the process of law which has been described by the hon. Member who has just sat down, I rejoice that Englishmen nowadays go over to Ireland and acquaint themselves by observation with the details which have made the administration of the law hateful to the people of that country. We have heard with a repetition almost nauseating the old stock statements about the preservation of law and order. Why, the first step necessary to the preservation of law and order in Ireland is to do away with the system the hon. Member who spoke last has described. No amount of increasing the stringency of the law will be of any use until you do away with the entire system which Englishmen are now beginning to understand in all its hideous details. It shocks everyone who goes over from this country to inquire into it, whether Liberal or Liberal Unionist, and I say that as long as it exists it will make the Criminal Law odious to the people of Ireland, because they know that the very last place in which they can seek or hope for justice is a Criminal Court. We have had a specimen of the impression that that system makes upon an Englishman who is accustomed to the procedure in this country, but we are so familiar with the system that we feel somewhat surprised to see Englishmen so much shocked. We never expect anything else. Irishmen have never looked to the Irish Attorney General for honesty in the administration of the law. It has been a matter of absolute astonishment and wonder that men, who in their ordinary relations of life are honest, seem, when they go into a Criminal Court, to forget what honour is, and resort to the basest and most dishonourable means in order to sacrifice the lives of their fellow-men. Every one knows that the late Attorney General for Ireland deliberately suppressed evidence that was in his hands, and wrote across his brief copy "Not to be used," because he knew that if it had been used it would have saved the life of an innocent man who was murdered. Such a thing as that is no crime in the eyes of the Government officials, who recognise nothing as dishonest when their desire is to obtain a conviction. We have just listened to one of the most remarkable and convincing speeches ever delivered in the British House of Commons, on the system of Jury packing in Ireland, which is such a fundamental portion of the administration of the law in that country, and which has been so unblushingly denied by Government after Government. Anyone of ordinary candour of mind listening to the hon. Member must have been convinced of the scandalous and outrageous character of that system. But, Sir, I rose for the purpose of urging on the Irish Attorney General that he should now stand up and give some answer to the two grave charges that have been brought forward, namely, the case of Mr. Kelly, and the matter of Jury packing at Maryborough. I will not go into all the charges made by the hon. Member who opened this discussion, but I will lay before the Committee the points in the indictment that appear to me to be the most important and to urgently require an answer. My hon. Friend (Mr. Clancy) clearly showed that in the case of John Kelly the Crown had entered into a prosecution against a man who had been guilty of no criminal word or act. The Attorney General for Ireland, I think, will not be able to deny that. When you, Sir, interrupted my hon. Friend at the beginning of his speech, he was pointing out what is a notorious fact to all acquainted with the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland—that there is a very great difference between the administration of the law in Ireland and in this country, because all these prosecutions are part of the policy of the Irish Law Officers, acting, I suppose, under the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. In Ireland every prosecution comes into the hands of the salaried prosecutors of the Crown. If a prosecution be an important one, dealing with politics, the Attorney General is always consulted; and what we complain of in the case of John Kelly is, that the Crown Prosecutors, salaried out of the Public Treasury, and directly responsible to the Attorney General in Ireland, acted in the prosecution and obtained a conviction by the force of their great influence. They acted as the representatives of the Government with the facts of the case before them, and knowing that they were engaged in an attempt to extend the law of conspiracy in a way which, if it were attempted in England, would turn the country upside down. Supposing it were possible in this country under the Common Law to give such a scope to the law of conspiracy, as has been given in Ireland in the case of John Kelly, I have no hesitation in saying that in a couple of days England would be turned topsy-turvy, and the majority in the House of Commons who assented to it would be turned out of power. In the case of John Kelly there were only two items of evidence, and, presumably, they were before the Crown in the information on which they based their prosecution. One of these was that John Kelly drove round the disturbed district in an outside car, and went into the houses of certain people. This was given in evidence, and Mr. Kelly very naturally asked, "Is that a crime?" The next thing proved was that a policeman, hiding himself behind a hedge outside one of the houses in which John Kelly was, listened to a conversation which took place between him and the woman of the house, and heard him say as he came out, in reply to a statement by a Mr. O'Dwyer, that "this is a woman to fight." "I find the women more earnest for us than the men." That was all the evidence against John Kelly—all that it was attempted to prove. The charge of intimidation and conspiracy were made against him on this evidence. The first of these charges was dismissed, so that we have only to do with the charge of conspiracy; and although that which I have described was all the evidence forthcoming on this charge, Mr. Kelly was convicted, and is to-day undergoing a sentence of four months' imprisonment with hard labour. He is suffering that imprisonment, not directly through the action of the Magistrates, but indirectly through the action of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. What is the doctrine by the Executive—what is the scope and application of the law of conspiracy they sought to affirm by this prosecution against Mr. Kelly? On that day he was in the company of a certain Mr. O'Dwyer, a farmer of the district, now also in gaol. Mr. O'Dwyer had delivered a speech in the district some three or four weeks before Mr. Kelly came there. It was shown that Mr. Kelly had not known Mr. O'Dwyer until three weeks after that speech was delivered, and yet the speech was put in evidence against him and accepted as such. Then, for fear that should not be enough, a speech was put in which had been delivered six months before by the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) in a part of the district 15 miles away, and it was concluded that the word "us" used by Mr. John Kelly, and overheard by the policeman, covered Mr. O'Dwyer and the hon. Member for North-East Cork who had made these speeches. This was the evidence on which Mr. Kelly was convicted of conspiracy and imprisoned—and not only that, but upon which he was condemned to hard labour, which I consider to be a most monstrous outrage. You have there an example of the lengths to which this law of conspiracy can be carried. Now, mark this fact. Here is this man John Kelly, denounced by the Government in this House as a bad character, a boycotter, and an agent of crime—the worst charge the right hon. Gentleman could bring against him, I suppose—after all the spying that has been going on in the district charged with intimidation. The case breaks down—it is dismissed on its merits. With all their servile agents they are unable to prove the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary denounces people in this House because he requires no evidence, but in Court it is necessary that he should, at any rate, have a shred of decency. It is only a wretched fig leaf that does for decency, I admit, but even the dilapidated fig leaf in this case breaks down. So that the right hon. Gentle man had better be a little more careful in the future, before hurling charges of intimidation against the Irish people in the matter of these conspiracy cases. The right hon. Gentleman may talk about intimidation at large, and may appeal to his friends and the country in regard to it, but here is a case as to which we give him the facts. Let him deny them, if he can, and defend the Government for giving so ruinous and outrageous a scope to the doctrine of conspiracy which is absolutely destructive of civil liberty—which leaves the liberty of the people absolutely at the mercy of the Government of the country. If this principle, attempted to be established in the case of John Kelly, were admitted, no two men could confederate together for any object which the Executive Government thought to be objectionable, without being drawn into the net of criminal conspiracy, and being sent to imprisonment. It would be absolutely impossible for two or more individuals to combine together for any purpose. I demand from the Government an explanation of this case. I also demand to know why no attempt has been made to prove the combination on the Smith-Barry estate to be illegal. The hon. Member for North Dublin asserted, and asserted with truth, that the combination on the Smith-Barry estate is not legal even under the Crimes Act. When I and my friends were put on our trial for joining the Plan of Campaign, what course was pursued by the Government? They sought to establish, and did establish to the satisfaction of the Judge—though not of the Jury—a thread of communication between myself and my hon. Friends at Woodford, and other places where there was resistance to the police. The doctrine of the Plan of Campaign, published in the paper of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, was put in evidence, and before the Government attempted to remit cases to the Magistrates' Courts they obtained from two Judges in Dublin a solemn judgment that the Plan of Campaign, as proved in that Court, was an illegal conspiracy. They proceeded against us, sought to connect us with the Plan of Campaign, and then they referred the case to a Judge of the Supreme Court. Nothing of the kind has been attempted in the

Smith-Barry case. The entire methods are different. The people left their houses of their own free will. When the Sheriff's Officer came round he found the houses clear of furniture and no resistance offered. I contend that the combination is legal. Where is the offence of leaving a house, hiring some land in the neighbourhood, and going into another house? That is all the Smith-Barry tenants have done. It rests with the Government to prove that the combination on the Smith-Barry estate is an illegal combination, and, until they do so, they have no right to prosecute for criminal conspiracy any man at a Magistrate's Court, before men who are admitted to be grossly ignorant of the law. The three great grounds on which we quarrel with the prosecution of Mr. John Kelly are, that no attempt was made to prove against Mr. Kelly any offence against the law, in word or deed; that the prosecution involved a monstrous, and hitherto unknown, extension of the doctrine of criminal conspiracy, and that the Crown, in conducting the prosecution, deliberately assumed that the combination on the Smith-Barry estate was illegal. I contend that the combination was perfectly legal, and that hon. Gentlemen opposite have no right to assume it to be illegal until they have proved it to be so in a Court of law.

*(6.32.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): With one portion of the speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) I heartily agree, and that is the passage in which he expressed a wish that Englishmen should go over to Ireland to study the proceedings in our Courts, and observe the manner in which justice is administered. Before I sit down I shall give the Committee the testimony of some Englishmen, whose authority I do not think will be disputed by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, as to the result of such examination on their minds. The hon. Member for the Holmfirth Division (Mr. H. Wilson) gave us an account of his visit to Ireland. He brought no specific charge against my distinguished predecessor, but made a general accusation against him of what is called jury packing. When he descended to particulars, he commented on what he described as the then Attorney General's demeanour in Court, and added words which, I presume, he thought would be satisfactory to myself. Allow me to tell the hon. Member that I resent the attack upon my predecessor in the office which I now hold as I would resent an attack upon myself, and that he is mistaken if he supposes any expressions of the kind he used towards myself are received by me with satisfaction. If the hon. Gentleman has any definite accusation to make let him make it openly, and then we shall know how to meet it. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) spoke more definitely as to what is known as jury packing.

MR. DILLON: And also as to the suppression of evidence in murder trials.

*MR. MADDEN: I am now dealing with the Maryborough trials, and not with accusations which, have been often made and refuted, and which I absolutely deny. I am dealing with the accusations made as to the conduct of the police at Maryborough. As I have reminded the Committee, the hon. Gentleman expressed a wish that Englishmen should visit Ireland and judge for themselves. I will give the hon. Gentleman the testimony of an Englishman who went to Ireland, who took the best possible means of informing himself on the subject, and who had the best possible means of knowing what was going on. I have no doubt hon. Gentlemen opposite will accept Lord Spencer,—I mean the Lord Spencer, of 1889—as a witness deserving of credit. What did Lord Spencer, say so recently as the 8th of March, 1889? Speaking at the Eighty Club on that day, he said:—

"We thought we had done away with the cry in Ireland, this painful cry of packing juries; but I was quite mistaken. I found in my experience later in Ireland that when there were cases of agrarian or political moment which created much excitement among people, the cry was again raised, and I will just explain how it came about. Some of you may not agree with me. You may think that I am not giving a proper version of affairs, but what happened was this—I speak of Dublin,—"

[Ironical cheers.] Well, it was in Dublin that my predecessor held the office of Chief Crown Prosecutor, at Green Street.

"I speak of Dublin, and I do not know so much about the rest of the country. In Dublin, the Law Officers of the Crown, when the panel of jurors was called over, considered whether there were any publicans on the panel, or farmers who lived in isolated districts. I do not think I shall be contradicted when I say it is the duty of the Law Officers to see that no absolutely partial person is on the jury. The Crown had a right to set aside peremptorily or for cause, and the prisoners to challenge a certain number of jurors. I believe the Law Officer would not be doing his duty if he knowingly left on the jury a man whom he knew would give a verdict independent of the facts. It was the habit to challenge these two classes, and the reason was that the publicans were put in such an invidious position with their customers, if they went against the feeling of their customers, and did their duty. The same thing occurred with regard to the farmers in any district. What was the result? I know, because I have cross-examined the officers on the subject, and I know these men did not challenge because a man was a Roman Catholic. I am satisfied that the Law Officers did not challenge and set men aside because they were Roman Catholics; but the result was that, as these two classes were invariably Roman Catholics, we constantly had juries in Roman Catholic districts almost wholly made up of Protestants."

Now, I have given to the Committee the testimony of an Englishman who examined and cross-examined the Law Officers on the subject. [HON. MEMBERS: The Law Officers!] I do not suppose hon. Gentlemen suggest—I certainly do not suggest—that my predecessors, who served under Lord Spencer, were less intelligent or trustworthy than those who preceded or who followed them.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co. Mid.): I wish to correct the right hon. Gent—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: But the right hon. Gentleman—

*MR. MADDEN: The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of replying to me. But I have also the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). He went over to Ireland and examined for himself, and his experience, both as a lawyer and as a Member of this House, entitles his opinion to respect. In the course of a Debate, which took place in this House, in February, 1883, on the old story of jury packing, the right hon. Gentleman gave his experience of what he saw in Ireland. He spoke against an Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), stating that he happened to be in Dublin during one of the trials for murder. He said—

“He went into Court as an entirely unprejudiced spectator. He did not know what proportion of the jury was Protestant and what was Catholic; but he desired to say, having had some experience, both favourable and unfavourable, of juries in this country, that never in the whole course of his life had he beheld a more intelligent, a more patient, or a more impartial jury, and, he thought he might add, a jury more indulgent to the prisoner. Every single question they put was directly to the point, and, as he could judge, most of their questions were directed to elicit some point in favour of the prisoner. He could say emphatically that no man could have had fairer trial, and at the conclusion of it he could not help saying that if that was the way they packed juries in Ireland, he only wished they would pack English juries in the same way.”—(Hansard, vol. 276, p. 892.)

MR. DILLON: What was the date?

*MR. MADDEN: The date of the discussion was—

MR. DILLON: No; the date of the trial.

*MR. MADDEN: It was the trial of Michael Walsh before Mr. Justice Lawson. The point of my observations is, that that opinion was given in a Debate in which it was alleged that confidence in the administration of the law was destroyed in Ireland in consequence of jury packing. Among the number of Englishmen who have gone over to Ireland was a distinguished lawyer, who, I regret to say, has since died—Mr. Crompton. He was present at the trial of Father M’Fadden at Maryborough, and he bore testimony, in remarkable language, to the manner in which the Judge conducted the trial, and as to the conduct of the jury who were empanelled on the occasion.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): He said the jury was packed.

*MR. MADDEN: Not in his original speech. He afterwards wrote a letter to the Press, and no doubt, as hon. Members opposite say, he did say that he thought the jury were packed. But he had no means whatever of knowing whether this was so or not. Mr. Crompton was, however, a competent witness as to the conduct of the trial, and the behaviour of the jury, and it was on this point I used his testimony. Now, with reference to the specific charges made by hon. Gentlemen opposite. In respect to the cases of Mr. John Kelly and Mr. O’Dwyer three charges were formulated against us by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon); first, that Mr. Kelly was prosecuted though he had committed no offence in word or deed; secondly, that the law of conspiracy was extended in the case, as it has never been extended before; and thirdly, that the Crown assumed, without proving it, that the combination on the Smith-Barry estate was illegal. I think it is a little infelicitous, to say the least, to have selected as an indictment against the conduct of prosecutions in Ireland a case in which not only was the prosecution proved to be well founded by the Court of First Instance, but in which Mr. Kelly, who had the power to appeal on the question of fact, deliberately refrained from doing so. As to the question of law, however, he did appeal to the Exchequer Division, and the Court upheld the decision of the Magistrates, and held that the prosecution was fully justified by the evidence. On both these points, then—that there was sufficient evidence to warrant putting the prisoner on trial, and that an offence was committed—the prosecution was sustained. The sentence of four months’ imprisonment enabled the prisoner to appeal as to the facts if he thought he had been unjustly convicted. He did not avail himself of the right, and we are justified, therefore, in concluding that he had no confidence in his own case on the facts. The hon. Member has said that Mr. Kelly was guilty of no offence, but he was proved to be guilty of criminal conspiracy, conspiracy which is as criminal and indictable in England as in Ireland. [Ironical laughter.] I challenge any English lawyer to get up in this House and deny that conspiracy to compel or induce tenants not to pay their rents is illegal in England. Will any ex-Law Officer opposite say that if such an offence had been committed in this country in his period of office, it would not have been his bounden duty to order his prosecution? With reference to the trials at Maryborough, I think it is unnecessary to go into detail, or to trouble the Committee at any length, for the action of the Government and the Crown Prosecutor in regard to them is amply justified by the facts. In one case in which the prisoner was indicted for murder, the Judge remarked on the lenient view which the jury took of the case, and in another the jury, who, it was alleged, were packed, disagreed, so that this instance again failed to bear out the suggestion that the jury, because they were packed, were panting for the blood of the prisoners.

Mr. Madden

*MR. H. J. WILSON: I complained of the Attorney General, but I made no such suggestion in regard to the jury. I did not say one word against the jury.

*MR. MADDEN: The jury did their duty honestly between the prosecution and the prisoners. Moreover, the rest of the prisoners after the result of the trial of their fellow prisoners thought their best chance was to plead guilty, and throw themselves on the mercy of the Court. That fact of itself shows that the prosecution was amply justified, and I repeat that weaker and more infelicitous cases on which to found an attack on the administration of justice in Ireland could not have been brought forward than those which have been adduced to-night—cases in which either the prisoners pleaded guilty, or the prosecution was held justified by the decision of the High Court.

(7.0.) MR. J. MORLEY: A noble Marquess in another place, in a very intemperate and wild oration, spoke of the "consummate audacity" of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bridgeton Division. I do not wish to apply such a phrase to the line taken by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, but it is almost audacity to pretend that the testimony of Mr. Crompton was not a definite denunciation of the system of jury packing.

MR. MADDEN: I said it was. I said Mr. Crompton had nothing to urge against the conduct of the Judge and jury at the trial, but that his testimony was in favour of the right hon. Gentleman on the question of jury packing, though I questioned his means of knowledge.

MR. J. MORLEY: But nobody said anything about the conduct of the Judge. We are not impugning the conduct of the Judge, so far as I know; we are impugning the conduct of the late Attorney General, the chief officer of the Crown, who, I must say, in my judgment, to the disgrace of the Administration, at this moment occupies the chief seat of justice in Ireland. We have nothing to say against the conduct of Mr. Justice Gibson; it is the conduct of Mr. O'Brien we challenge. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says now he admitted that Mr. Crompton's testimony was to the effect that there was jury-packing, but did he admit it? Did he not, on the contrary, do the best he could to mislead the Committee?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir, I did nothing of the kind. I was reading a portion of Mr. Crompton's speech relating to the conduct of the jury. Then there was some interruption from right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I stated at once—I am in the recollection of the Committee—I admitted that on the question of jury packing his testimony was on the other side.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is always so courteous, and generally so fair, that I should be sorry to say a word that might seem to impugn his veracity and sense of honour, but I do maintain that the effect of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks as to Mr. Crompton's testimony was misleading. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would not have cheered those remarks if they had not recognised the attempt to put the Jury on its legs again. Now, there must be no mistake upon this matter, because even the Chief Secretary, in a speech made in Edinburgh in November last, did distinctly vouch Mr. C. Crompton as to the non-existence of Jury packing. I well remember it because the next day I called attention to the subject—the effect of Mr. Crompton's remarks on Jury packing. It is not worth while to argue the point. Here is Mr. Crompton's own letter. What does he say? It had been said by some one—I know not by whom—and the Chief Secretary afterwards said, that Mr. Crompton expressed no opinion on Jury packing. After remarking that something he had previously said—

"Might lead to the inference that he approved of everything that took place in relation to the trial at Maryborough."

Mr. Crompton proceeded—

"I wish to separate the consideration of the way the trial was conducted under the presidency of Mr. Justice Gibson from that of the way the Jury was packed, and from the way the jury packing is systematically carried out, which was the principal subject of my speech."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Not as reported.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not know as to that, but at all events, the letter came long before the Chief Secretary made his speech, and it was in the possession of the public—

"I said nothing in favour of the way the prosecution was conducted on the part of the Crown, and, on the contrary, I denounced and explained the way the Jury was packed and selected by those representing the Crown."

But that is not all. He said, further—

"The way the Jury was selected at Maryborough was done in the most open way. Man after man was ordered to stand aside, against whom there was nothing to be said, except, perhaps, that they were Catholics. This elicited the most indignant protests from many of the Jurymen, who were men of position in the county, and obliged to attend at the county town whenever a new Jury was called, with the full knowledge that they would be objected to by the Crown directly their names were called. The result of what I saw is that trial by a Jury so selected cannot be called trial by Jury at all: it is rather trial by 12 men selected by the Crown, and presided over by a Judge of the Superior Courts."

Now, I submit to any gentleman who was in the House when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was making his speech whether he gave the impression that that was Mr. Crompton's evidence.

MR. MADDEN: Yes.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman might have intended it, but he did not do it. And then the right hon. and learned Gentleman used a curious argument. He said, How could Mr. Crompton have known the Jury was packed?

MR. MADDEN: Yes.

MR. J. MORLEY: Could he not judge of the enormous probabilities? Could he not judge by what happened? Mr. Crompton was accustomed to the procedure in English Criminal Courts. What explanation, what knowledge was required? Could he not see that 216 Jurors were summoned and that 42 men were ordered to stand by until 12 Protestants were selected? It requires no special knowledge, it requires no more than to judge of ordinary probabilities. The Chief Secretary is an admirable judge of probabilities, and he will not get up at the Table, I am sure, and say that the fact that 12 Jurors, all Protestants, were so selected, could have been an accident. All the laws of probability are against it. Mr. Crompton saw this, and he delivered his emphatic condemnation of what he saw done. Then the Attorney General for Ireland went on to give us a quotation from a statement of Lord Spencer's. This is one of those eternal tu quoques of which I should think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is by this time ashamed. They have long ago lost their point. I must confess I did not follow the precise appropriateness of the quotation from Lord Spencer, and I do not see how what Lord Spencer said affects by one jot or tittle what happened in the case at Maryborough. Law Officers of the Crown may have abused their position. I will admit that hundreds of Attorneys General have done the same thing under all Governments and under both Parties, but do not let us at this time of day have a denial from Law Officers of the Crown that it has been the tradition and practice in Ireland to pack Juries. Such an evil practice must end some time, and we insist that the end should be now; and it is because we are convinced that this Jury packing is one of the things that is most to blame for the distrust with which the Irish people regard the administration of the law, and for the discredit into which the administration of it has fallen—it is for that reason we make the present protest, and we shall at a later stage protest, if a chance offers, against the elevation to the Bench of a gentleman who has shown so little an appreciation of what the administration of justice demands.

Mr. J. Morley

(7.12.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has parenthetically made an attack upon me for something I said in public in Edinburgh last November or December. If it were worth while I could quote my speech and show that I did not misrepresent the late Mr. Crompton, and that everything I said was justified by public statements made by Mr. Crompton, either in speech or in letters to the Press. It is a small matter, however, and I will go at once to the substantial issue raised by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman accused me and my right hon. and learned Friend near me, the Attorney General for Ireland, of having quoted Mr. Crompton's evidence as to the efficiency and proper conduct of the Jury, and of having concealed the undoubted fact that Mr. Crompton, in one of his communications, though not the first, did state that, in his opinion, the Jury was a packed Jury. My right hon. and learned Friend was, however, quite justified in calling the attention of the Committee to a point on which Mr. Crompton was an expert, on which he had the evidence before him, and on which, therefore, he could pronounce with some degree of authority; and he was perfectly justified also in stating, as he did state, that Mr. Crompton could not infer with certainty, or even probability, from the mere facts which took place in Court, whether what occurred was or was not Jury packing. The right hon. Gentleman met that by asking whether it could be put down as a mere coincidence that the persons excluded from the Jury were Catholics and the persons included were Protestants, and he went on to say that by the application of known laws of probability the fact was deduced that there was a packed Jury. Now, it was precisely in reply to that argument that my right hon. and learned Friend called in the testimony of Lord Spencer. The right hon. Gentleman says that is one of those eternal tu quoques of which we ought to be ashamed. It is not a tu quoque at all. It is not a statement made by the Government that right hon. Gentlemen opposite did precisely that of which the Government are now accused, five years ago. That is a perfectly legitimate argument—that an argument I am not going to deprive myself the use of, because of the obvious irritation it provokes in right hon. Gentlemen opposite. But this is not a case of tu quoque at all. It is a quotation from a statement deliberately made by Lord Spencer in 1889, looking back upon his own Government, and giving to the public with all deliberation, and with all the additional weight which, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, resulted from his change of convictions, the conclusions he had arrived at, not like Mr. Crompton, by a mere survey made at one trial, but after a careful and critical examination of the action of the Law Officers of the Crown—in other words, of the action of the only people who are competent to give a complete and full account of what occurred at the trial. I gather from the ironical cheers of hon. Gentlemen that Lord Spencer was a great fool to take the advice of the Law Officers. ["Hear, hear," from Mr. MAC NEILL.] I am unwilling to subscribe to so unfavourable an opinion as that entertained by the hon. Gentleman. I believe that Lord Spencer is not only a very honourable man, but is very competent to give an opinion on this point after personal examination, and it is worthy of consideration by hon. Gentlemen opposite. My right hon. and learned Friend could not by any possibility have chosen in this country a man either of larger experience on this point or one whose judgment on this subject should carry more weight with every section of the community. Observe how Lord Spencer deals with this argument of probability. I will read to the Committee the extract which has already been quoted:—

"Some of you may not agree with me; you may think that I am not giving a proper version of affairs, but what happened was this. I speak of Dublin, and I do not know so much about the rest of the country. In Dublin the Law Officers of the Crown, when the panel of jurors was called over, considered whether there were any publicans on the panel, or farmers who lived in isolated districts. I do not think I shall be contradicted when I say it is the duty of the Law Officers to see that no absolutely partial person is on the jury. The Crown had a right to set aside peremptorily or for cause and the prisoners to challenge a certain number of jurors. I believe the Law Officer would not be doing his duty if he knowingly left on the jury a man who he knew would give a verdict independent of the facts. It was the habit to challenge these two classes, and the reason was that the publicans were put in such an invidious position with their customers if they went against the feeling of their customers and did their duty. The same thing occurred with regard to the farmers in any district. What was the result? I know, because I have cross-examined the Law Officers on the subject, and I know these men did not challenge because a man was a Roman Catholic; but the result was that as these two classes were invariably Roman Catholics, we constantly had juries in Roman Catholic districts almost wholly made up of Protestants."

That is Lord Spencer's view of the operation of the law of probability on the question of the selection of juries, and it is a view recently expressed which ought to carry weight with the Front Opposition Bench, because it gives clearly, in my opinion, an accurate account of what the Law Officers of successive Governments have found it necessary to do in the interests of justice. It is a commonplace, unfortunately, the truth of which cannot be denied, that a large class of the population of Ireland cannot be trusted to give a verdict according to their oath in certain classes of cases. It is a lamentable and deplorable fact that this should be so. It may be, if hon. Members choose to say it is, a shameful commentary upon the last three centuries of English Government in Ireland. We may make our own deductions from the fact; but, if it is a fact, and if it is the duty of those who have the conduct of a trial to see that the jury should be selected so that it should be its duty to give a verdict without fear and favour according to the evidence, then the practice which has been found necessary by successive Governments in Ireland, and is still found necessary, is a practice which the House of Commons ought to support. But that is not the practice of jury-packing. Jury-packing is a gross, calumnious, and misleading description of the practice. It is a process of using the power of challenge, the order to stand aside given in England and Scotland ["But never used"] and Ireland for the purpose for which it is given—namely, that of excluding from the juries those who cannot be trusted to do their duty according to their oath. That the right is more largely used by the Crown in Ireland is true. It is the necessary consequence of that deplorable fact I have referred to, and it is a consequence against which we cannot shut our eyes; but we shall not make trial by jury in Ireland a better form of the administration of justice if we restrict the powers which are necessary and given in the three countries, and which are so often exercised over a large portion of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman before sitting down stated that at a later stage of the Debate he proposes to make an attack upon a distinguished Judge.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the right hon. Gentleman said that he said it hypothetically, but it was not the purport of his speech, and it has no relation to the Vote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then I may say, hypothetically, that there are very good reasons to show to the Committee why they should not agree with the criticisms which, not hypothetically, the right hon. Gentleman found time to insert in one or two interstices of his speech. I understand that while you rule that those attacks may be suggested or insinuated on the distinguished Judge who presides over the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, I am not now in order in answering them.

THE CHAIRMAN: I did say that criticisms of the conduct of the late Attorney General were perfectly permissible, and that defence and rebuttal of that criticism was also permissible, but the question as to the action of the Crown in promoting that Law Officer to a seat on the Bench was not permissible.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was permissible, however, to describe it as disgraceful. I will not traverse the ruling of the Chair by adding a single word except this—that I absolutely concur with the opinion expressed by Lord Spencer of Mr. O'Brien when Crown Prosecutor in Dublin, that his Government as well as the present Government owe a deep debt of gratitude to that distinguished lawyer for his services in the cause of justice.

(7.28.) MR. J. MORLEY: I have listened as carefully as I could a second time to the quotation from Lord Spencer, and I must say that it has not the least bearing on the present argument. What does Lord Spencer say? That it is true that his Government did for good reason order or direct publicans to stand aside, and it happened incidentally that most of those publicans were Catholics and farmers. But Lord Spencer's contention is that they did not direct them to stand aside because they were Catholics, but because they were publicans or farmers. But the present charge is that those 42 men at Maryborough were ordered to stand aside because they were Catholics, and for no other reason. They were special jurors, men of substance, and they complain bitterly of being called away from their vocations in order to have this stigma fixed upon them. That is a point upon which the quotation from Lord Spencer has no bearing whatever.

(7.30.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I was present at these trials with Mr. Crompton and I heard Mr. Crompton's opinion expressed on many occasions. I heard him deliver the speech in Dublin in which he described his impression of the trials. While it is quite true that Mr. Crompton approved of the conduct of the trial by the Judge, he did strongly condemn the conduct of the case by the prosecution. I, myself, saw the empanelling of the Jury, and certainly I cannot describe it as other than jury-packing. Out of a very large number of jurymen summoned to attend there were 11 Protestants selected and one Catholic, and the last, I was given to understand, was a strong anti-Nationalist. I cannot imagine any proceeding that can be better described as jury-packing. Prior to this, another Jury was empannelled consisting entirely of Protestants. Many of the Jurymen summoned were Catholics, and most of them were men of substance, holding positions that would not subject them to coercion or undue influence, they were mostly men of property, possessing the Special Jury qualification, and so they did not belong to the class specially liable to be coerced. I had repeated opportunities of discussing the entire proceedings with Mr. Crompton; and I heard him express the opinion exactly as it has been described in the House to-day by the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), that the whole thing could only be regarded as a gross perversion of the forms of justice. Again and again Mr. Crompton said this in my hearing, but, being a fair-minded man, he always commended the action of the Judge, and I agreed with the opinion expressed by my friend that the Judge conducted the trial fairly and impartially. But the whole system was a burlesque of trial by jury, and I came away with a feeling of deep disgust and indignation at the travesty of justice going on in Ireland, and with the conviction that there never can be peace or satisfaction in Ireland until this system is put an end to.

*(7.35.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I am content to leave this question of jury packing where it is left by the controversy to which the Committee has listened, and I desire to recall the attention of Members to another matter, which has been referred to by the hon. Member for North Dublin and by the hon. Member for East Mayo. The Attorney General for Ireland has not attempted a defence, nor, indeed, do I think he succeeded in a palliation of the failure of justice in the case of Mr. John Kelly. The case was submitted by the hon.

Member for North Dublin with considerable fulness and carefulness of statement of fact, but there were not many Members in the House at the time, and, from the language used by the Attorney General for Ireland, the facts cannot be gathered. All he said was that the case had gone to the Exchequer Division of the High Court, which Court had supported the Resident Magistrates on a point of law, and upon that I will say a word or two presently. The Attorney General for Ireland seemed to taunt the defendant with not having appealed to the County Court Judge on the questions of fact, but the right hon. Gentleman omitted to state that the defendant could not appeal both on matter of law and matter of fact, and nothing is more natural that when a person thinks his case on a point of law is very strong that he should appeal on that point of law instead of going to a County Court on a matter of fact. The facts of the case which the right hon. and learned Gentleman tried to dispose of in an easy off-hand way have been fully stated to the Committee, so that I will advert only very briefly to them. Mr. Kelly was seen driving round on a car to a number of houses on the Smith-Barry estate, and, in conversation with Mr. O'Dwyer, who was afterwards tried along with him, was heard, by a policeman concealed in a hedge, to remark, in reference to a conversation with a woman in one of the houses, "The women are more in earnest with us than the men." On this slender evidence, and on nothing more than this, John Kelly was convicted of conspiracy. Now, I ask hon. Members to imagine a strike in England before the Act of 1875, and a man driving around the district in which the strike prevailed being heard to make use of such an expression as I have mentioned. Imagine such a prosecution in England, and the indignation it would have excited. The Attorney General has thrown down a bold challenge to English lawyers; he says a man could be convicted in England on the same evidence. But I ask any hon. Member who will bring a fair mind to bear upon his knowledge of what takes place in English Courts, can he imagine an English jury convicting a man upon such evidence as that? Can any similar conviction in England be pointed to? Can we imagine a man being sentenced in England, not to four months' hard labour, but even to a week's imprisonment, on evidence such as I have stated? The Attorney General for Ireland did not venture to deal with the facts at all, whether because he felt the scandal, or because he is so accustomed to indefensible convictions that they cease to shock him. He merely pointed to the fact that the Exchequer Division did not upset the conviction. The Exchequer Division could not go into the facts; they seem to have thought, as there was some tittle of evidence, they must not reverse the action of the Magistrates. I will, however, tell the Attorney General why no similar conviction could have taken place in England. There are three points in which the law of conspiracy in England differs widely from the law of conspiracy in Ireland. In the law of Ireland there is no statute similar to the Trade Unions Act of 1875 protecting acts done in trade disputes. The Attorney General says that that Act reserves the power to punish intimidation. Perfectly true. But the Attorney General cannot say that we have to deal with intimidation in the present instance, because on the charge of intimidation Mr. John Kelly was indicted and acquitted. Secondly, under the law of England it is not an indictable offence to induce, or to combine in order to induce, persons to break contracts. I know it has been held otherwise in Ireland by Judge Fitzgerald, and by others following him, but the authorities in England have been subjected to careful examination, and (although there has been some doubt on the point) the opinion of Mr. Justice Stephen, not usually supposed to take a lenient view in such matters, is in consonance with that expressed by Mr. R. S. Wright in his Law of Criminal Conspiracy, and by Mr. K. E. Digby, in his recent very able treatment of the subject, that it is not an indictable offence in England to induce persons to break contracts. Thirdly, it is a most material difference, that in England this class of cases, which are of the utmost difficulty, go before a jury. In Ireland the decision is thrown into the hands of the Magistrates. The distinction between questions of law and questions of fact is lost sight of, and the influence of public opinion, with which the law ought, if possible, to be in harmony, is wholly ignored. It is a very grave and serious misfortune that persons should be convicted on what everyone must admit to be extremely weak and scanty evidence. Mr. Kelly may, or may not, have been concerned in the tenants' agitation on the Smith-Barry estate. I do not enter into that, for I have no knowledge beyond what the depositions, which I have read, supply, but I point out to the Committee that whatever knowledge derived from other sources may have been present to the minds of the Resident Magistrates, there is not in the depositions sufficient evidence upon which to found a conviction. The Magistrates may have had various statements, made to them by private informants, in their minds, and knowing this, the Crown Prosecutor, I assume, did not think it necessary to go through the usual form of proof. He seems to have presumed on his knowledge of facts in the minds of the Magistrates, and, as the result shows, presumed rightly. But I put it to the Committee, is it not a matter of the gravest concern that the administration of the law should be so conducted as to inspire no confidence in the people? How can the people of Ireland have any confidence when they see a case, which in England would have to be supported by a long array of evidence to satisfy a jury, decided by Resident Magistrates in Ireland upon practically no evidence at all but upon private impressions or untested belief? I think we are under obligation to Irish Members for bringing before the House a case which, it is to be feared, is only too typical of the maladministration of justice in their country.

(7.50.) Mr. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): The course of the Debate has clearly shown how the Chief Secretary is led into error by reliance on garbled versions of facts put before him by Irish officials. To this is due the fact that in previous allusions to Mr. Crompton's evidence the right hon. Gentleman omitted to say that that gentleman made a fierce attack upon the system of jury packing pursued at Maryborough. In this full Report of Mr. Crompton's speech in Dublin, on October 22, there is a thorough and complete condemnation of jury packing. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite have pressed Lord Spencer's name into their service. I wish from my heart that the Chief Secretary in the few months left him to exercise for good or evil his influence in Ireland would imitate Lord Spencer in those investigations which have led the noble Lord to his present opinion on the Irish question. Criminal prosecutions in England are conducted with fairness and an honourable intention to arrive at the truth, and the Crown Prosecutor on occasion makes himself the prisoner's counsel. I was very much struck with that in witnessing a case in which the hon. and learned Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison) was prosecuting. He is a political opponent of mine, but I could not help congratulating him, and these congratulations he appeared surprised to receive. The Judge was pressing a point somewhat hardly against the prisoner, and the hon. Member, as prosecuting counsel, intervened, and said as much in the interest of the accused. When I spoke to the hon. and learned Member afterwards on this, he expressed his surprise that several Irish Members had congratulated him upon what seemed to him the most natural thing to do. But as I told him, he does not see the law administered as we see it in Ireland. It is a hunt without the rules of the sport, the victim is the prisoner to be run to death, and success is the measure of promotion for the counsel prosecuting. What Lord Denman said of trial by jury, in reference to the O'Connell trial, is true now, trial by jury in Ireland is a fraud, a delusion, and a snare. Even Unionist newspapers like the Daily Chronicle make this admission. That paper, in a fair and able article in January last, declares it is much to be regretted that trial by jury in Ireland bears only a resemblance in theory to trial by jury in England. In England there are never several hundred jurors summoned, from which to select a jury by unlimited challenge. In the Court of Appeal to which the Gweedore case was carried, and in which Mr. Justice Gibson sat, the verdict was confirmed by a majority of one of the Judges, and I need only refer to the significant observation of one of the Judges, "You have gambled for a verdict." In the cases I propose to give as illustrating administration in Ireland, let me first refer to the case of Frackleson, the emergency man, who, some 12 months ago, committed an unprovoked murder by firing three shots from a revolver; one person was killed on the spot, and two others seriously wounded. Mark the difference, that in this case though the Government were obliged to prosecute, they did not exercise their right of challenge in empannelling the jury. I mentioned some time ago that the Constabulary had, since the right hon. Gentleman has been in office, committed 14 murders, in none of which were prosecutions instituted, except in two, and they were sham prosecutions. The first of the two was a case in which a murder was committed at a place called Timoleague, on the 3rd September, and the other was the case of a murder committed on the 5th September in Tipperary. In each of these cases the Crown Solicitor did his best to defeat the ends of justice. In the first case the person murdered was a poor boy, and a Coroner's Jury was summoned to inquire into the matter. Mr. Blake appeared as Crown Solicitor to conduct the case on behalf of the county, and he so managed it as to ensure a disagreement on the part of the jury, his action being such that he ought not to have been allowed to retain his office. It was so arranged that seven of the jury were Protestants and the other five Catholics, and men had been sent to summon these juries distances of six and seven miles, when there were plenty of respectable individuals living in the neighbourhood whose attendance could have been secured. The police, however, were made to scour the country for miles in order to procure men who would be likely to bring about the desired result. This was a gross scandal and an undoubted attempt to pack the jury. Well, as I have stated, in that case the Government managed to ensure a disagreement. In the other case of murder, which occurred two days after that of Timoleague, the Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against the policemen charged. Those policemen were brought before two Removable Magistrates and the case was conducted, by whom? By Mr. George Bolton. Now, Sir, I will get up and apologise to Mr. George Bolton for what I have to say if the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will get up and contradict me when I state that

Mr. George Bolton, who was employed in this case as the representative of law and order, is simply a sink of iniquity. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman correct me? The Chief Secretary knows nothing at all about it, but the Attorney General does know a good deal. Both he and I know Mr. George Bolton, and I have just said that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman will contradict me in this statement I will at once apologise and express my regret. I say that Mr. George Bolton is a mass of immorality and a sink of iniquity. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman get up? No, he dare not. He knows that if he did I should state to the House the reasons on which I found this statement. Well, these are the sort of persons by whose means law and order is supported by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary never makes a speech in Ireland in which he does not talk of his morality, but does he ever talk of the morality of some of his subordinates and agents? The two policemen accused in this case—a sub-Inspector and a constable—having been brought before the two Removable Magistrates on a sham prosecution in which the Magistrates refused to direct any further action, the result is that the Sub-Inspector and the constable who shot the man are now at large. This is the way in which justice is done in Ireland. In one of the numerous collisions which have occurred between the police and the tenantry at Falcarragh in Donegal, a policeman was charged with brutally assaulting a tenant, and the tenant also was charged with brutally assaulting the policeman with a crowbar. Both these proceedings arose out of what was done at the same time and in the same cottage. But the policeman was a Protestant and the tenant was a Catholic, and the tenant was taken for trial not to Donegal but to Tyrone where he was brought before an Orange Jury, and was, as a matter of course, convicted. The policeman, however, who was alleged to have struck the tenant and fired shots at him was not taken to Tyrone to be tried by an Orange Jury, but had the advantage of counsel for the Crown, who did all that was requisite in challenging the Catholic Jurors, and he got off. Who was it that tried the two persons—the tenant at Tyrone for assaulting the policeman and the policeman at Donegal? Why, Mr. William M'Loughlan, Queen's Counsel. Surely this case shows the shameless frauds that are perpetrated in Ireland in the name of justice. I find also, that at the last Spring Assizes at Derry, in which three men who were Catholic, and had been arrested in Monaghan, were sent for trial by a Derry Jury. How was that Jury composed? Why, one of the Jurors was a contractor in the town, and supplied horses and vehicles for taking the prisoners from the railway to the gaol and from the gaol to the Court House. The result was, of course, that those men were convicted, one of them getting only three months imprisonment, while the others, who were connected with the National League, were sentenced to imprisonment for six months. Then I would put it to the House, how are prosecutions conducted for political purposes? The Government avowed that they regarded with apprehension the 'Tenants' Association, which was meant to slash, and undoubtedly did slash, at the Smith-Barry syndicate. Well, the Government set itself to destroy the Tenants' Defence Association, and the Crown Solicitor of Roscommon was very active in this work. I have here, as the result of this activity, an indictment framed by the Crown Solicitor of Roscommon on the 15th September, alleging that certain defendants being in a proclaimed district had incited others not to do that which they had a legal right to do, and that, without legal authority, had unlawfully used intimidation towards persons whose names were unknown, with a view to force such persons into doing acts which they had a legal right to abstain from doing. I assert that the Crown Solicitors have collusively abused the Coercion Act, and I will call attention to a remarkable case in which a man received three months' imprisonment for winking at a pig. The Magistrate said that winking at a pig was in itself no crime, but the winking had been done to induce persons to refrain from buying a pig which the owner, who was a boycotted person, had taken to market for sale. This occurred at Falcarragh, and the result was that a summons was issued and the case taken into Court. They bound the defendant in two sureties of £25 each to keep the peace for 12 months, or, in default, to be imprisoned. Of course, the man was marched off to gaol. My hon. Friend behind me has immortalised in verse the pig-winking case, about which right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench know nothing. It is too parochial for them. I now wish to state how the Crown Solicitors pursue their duty. I will take one case of a gentleman who adorns the administration of justice. A few weeks ago Dennis O'Brien, of Loughrea, commonly known as a land-grabber, was found guilty of dangerously stabbing another man. The Crown Solicitor got the Judge to let the fellow out on his own recognisances. He was not an hour in prison, although he had stabbed the man dangerously. At the same Sessions a Town Councillor, named Sullivan, was sentenced to six months' hard labour for having cheered the Woodford prisoners, who had frequently been remanded for refusing to give evidence. So that you have in the same Court a land-grabber guilty of stabbing let out on his own recognisances, though he had stabbed a man, and a Town Councillor sentenced to six months' imprisonment merely for cheering some prisoners. I can prove to the House cases in which men have been caught red-handed in wilful murder, and let off by these very Crown Solicitors. Here, again, I press into service my friend Mr. Wybrants Olphert. I asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether a man named Beattie had been returned for trial in the County Donegal, at the Summer Assizes, for having murdered a man; whether the prisoner had been caught with his smoking revolver in his hand; whether Wybrants Olphert sat on the Bench; and whether, after he had dismissed the charge, he was over-ruled by the other Magistrates; whether, at the Summer Assizes, the Grand Jury threw out the Bill. The fact was that this man was an agent of Olphert, in respect of a commercial company, and Olphert sat on the Grand Jury which threw out the Bill. No proceedings were taken against him because he was the landlords' friend. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to the questions, said the Bill was thrown out at the last Summer

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Assizes; and the Attorney General called for a special Report from the Crown Solicitor—the Crown Solicitor himself being at the present moment under the charge of firing a revolver and drawing a sword upon a poor man. Without going into that matter, it was decided that there was not sufficient evidence against the man, although he was caught red-handed, to justify the Crown in taking any further proceedings. Is that not an atrocious parody of all justice, and are we not guilty of political and social immorality in voting money to these fellows to be used in this way? I find the Crown Solicitors are very, very careful about the character of the Times witnesses. It is a well known rule in Ireland and England that the Judge is furnished with the antecedents of the man on his trial. A man of the name of Mitchell was charged at the last Carlow Assizes with knocking down a man named Bolam for having reaped a crop on a farm from which Mitchell had been evicted. He was only ordered to enter into his recognisances. It was perfectly well known that he was a Times witness, and that he had presented a revolver to his landlord's steward and threatened to shoot him. That fact was not laid before the Judge, the desire being to hush up anything in which a Times witness appeared. I do not wish to say anything about the Government notetakers, except that the Crown Solicitors are as guilty as these fellows, who commit deliberate perjury as to their competency to take notes. It is the duty of the Crown Solicitors to sift the evidence, and only send before the Court that which is trustworthy. I can only say that these Crown Solicitors have been engaged from first to last in all the infamies which have disgraced the present Irish Administration. They have been engaged in suggesting to the County Court Judges the increase of sentences. They have been engaged in all the atrocities whereby Irish Members and politicians have been sentenced to hard labour. They have been, in fact, the servile sleuthhounds of the Crown. But they show singular omissions. A right hon. Gentleman on this side made before the Government notetakers a speech precisely the same as that made by the hon. Member for North Mayo, but the Crown Solicitors did not dare to prosecute him because he was an ex-Cabinet Minister. But of all these counts the most villainous relates to the costs incurred in trials in which the police are concerned. I ask the Attorney General whether it is not the case that if a policeman breaks open a civilian's head, and the civilian gets damages, the public have to pay those damages, simply because the policeman had exceeded his duty? How will the costs be paid in the action brought by Father Kennedy against Constable Hyde? First of all, this fellow Hyde was defended by four Crown Solicitors. One of them, in his address to the Jury, stated that if there was a verdict against Hyde, it would score a point against the Government. No sooner was the verdict given against Hyde, and the point scored against the Government, than this Crown Solicitor sent a telegram to the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General announcing the untoward event. These fellows, who forced their way into the private room of Father Kennedy, will their defence be paid for by the public? Or again, will the costs, in the case of some gentlemen who were arrested by a policeman who was drunk, be paid by the taxpayer? These gentlemen, after being detained 36 hours, were liberated, there not being the shadow of a charge against them, and they brought an action for damages. The whole system simply reeks with fraud; the Irish Government smell from earth to heaven. I have simply called attention to a few cases, but for every one I have given I could cite 12 or 14 others. I have endeavoured to put the matter temperately, believing the case to be so strong that it requires no enforcement beyond mere statement. (8.30.)

(9.1.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.3.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I do not think any chivalrous championship by the Attorney General for Ireland of his predecessor in office will at all alter our opinion in regard to the administration of the law in Ireland. One of the arguments used by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that Earl Spencer, many years ago, defended, to a certain extent, the present system of jury-packing in Ireland. It was, however, fully admitted by Earl Spencer at the time, and it is admitted by the right hon. Gentleman now, that in defending the system of jury-packing he did so entirely on information obtained from the officials whose management of the law we now impugn. There cannot be a better answer than this, that Lord Spencer himself has altered his opinion, and that, with all the means at his disposal to investigate affairs down to the very bottom, he has come to the conclusion, and has the honesty and manliness to state it openly, that it is quite impossible to maintain the present system. Another argument the Attorney General for Ireland used with reference to the trial of those unfortunate men at Maryborough was that they pleaded guilty. I do not think that is a sufficient argument. The pleading of guilty is not always an acknowledgment of guilt. When these poor men saw the determination of the Government in the matter, when they saw the extent to which the jury-packing had been carried in the previous cases—and we consider in Ireland that the Government will stop at nothing that will enable them to secure a conviction—I do think they were ill advised in pleading guilty. It is a pretty strong proof that the Government themselves had not any firm belief in the guilt of these men that when they pleaded guilty they were let off with light punishment. The Kelly case is, to my mind, one of the worst that ever occurred. There is no evidence whatever that Mr. Kelly committed any crime. That a man should be convicted because he had visited certain farms in certain districts, and because someone else had said something while he was in prison, is I think a perfect travesty of justice. I am quite sure that even those who will vote against us in this matter must in their heart of hearts believe that the conviction of this man was an unjust conviction, and that the punishment of four months' hard labour he received was a monstrous punishment. The question has been asked, Why did he not appeal? Well, if the law in Ireland is in such a condition that a man on such evidence, and with the certainty of such an imprisonment before him did not appeal, so much the worse for the law in Ireland. It shows that not only in the inferior, but in the higher Courts, the law is in an unsatisfactory state, and in a state which would be unheard of in a free country. It is difficult for an Irishman to speak of the infamous system of jury-packing with any degree of patience. Those Englishmen who have seen the system at work in Ireland perceive the infamy of it more clearly than we who have lived under it so long. The system is an insult to Protestants, and it puts us in a position which is hateful in the extreme. But if it is an insult to Protestants, what is it to Catholics? Such a system would not be borne in England for a day. The whole object in Ireland when a man is being prosecuted is to obtain his conviction. The Executive does not stand indifferently between the prisoner and the Crown, as it does here. It is very sad that it should be so. It has been used as an argument that, according to the statements of some English visitors, the juries show great anxiety to do what is right. I do not think it is at all necessary to say that a packed jury in itself is unfair. But we object to men who may be expected to have certain prejudices being selected to try prisoners. It would not be at all fair in this House that Gentlemen on the Conservative side or on this side should be alone chosen to settle any matter, and it would be impossible for them to come to fair conclusions on both sides of the case. It is quite possible that a jury would try to act fairly, and yet it should never have been selected to try the case. I believe that the people of Ireland are as much inclined to be fair as the people of any other country, and in all ordinary cases of crime, unconnected with politics, there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining convictions when the evidence is sufficiently strong. I quite admit that it is easier to get a conviction by packing a Jury than is it without. But I do not think conviction is the end of law, and I regard it as a very short-sighted policy indeed. If a Jury is simply to register the charge of a Judge I think the Jury system might be done away with altogether. I am not a lawyer, but I feel that Juries have and it is meant that they should have a large amount of power, in modifying the law. If Juries in England consistently refused to give verdicts in accordance with what the law is supposed to be the law would be changed at once. The notion that to rule Ireland properly you must force the people to consider certain laws right is most short-sighted. The sense of law and justice must be made to spring from within us, and cannot be forced on us from without. The effort to sustain the present state of things in Ireland, and to maintain laws which are against the sense of right of the people, must lead from bad to worse. If Government were working in Ireland for the best, less and less coercion would be necessary. The contrary is the fact, and the longer affairs go on in Ireland as they are, more and more coercion will be necessary, and more and more Jury-packing will be necessary for securing convictions in a certain class of cases. It is quite possible that some patience with the people will be required when a change is made in the present state of things. For my part, I regard it as a great deal better that a sense of justice should prevail in the country than that convictions should be easily obtained, and that the people should be thrown into prison. It is impossible to maintain the present system. It is only by trusting the people that a solid basis of freedom can be maintained, and in proportion as the Irish people rise in education and in comfort, the more they will rebel against the present intolerable state of things, and the more they will be determined never to submit to it. I believe that when a change has been made, and the people are trusted as they ought to be, there will be no longer any occasion to resort to such unfair and drastic methods of procedure as have been used in the case of Mr. Kelly, and as are constantly employed in the packing of Juries.

* (9.20.) MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green): I trust the Debate of this evening will receive throughout the length and breadth of this Kingdom the attention it deserves. I feel sure that one portion of the Debate will create a sensation in Ireland, and will not readily be forgotten by the people of that country. Only a few moments ago the right hon. Gentleman, who is chiefly responsible for the rule and government of Ireland at the present time, made with energy and emphasis a statement to the effect that the Catholic people of Ireland are unworthy of credence on their oath [Cries of "No, no!"] I am in the memory of the Committee; I cannot be mistaken in the meaning and purport of the words used. I cannot quote the words textually, but I am under no mistake as to their meaning and purport, and as to the meaning with which they will be regarded in Ireland.

*MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member has misunderstood the words of my right hon. Friend, who is not here at present. He said nothing of the kind. What he said was that, unfortunately, there were classes of the people in Ireland who could not at the present day, in the present circumstances, be depended on to give a verdict according to the evidence on oath in certain cases, but he did not in the slightest degree suggest that these classes were Catholics.

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I shall leave it to the Committee and to the Irish people to judge of the value of the explanation and interpretation which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has put upon the words of the Chief Secretary. There is no explaining them away; it is absurd to make the attempt. There can be no doubt in the mind of any man who heard the right hon. Gentleman as to the classes he referred to. The whole speech had reference to the distinction made in the administration of the law in Ireland between Catholics and Protestants, and it was in defence of that distinction, and of the practice of Jury-packing, in defence of the selection of Protestants and of the exclusion of Catholics, that the right hon. Gentleman made the statement we heard, a statement which the right hon. Gentleman and the Government, and the Party to which the right hon. Gentleman belongs, will not be allowed in a hurry to forget. The right hon. Gentleman told us that, for the reason he gave, Jury-packing must be maintained, and must continue in the country. That is a charming message of peace to send to the Irish people. It comes well from the spokesman of the Party who tell us that one of these days we are to get Local Government. Local Government to be given to a nation, the majority of whom are Catholic, the said Catholics being unworthy of credence on their oaths! I shall not take the contradiction of any Gentlemen opposite. I have my own recollection of the words, and so have my Friends around me. We shall look at the Records and Reports to-morrow—I do not suppose they will be cooked in any way—to see whether what I said is not a fair and accurate representation of the words used by the Chief Secretary. Well, Jury-packing is to go on I suppose for the 20 years of firm and resolute Government which the Government and their Party seemed at the time to think they were to enjoy. I doubt very much that they can any longer lay that flattering unction to their souls. But, be their term of office long or short, I take the word of the right hon. Gentleman, that as long as he can help it, the evil and detestable system of Jury-packing shall be maintained. What does the defence of Jury-packing amount to? It amounts to this, that by this process of excluding Irish Catholics from the juries of Ireland, and including Irish Protestants, and Protestants only, fair and impartial verdicts can be obtained. I utterly deny that statement. I deny that the Government seek for an impartial Jury. I maintain that their endeavour is to put men in the box who will find for the Crown in every Government prosecution. If an Irish Protestant were suspected of Nationalist sentiments, he would be excluded from juries. Several Protestants have been excluded. There are Protestants in Ireland who are Irish patriots, just-minded, honest, and liberty-loving men, and I say that that class of men have as little chance of being selected by the Crown Prosecutors in Ireland to try political cases as any Catholic in all the land. I believe that the best men amongst the Protestants will resent, as my honourable Protestant Colleague (Mr. Webb) has to-night resented, this indignity which is being put upon them by the Tory Government, the indignity of selecting them for the purpose of doing what the people of Ireland believe to be an injustice. I trust the feeling that has been expressed by my respected Protestant Colleague, will be shared by thousands of men in Ireland such as he. Speeches have been made from this side of the House which throw great light upon the whole system of Government in Ireland. I trust those speeches will be fully reported and widely read. I feel convinced and I have reason for my belief, that among the masses of the English people there is a desire to see right done towards the Irish people. The masses of the English people are, I believe, revolting against this disgraceful, iniquitous system by which it is sought to keep for a long period the Irish nation in subjugation, in discontent, and dissatisfaction. We can easily understand, after what we have heard this evening, why it is the name of law and the administration of the law are not so much regarded in Ireland as they are here. They do not deserve to be. Under the name of law grievous oppression and injustice is carried on in Ireland. The administration of law in Ireland, so far as it relates to matters of any political complexion, or even an agrarian complexion, the administration of the law is unjust, "a mockery, delusion, and a snare." The people have no confidence in it. The people of Ireland have as much respect for law and justice, as much love for peace and good order, as any other people on the face of the earth; but as they see law administered in Ireland, it fills them with distrust and detestation. We have heard a good deal about jury-packing in Ireland, and the Committee can estimate the value of the defence which has been set up for it, but in almost every other Department of the law in Ireland the same taint is to be found. The same evil runs through all. There are cases in Ireland where the people cannot, as in England, have the protection of a jury. How can the Irish people be expected to repose confidence in the Removable Magistrates? in men like Mr. Cecil Roche—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is travelling beyond the Vote.

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I understand this is the Vote for law charges.

THE CHAIRMAN: County Court Officers and Magistrates come under another Vote.

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: When the proper time arrives I shall have something to say in reference to those gentlemen. The laws in Ireland, under cover of which so much persecution has been inflicted on the Irish people, are mainly three. This Government instrument of torture for the Irish people has three prongs, and on one or other of these every Irishman who takes part in National movements is sure to find himself impaled. It is impossible for any Irishman to take part in any Constitutional agitation without being charged with being concerned in or connected with either conspiracy, intimidation, or illegal assembly. We have, however, one consolation in all this trial and trouble of ours. The Chief Secretary may be truthfully said to be one of the best friends and most able helpers of our National movement. If it were not un-Parliamentary I would say that the right hon. Gentleman by his infamies and atrocities, by his work and his actions in Ireland, is winning our cause for us. The right hon. Gentleman is winning the next General Election for us. For the Tory Party the right hon. Gentleman is a very costly luxury, and in sustaining him in his system of rule in Ireland that Party and their Government are paying very dear for their whistle.

*(9.40.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I am reluctant to intervene, and if I should repeat something that has already been said, owing to my absence during part of the discussion, I hope I shall be excused. I was one of those English Members who thought it was their duty to be present at the trial at Maryborough. Without going unduly into the circumstances which came under my observation, I beg most emphatically to endorse what has been said by several hon. Members on this side of the House in regard to the prosecution of the unfortunate prisoners from Donegal. Much has been said to-night about jury-packing. It is the duty of the Crown in the conduct of prosecutions to endeavour to secure an independent Jury, from which shall be eliminated all those who are likely to be prejudiced against the finding of a perfectly honest and fair verdict. Englishmen attach much importance to the great privilege which we all possess of being tried by a Jury of our Peers, chosen impartially from our immediate neighbours, and of being brought to trial in the locality where the offence is said to have been committed. We were, therefore, indeed shocked to see how all these privileges were distorted under the rule which prevails in Ireland, and I am satisfied that if any hon. Gentlemen opposite who desire, as we all do, to see the laws revered and obeyed, had been present in the Court at Maryborough, they would have been painfully shocked by the manner in which the laws were there administered. The accused persons were brought from a remote county 200 miles distant. They were brought to be tried by a Jury of strangers, chosen from a class of a different social position to their own. The Jury panel was a very large one, more than 200 names being included in it, and every Juryman on the panel was rated at more than £100 a year. After witnessing the proceedings in Court I was profoundly impressed with a feeling of shame. Substantial men were summoned to serve on the Jury, and under penalty to appear, and there was reasonable ground for belief on the part of every man that he was acceptable for the discharge of the duty of a citizen, and capable of giving a verdict according to his oath. I say, again, it was impossible to witness the spectacle that followed without being ashamed. Substantial men who had been summoned to attend from long distances, who would have been fined if they had not been present, when they appeared found that they had been called merely to be told to stand aside. When they protested against these repeated insults, which would have made the blood of any Member of this House boil, they were subjected to fine, and in every case to rebuke for resenting the insult. The result of the challenging system was to produce a Jury strongly prejudiced against the men placed upon their trial, and the Committee must remember that these men were removed far away from their own county. I remember how the first prisoner, when called upon to plead, declared in a few simple sentences that he had no confidence in the Jury to whom his life was to be left. With my friend the late lamented Mr. Crompton I noticed many important matters in which the administration of the law differed from the administration in England. My friend Mr. Crompton acknowledged, as I do, the conspicuous fairness of the Judge, but that, of course, we were prepared to find, and though I am prepared to admit that the Jury seemed animated by a desire to do their duty, that concession only leaves us in regard to this charge exactly where we were. The prisoners were removed from their own county, and denied the safeguards we are entitled to look on as the essential conditions of a jury. There were a number of curious incidents we noted, and remarkable differences from English procedure. One thing which caused us, who were visitors, great surprise was that the doors of the Court-house were closed, that admission was only granted as a sort of favour, and it was only after protest from the English Members present that the doors were ordered to be opened, and the general public were admitted as long as there was space to be had. I understand, Sir, that you have ruled, and I do not wish to deviate from your ruling, that it is not competent for us to discuss the Memorial which was signed by myself and by all the English visitors present at the trial, praying for the clemency of the Crown, and consideration of some of the peculiar circumstances which accompanied that trial, but I hope another opportunity will be offered us of raising that question. But there were some circumstances in connection with the trial of so remarkable a character that they tended very seriously to weaken in the minds of the visitors confidence in the soundness and justice of the verdict. Evidence was accepted which afterwards became the subject of inquiry before the Court of Appeal. What is the effect of all this on the minds of the people of Ireland? We all desire to win over the Irish people, as the Scotch and the English people have been won over, to a respect for the administration of the law, but is this the way to win them over? How far do these prosecutions, conducted in the way that has been indicated, tend to bring about the contentment of the Irish people and orderly and peaceable conduct on their part? I know a little about Gweedore and the county from which these prisoners were brought. I remember in 1887 visiting the district in connection then with the promotion of cottage industries, and I remember then I had remarkable testimony to the virtues of the inhabitants. I remember the conversation with a Resident Magistrate; he told me there was no part of Ireland in which the people were more quiet and well conducted than in the Gweedore region. Then my informant went on to tell me how this result was to be attributed to the influence of a remarkable priest who had made nearly all his people teetotalers, Petty Sessions was almost a blank so far as criminal cases are concerned, and the district was practically crimeless. All this happy state of things was attributed to the influence of the Rev. Father M'Fadden. Afterwards I had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of Father M'Fadden, whom I am now proud to call a personal friend, and I found him all he had been described to me, a friend of the people, who found employment for them, protected their rights in the Land Court, and fought their battles for them in various ways, and I should have thought that any Government would have esteemed itself fortunate in being able to have the assistance of such a man exercising such a beneficent influence. But what instead did the Government do? The story is a sad one, and it is well-known. This part of Ireland became the scene of disorder, and, under the administration of the right hon. Gentleman, was treated as a conquered country. Things arrived at such a condition that passports were demanded on the public roads by the police. Not to emunerate the various incidents. Father M'Fadden, under his first sentence, passed a term of imprisonment in Derry Gaol, and as was said by an illustrious Member of this House, in relation to O'Connell, as nearly as I can remember—

"The portal of his gaol became the arch of triumph through which the deliverer of his people was restored."

So Father M'Fadden returned to the people to whom he had rendered so many, and such signal services, and they regarded him as having undergone martyrdom in their cause. The love and reverence for their priest deepened among the people of Gweedore, and it was under these circumstances that the Government made another and still more futile attempt to crush him. It was on a Sunday morning, in the midst of his people, and having just left the altar, that with an insufficient force of police an attempt was made to effect the arrest of Father M'Fadden, and in the tumult that arose the people seeing a sword flourished over the head of their priest, the garments of his sacred office rudely ripped, and thinking his life in danger became infuriated, and the death of poor District Inspector Martin occurred. I cannot refrain from referring to the attempt of the Government to fasten upon Father M'Fadden the responsibility of that crime. I forget with what technical offence he was charged in the first place, but certainly subsequently a charge of wilful murder was made against him, and for a long time he was kept under arrest on that odious charge, being driven from Letterkenny to Gweedore over and over again, and he cruelly remanded from time to time. By and by, however, that charge was dropped, and he was arraigned upon another charge. One thing which struck everybody who was present at Maryborough was that, although William Coll and the other accused persons were under trial, the whole action of the prosecuting counsel was to attempt to throw on Father M'Fadden all the responsibility. It is only fair to say that the Judge felt it his duty continually to call attention to the fact that Father M'Fadden was not on his trial. When we are invited to pass this Vote I think we are entitled to ask how far the conduct of these criminal prosecutions tends to secure the objects we should have in view? Surely the aim of all our elaborate system is to prevent crime, and to win over people to co-operation with the Government in bringing about a state of real contentment and orderly and peaceable conduct on their part. But anyone who has visited the North-West of Ireland would find it impossible to discover any man who would say that the administration of the law by the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues had won the people over to anything like respect for it; on the contrary, it had provoked in their minds feelings of the intensest hostility and revolt. I should, indeed, think less of the Irish people if they entertained any other feeling; for I believe that free men—men who are worthy of being free—could not sit down contentedly under such a condition of things. I agree with the hon. Member who last spoke that the right hon.

Gentleman opposite is playing the game of his political opponents. He is doing his best—although, of course, I do not question the honesty of his purpose—to carry out a policy which centuries of misrule have proved to be a failure, and he is paving the way for those better times when Irishmen of all classes will be equal, in the eye of the law; when people will respect the law; when they will regard order not merely as the enforcement of an arbitrary system by those for whom they have no respect, but as a state of things which contributes to their happiness and contentment; and when there will be a cordial union with those under whose rule the Irish people have to live, and to administer their own affairs.

(10.7.) MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): This Debate, I think, would be a valuable one if it only produced speeches such as that which we have just heard on the part of an English eye-witness of the scenes in Ireland. I cannot help thinking it has even been still more valuable in eliciting the speech of the Chief Secretary. That speech to my mind gave a most instructive and candid exhibition of the spirit of contempt and of aversion with which he regards the people whom he has been sent to govern. The Government were charged to-night with jury-packing—a practice as notorious in Ireland as the sun in the heavens, but which, for some extraordinary reason, Law Officer after Law Officer has been called on to disown in this House. What was the reply about jury-packing? In the first part of his speech he denounced with indignation jury-packing as a gross libel upon the guileless Law Officers of Ireland, and the second part was devoted to the defence of that practice. He made the plainest possible admission that the practice was carried on as an institution, and he based that on the most offensive ground which it was possible even for a Chief Secretary like the right hon. Gentleman to take up—the ground that three-fourths of the Irish people cannot be trusted to return a true verdict on their oaths. Let him put what construction he likes upon phrases. If his speech means anything, it means that three-fourths of the smaller farmer class cannot be trusted to do this, and the consequence is that when the men are told to stand by it involves the direct stigma of perjury upon them. From this night forward I defy any Government to stand up and deny that there has been jury-packing in Ireland. It is now admitted by the Chief Secretary, who has championed and defended it as an inevitable incident of government in Ireland, and with the greatest possible confidence I leave to the judgment of the English people both the right hon. Gentleman's logic in resenting in one part of his speech what he championed in another, and his method of conciliating the sentiments and susceptibilities of the Irish people, whom he has charged with unreliability upon their oaths, and with perjury. I hold that this is practically confessed in the Journals of the House of Commons, and I pass to the case brought forward by the hon. Member for North Dublin. The Attorney General seemed to be very anxious to part with the case of Mr. Kelly, but we cannot allow him to part with it. I am not sufficiently versed in the niceties of the law of conspiracy to be able to deal with the legal bearings of the case. This is a case in which, to my mind, the common sense of laymen is quite able to appreciate the unfairness and infamy of this charge. The Attorney General founded the whole of his defence, so far as he attempted any, except the most perfunctory and trifling, upon the decision of the Court of Exchequer. But what the Court decided was that there was a certain amount of technical legal evidence which might possibly go to a jury, but the difference between English and Irish law is that in Ireland there is no jury fit to go to. The jury that had to decide Mr. Kelly's case consisted of two of the right hon. Gentleman's magisterial lackeys, two men who were depending on him for their promotion, and almost for their means of livelihood, and the evidence that any English jury would have scouted out of Court was quite enough to give those two officials a pretext for putting Mr. Kelly out of the way. Mr. Kelly has been removed—that is the proper professional term—not because there was a scrap of real evidence against him, but because he obstinately refused to give them a scrap. Such a thing could not happen in England, because no tribunal could possibly convict a man upon such evidence; but in Ireland the Magistrate is juryman, hangman, rope, and all, and when the order went down that Mr. Kelly was to be put out of the way he was sentenced to four months' imprisonment with hard labour, not for anything he did, but for a speech which I delivered nearly six months before in a different part of the country, so that he is now literally and actually suffering four months' imprisonment for simply using the personal pronoun in the plural number. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to point out any other offence that was brought home against Mr. Kelly. I hold this to be as atrocious a case of injustice as ever stained even the annals of Ireland, and it is even more cowardly than infamous. If anybody deserved to suffer for that speech it was I. I was prosecuted for it, but the prosecution was dropped. Again and again we challenged the right hon. Gentleman to contest in a Court of Law the legality of the combination on the Smith-Barry estate, but they declined to submit that question even to an Irish Court of Law. I submit this as another specimen of the Chief Secretary's new order of things in Ireland. The new order of things is, to be cautious about Members of Parliament, for they have friends, and they may possibly do some mischief to the Government in England; but strike at the under men, strike at the humble men, and punish them for the speeches of M.P.'s, if you can get nothing else to punish them for. I venture to say that, bad as was his original policy of striking at us and endeavouring to degrade us, this is an infinitely more cowardly policy. I fervently trust the right hon. Gentleman's calculations as to the impunity with which the Government can attack men like John Kelly will be disappointed as grossly as every other calculation of his has been with reference to Ireland. I appeal to Englishmen to study the facts of this case, believing that if they do so they will resent the treatment of this unfortunate man none the less because he does not happen to be a Member of Parliament, but, on the contrary, will regard with infinitely more indignation and disgust this revolting system by which recourse is had to dodges of this sort to get rid of a political opponent whom the Government dread, and who has never placed himself within the power of the Coercion Law. The Chief Secretary has, as usual, added insult to injury in the case of John Kelly, and in this House stigmatised him as a paid agent engaged in infamous work. The right hon. Gentleman talks of a paid agent! He is a paid agent himself; and he knows in his heart that no single man serves the Government in Ireland except as a paid agent. Mr. John Kelly is no more a paid agent than any right hon. Member who sits on the Benches opposite. He is as respectable a man, and I think he is as able a man as any on the Treasury Benches. He is engaged in a work which he need not blush for, and which will compare favourably with the work in which the Chief Secretary is engaged. I believe we will succeed in spite of every effort to stifle public opinion, that we will get the facts into the English mind, and whatever may be the issue of the Irish Estimates now before the House, I believe whenever the English people get a chance they will express their opinion in regard to cases like that of Mr. John Kelly, and condemn the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in a rather more straightforward English fashion than that in which even his Removables have condemned Mr. John Kelly.

(10.22.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I rather believe that I have heard that oration before, and I am possibly destined to hear it again. It is very good of its kind. And I have nothing to say against it, except that it seems to me like an old familiar friend. With regard to the earlier part of the hon. Member's speech I did not hear it, for I was absent from the House, and was not aware a personal attack was being made on me.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I shall be happy to repeat it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But with regard to the last part of the speech, I think the Irish Government receive rather hard measure at the hands of their critics. I recollect, during two years of the administration for which I was responsible, that gentlemen opposite, whether above or below the Gangway, filled their speeches with the most violent attacks because I had the audacity to proceed against the Members of Parliament. It was said to be an insult to the House and to the country. But according to the hon. Gentleman now, the Government did not attack Members of Parliament, and it is construed into a sign of cowardice. It is very difficult to please hon. Gentlemen.

DR. TANNER: You do discriminate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. The action of the Government, as far as I am responsible, has been perfectly uniform throughout.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Newsvendors, for instance.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There has been no distinction drawn, and there ought to be no distinction drawn, between Members of Parliament and others, and when the hon. Member now ornaments his rhetoric with inflated periods and complains of the Government because they do not proceed against him, I think he should do us the justice to recollect the not infrequent occasions on which we have found ourselves with great regret forced to take action against him.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: What I found fault with was that the right hon. Gentleman did not prosecute me for what I said, but did prosecute Mr. John Kelly for it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not so. We prosecuted Mr. Kelly for what he did himself—for taking part in a conspiracy of which it is not impossible that the hon. Gentleman was a member. Mr. Kelly was twice imprisoned by the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and twice by the present Government. The hon. Gentleman was very angry with me for having described Mr. Kelly as a paid agent. I admit I have not seen legal proof of it, but if Mr. Kelly has been paid money it neither aggravates nor diminishes the offence of which he was guilty. That offence was the offence of conspiracy. The hon. Member for Aberdeen made a long speech, in which he said that Mr. Kelly might have appealed on the facts of the case, but he chose to appeal on the law of the case to the Court of Exchequer, and he found that the appeal had no basis of law. Why did Mr. Kelly choose to appeal on the law rather than the facts of the case? I credit Mr. Kelly, or his lawyer, with the common sense of choosing the point of appeal which would give him the best chance of getting off. Therefore, I have a right to conclude that, weak as Mr. Kelly's case was in point of law, it was weaker in point of fact. That is a conclusive answer to the hon. Member for Aberdeen. Mr. Kelly did not appeal to the County Court Judge, who is not, in the eloquent phrase of the hon. Gentleman, a lackey of the Government, but as independent as any Judge in England or Scotland, because he was of opinion that the case would have gone against him; but he appealed to the Court of Exchequer. I think I have said enough in dealing with the legal merits of Mr. Kelly's case. It has been asserted during this Debate that the combination of tenants on the Smith-Barry estate is a legal one, and I wish to refer to what the hon. Member for East Mayo has said on that point. No doubt it is perfectly legal for people to determine that they will not pay their rents and will go out of their holdings; but it is not legal to combine to induce people to do that; still less to combine to compel people by intimidation to do that; and my chief, but not my sole, complaint against the action in Tipperary is this—that men who desired to pay their rents, who were able to pay them, and who had an enormous pecuniary stake in their tenancies, were compelled by intimidation, the result of conspiracy, against their will and against their interest, to refuse to pay their rent, and by refusing to sacrifice enormous sums which they had invested in their holdings. That is the illegality of which I complain. I do not complain of any man saying, "I will no longer pay rent; I will go out." If they had done nothing more than that no complaint of illegality would have been heard. It is very well-known that the action in Tipperary has not been action of that kind; but it has been accompanied by intimidation; and those who have had the audacity either to pay rent or to remain in their holdings have had their houses wrecked, have been subjected to intimidation of every sort and kind, and boycotted. It is this intimidatory accompaniment to the combination on the Smith-Barry estate which has justified the Government in describing it as an illegal combination.

(10.33.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is weak in his law and still weaker in his facts. I have no doubt the Committee will think it remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman, who boasts that he has at his fingers' ends the facts of all these cases, did not endeavour to enlighten the Committee in the slightest degree as to what was the law or what were the facts of the case on which Mr. John Kelly was convicted. Now, can we imagine, or can the admirers of the right hon. Gentleman, who admit that he never loses a point that by any means will tell in his own favour, can the dullest or most embryonic Conservative intelligence imagine for a moment that if the right hon. Gentleman could show the Committee in what degree Mr. Kelly was guilty he would not have done so? I challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to deny that Mr. Kelly's offence was that he went round among the tenants, that he drove on an outside car with tenants, that he went into the house of one of them, and after having had a little whisky and water with the wife of the tenant, was heard to say, "The women are stronger for us than the men." It was for that that Mr. Kelly got four months; while yesterday the respectable lady who stole Mr. Stanley's spoons got off with a fortnight. How do they make up the case against Mr. Kelly? On what is it that the Conservatives will by and by go into the Lobby to defend the imprisonment of Mr. Kelly? Six months before, the hon. Member for North-East Cork, at a place 14 miles away, made a speech, for which he was not prosecuted, and because the hon. Member made that speech Mr. Kelly got four months' imprisonment with hard labour, which is as remarkable a problem in black letter law as was ever worked out. This is what the right hon. Gentleman ask Conservative Members to defend. This is odious; but still more so are the means by which hard labour was added. The Chief Secretary spoke of Mr. Kelly being a paid agent. I do not know whether he is a paid agent or not. I am sorry to hear he is not, because no man better deserves to be paid for his services in Ireland than Mr. Kelly. But I will tell the right hon. Gentleman that he has a paid agent on the Bench, one of the briefless barristers named Meldon, whose brother Charlie some hon. Members may remember as having once had a seat in this House. Those who remember Charlie may infer from him what a washed out copy his brother is. Well, this brother had as his colleague a gentleman bearing the warlike name of Waring, who, I believe, is a brother of the not unwarlike Member for North-East Down, who sits opposite. When Mr. Meldon had said, "We will give the defendants four months' imprisonment," he said to his colleague, "Shall we give hard labour?" and Mr. Waring said, "Oh! with hard labour. They are strong chaps." I believe Mr. Waring is as deaf as a post, and therefore did not hear the evidence. The House has heard the attack of the right hon. Gentleman on Mr. Kelly, who, the right hon. Gentleman said, was a paid agent, which is not true; but he did not tell the House that on the day before Mr. Kelly was imprisoned, the day before his appeal was heard by Dr. Webb, the Freeman's Journal reported a disgraceful attack on Mr. Kelly made by the right hon. Gentleman. If Irish Members ask a question about a policeman, we are told, "Oh, the case is sub judice; it cannot be answered;" but that consideration did not prevent the attack on Mr. Kelly. In the same way, when Mr. M'Henry, the editor of the Limerick Leader, appealed to the County Court Judge against a sentence of nine months' hard labour, and the appeal was still pending at the County Court of Limerick, the right hon. Gentleman selected his case as a Press case to vindicate his conduct in attacking newspapers; and the County Court Judge has the report of the speech before him as a finger-post when the appeal comes on. Of course, M'Henry's sentence, like Kelly's, was confirmed by the County Court Judge. I meet those County Court Judges often; many of them are friends of mine. The right hon. Gentleman said they are not.

removables ; but they are pro-movables, and are the appointees of the right hon. Gentleman, and the County Court Judge of Tipperary is not even yet warm in his seat. By a job the Government got old Wall to retire for the purpose of making Mr. Anderson County Court Judge of Tipperary, so that they might have a strong man. Of course, when a County Court Judge is appointed by a Conservative Administration, he has to do their work ; their lives would be miserable if they did not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I rise to order. The hon. and learned Member is making an attack upon County Court Judges, whose salaries are charged on the Consolidated Fund, on the ground that they dare not give verdicts against the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY : On the question of fact, the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken.

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. and learned Member is endeavouring to meet the argument which has been used as to there having been no appeal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : He is endeavouring to meet that argument by suggesting that justice cannot be done by County Court Judges in Ireland if they have been appointed by the present Government.

THE CHAIRMAN : That, undoubtedly, would be out of order.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I do not want the Chief Secretary to teach me as to questions of order. He and his Party have not achieved such a very brilliant success on questions of order as to entitle him to take that position. I must say to the right hon. Gentleman when he asks us to sit quiet and imitate what he does, that for myself I bear quietly all the attacks of the Chief Secretary, but his manners do not exhibit the repose which "marks the caste of Vere de Vere." I am only saying what I can in defence of the County Court Judges in Ireland. When you get a job, I really think it ought to be accepted with some show of gratitude.

THE CHAIRMAN : Order, order !

MR. T. M. HEALY : Very well, Mr. Courtney. I would like to have said a few words more in defence of these gentlemen. I will pass from that subject, merely observing that when we do come to the Vote, the right hon. Gentleman will find that their salaries are not on the Consolidated Fund, and that their salaries can be discussed like those of ordinary mortals. I was discussing the case of Mr. Kelly from the point of view of appeal, and I will content myself by saying that, taking the gentlemen to whom the appeal has to be made, there is no chance of an appeal on the facts to a County Council Judge going against the Government. There is only one County Court Judge—Judge Waters, of Waterford—who has given an opinion against the Government, and the Chief Secretary has twice in this House made most unfortunate attacks upon that gentleman. So far as the agents and barristers of the Government are concerned, Judge Waters at this moment is a boycotted man.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I have made no attack on Judge Waters. I have merely stated that twice his decisions were upset by the Superior Courts.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I wonder how often the decisions of the Removables have been upset ! I acknowledge the courtesy and benevolence of the Chairman in allowing me to refer to the matter. I think this case of Mr. Kelly forms a perfect type of what is going on in Ireland ; and with regard to the right hon. Gentleman's observation that we have not been prosecuted, the point of my hon. Friend was this—"You have given Kelly four months' imprisonment for a speech in respect of which you did not dare to prosecute me." In his airy manner the right hon. Gentleman turns that into a complaint. He says that formerly Irish Members complained that they were prosecuted, and now they complained that they were not. With regard to the statement that intimidation prevails in Tipperary, let me point out that Mr. Kelly was tried on two charges of intimidation and conspiracy, and he was acquitted on the charge of intimidation. Is it not monstrous, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman should say that intimidation prevails in Tipperary? I say it is most disingenuous, and we should really have some apology from the right hon. Gentleman. Perhaps the action of the Government in this case will be defended in an epistle from the Member for Dover. I think the Member for Dover has not commented on this case. Really, I would invite him, and even appeal to him, when next he has his fertile pen in his hand, to be good enough to give his attention to and favour us with his views on the case of John Kelly. Perhaps he will defend the action of the Government in imprisoning Mr. John Kelly for four months on account of a speech by the hon. Member for North-East Cork. Bad as Kelly's case was, there is another which shows the character of the justice we may expect to get on appeal. I refer to the case of a man named Ryan, who entered the public house of his cousin, and on seeing a policeman there he said to her, "Are you serving the police," to which she replied, "I wish I had all the policemen's money." Ryan thereupon refused to be served, and he got six months' imprisonment. [Laughter.] I do not know what is exciting the sarcastic laughter of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. No doubt we shall hear from him with his 17 quotations in his wallet. Ryan was prosecuted by George Bolton, against whose character I am not going to say a word. He has been attacked by the Judges, and it is of no use treading the beaten path. George Bolton is one of the astute men in the Irish Government. He cares not twopence about law and order; but he cares a great deal about the six-and-eight-pences to be gathered in prosecutions. He sets his police for reports just as a setter goes for game. He has no feeling against the person accused; he has no feeling in the matter; he simply makes it a matter of business. I have no feeling whatever against Bolton. I regard him, I may say, with professional awe. Ryan appealed; I think the decision was confirmed, and Ryan is now undergoing six months' hard labour. As to the question of intimidation, I have here the Report of the North Durham Election Petition (Harcastle, p. 158), in which Baron Bramwell, who, of all the Judges who decorate the House of Lords, is the strongest on this question of intimidation and conspiracy, says—

"The more venial crime was the intimidation, which consisted in threatening the voters that they should lose custom if they did not vote in accordance with the wishes of their customers."

That is the opinion of an English Judge in reference to your tenure in this House. It is intimidation of a venial kind when practised against Members of Parliament, but it is punishable with six months' imprisonment in the case of Shaw, who left the beerhouse because policemen were served. Lord Bramwell says—

"I am not sure that it is unlawful."

How do hon. Members like that from one of the English Judges?—

"I am not sure—in fact I am of opinion that it is not actually unlawful."

Yet Ryan is now on a plank bed for what Lord Bramwell declared was not unlawful—

"I suppose it is open to a man to say he does not choose to deal with you, not in accordance with the merits of the commodities you show to him, but according to your politics on one side or the other."

And here is this fatal sentence on the question of conspiracy—

"And I suppose if one man can do this 50 men can do it."

What becomes of your moveable law, your perambulatory law, your law according to Waring and Meldon? You have from one of your strongest and most ironclad Judges this declaration, yet you find the Irish Removable Magistrates giving a man six months' imprisonment because he refused to drink porter in the house of his cousin because she served the police.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman is travelling outside the Vote in challenging the decisions of Resident Magistrates.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, Sir, I challenge the action of the Government, because the Attorney General, I suppose, flatted these prosecutions. I presume Ryan's case was laid before him, and, that being so, I want to know whether he is not the person mainly responsible, and whether he can with any hardihood maintain that it is a case for six months' hard labour? The right hon. Gentleman says conspiracy prevails in Tipperary. Where is the conspiracy? Hitherto the great complaint of the Irish landlords and the Irish newspapers has been that the Irish tenants want to eat their cake and have it—to stick to their farms and pay no rents for them—and the Times and other English newspapers used to fulminate against their dishonesty, and say that English Trades Unionists did not act in that way, and that when they struck they did not stick to the factory, but went into the streets. But what has happened in the case of the Smith-Barry tenants? They have flung the land and houses at the landlord. They have built a large and commodious mart for their own convenience. [Laughter.] Let us not have the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind. They have built, I say, large and commodious premises for their businesses and for the occupation of the tenants in the neighbourhood. Is that conspiracy? Yes; with the Government everything is conspiracy. It is conspiracy to stick to the land; it is conspiracy to give it up. Why cannot the Smith-Barry tenants go out on the road side if it pleases them? Should not the Government be delighted that these people do not resist the Sheriff? When they do resist the Sheriff it is a terrible crime. We have heard Lord Salisbury and other leaders of the Tory Party declaim about the resistance which has been offered to the Sheriff; we have heard them talk of the necessity for putting up escalating ladders and so forth, and we have heard them say, “Why do not the people act legally and give up their houses peacefully and quietly as the English people do?” And yet when the people do give up their houses peacefully and endeavour to establish themselves elsewhere, we are told that it is conspiracy. That does not please you. In fact, nothing will please you except the punctual payment of rent. That is the only thing the Irish tenants may do and not be sent to gaol for it. All that John Kelly did, I presume, was to go round and advise the tenants to peacefully give up their holdings to the landlord—to recognise the rights of property—to swing the thurible in front of the rights of property, and yet everyone who has given that advice is now lying on a plank bed, or has come out of gaol with his back scored. We have had a Judgment “per Wyndham, C.J.” the Chief Justice who sits for Dover. From the nicest point of Sheriffs’ law down to the most abstruse point connected with the Land Act, he has given us an opinion we all heard with so much profit. If he would only give us some disquisition on Tipperary, I am sure our minds would be purged from all doubt. I must confess I cannot understand what is exactly the position of Her Majesty’s Government. The case of the Gweedore prisoners has been referred to. I cannot enter into that, having been engaged in the case; but leaving aside all questions of law and of merits, I must say it is a strong order to keep a man in gaol, regarding it purely from an Executive point of view, when we find that four Judges were of opinion that he ought to be released, and five Judges—one of them being the Judge whose Judgment was involved—were of opinion that he should be kept in prison.

THE CHAIRMAN: That matter is outside this Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As a matter of law charges, Sir, if it does not arise under this Vote it cannot be discussed at all, as there is no other Vote upon which it can arise.

THE CHAIRMAN: The prisoner is undergoing sentence, and the only way the sentence can be interfered with is by the exercise of the clemency of the Crown. The matter, therefore, would arise under the Vote for the Chief Secretary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will not go into that matter. The only other case I will refer to is that of Dennis Connell, a prisoner who was tried four times for murder in Kerry, and I think this case amply illustrates the objectionable manner in which law prosecutions are conducted in Ireland. I am not finding fault with the Government for trying the prisoner four times. It is a strong thing to do; but if the Executive hold a strong opinion of the man’s guilt, if the crime has been a particularly barbarous one, I do not say that they are not justified in trying the man four times.

But this is the point of my complaint : two men are arraigned for murder, not an agrarian murder, but one arising out of a family matter. Lawrence Hickey was tried with Dennis Connell, and was convicted and sentenced to be hanged, and was very properly hanged in due course of law. Having hanged one man it might have been thought that they should have paused. But they tried Dennis Connell a second time. Every Catholic was struck off the panel. The third Jury disagreed, a Jury on which no Papist was allowed to sit, the third time Connell was put on his trial, Hickey having been hanged in the meantime. For the fourth time Connell was put on his trial, and for the fourth time the Jury disagreed, a purely Protestant Jury. And now, Mr. Courtney, comes the point of my observations. One man was hanged, and in the same case another man was put on his trial four times.

MR. MADDEN : Three times.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Well, it really does not matter. I am not finding fault on that point, but what happened? This was a case of a family dispute, and there had been an inquiry under the 1st section of the Crimes Act. Who conducted that secret inquiry? Shannon, brother of one of the Shannons of the Times, who went to Maryborough Gaol and administered the illegal oath to Delaney—son of the other Shannon, who was solicitor to the Times, and whose practices have in various ways come under the notice of the Court—father and son, a truly worthy pair. The other Shannon was the Resident Magistrate who conducted the secret inquiry. How did Shannon get to be a Magistrate? Simply because he was secretary to Colonel Turner; and will the Committee believe that while Connell was in peril of his life in the dock in Maryborough, the man instructing the Crown Counsel was Shannon, the Resident Magistrate who had conducted the secret inquiry against Connell? In the lowest moments of Instruction in France, I believe the prisoner at the parquet has never had the disadvantage of having the Juge d'Instruction advising counsel against him. Shannon absolutely recommended that Connell should be put on his trial for the fourth time, and they would have put the man on his trial for the fourth time, but they made a bargain with him vid Shannon, that he should go to America. They put him on the deck of a steamer and shipped him to the United States. Why did Shannon want him prosecuted for the fourth time? Why did Shannon want him hanged? Because Shannon declared—and this shows what is the motive of most of these Crown prosecutions in Ireland—"That if Connell is allowed to go back to Kerry, he will have me shot." [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No, he did not.] Of course, the right hon. Gentleman knows. I ask him why was Shannon in the Court Room at Maryborough while this man was tried for his life? What was he doing there? Will the right hon. Gentleman pick me out a case in the whole history of French jurisprudence in which a man, conducting an Instruction, has acted as Shannon acted? When he had finished the Instruction, Shannon's duty was to have remained in Kerry attending to his magisterial functions. Instead of that, you find him for weeks at a time, while these trials were going on, hanging round the purlieus of the Court at Maryborough, and giving his aid to Her Majesty's Government. The prisoner in the dock, a man with a rope round his neck, a man who had heard the fatal bell toll as his co-accused passed out to execution, was supposed to stand with an equal countenance before the jurors, while he saw the Instructing Magistrate giving his aid to those who were trying to take his life. Is that fair-play? Is that honourable dealing? And then, supposing you had not succeeded in inducing, by the threat of a fourth trial, Dennis Connell to emigrate to America; supposing he had stood out, and either got an acquittal or a nolle prosequi entered for him, would you have expected him to have respected the law? The Courts of Justice ought to be the object lessons of Her Majesty's Government. Justice should be so administered that every man, from the poorest peasant up to the Peer, should see in it something to extol and admire; that the poorest man, who has had sentence pronounced against him, should feel that the law has been administered fairly; that it should be said as your Attorney General, not of the 19th century, but of the days of Queen Elizabeth—Sir John Davis—said, “No men love to see good and impartial justice more than do the Irish.” Never shall I forget the remark an acquitted prisoner made to me. The man he was accused with was sent to penal servitude, and I said to the acquitted, “I am sorry we had no better success.” “Ah! well,” said he, “he broke the law.” There was a feeling in the peasant that when the law had been broken it was right that the sword of justice should have its course. But you expect these men, when they see the law prostituted and degraded by its instruments, to acquiesce with incense in the eulogium of the Chief Secretary, “We have stood up for the weak against the strong; we have acted fairly and justly before all men, and so let our epitaph be written.” No doubt Mr. Shannon is to-day descending from his easy chair, and sending someone to the plank bed. This fair and impartial man is now operating as freely and as gamely as ever—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am only illustrating why we cannot respect the law. Civil justice is as honourably administered in Ireland as in any country in the world. I even think the ordinary civil suitor gets a fairer hearing and more attention from the Judges—I would say more courtesy—than he does in this great and proud land of yours, probably because the Judges have not as much work to do. But when you have once introduced the elements of politics everything connected with decency and justice is exorcised. Take the case of Michael O'Brien, who was charged lately with poisoning his father-in-law by means of rat poison. He was first tried at Waterford. No question of politics or religion was involved, and the Crown made no challenge. The jury disagreed on the question of motive. No motive could be suggested except that O'Brien wanted to get the £10 for which the old man was insured. It was a fair question for disagreement, but what happened? The Crown changed the venue to King's County, and although the Chief Justice declared that no question of politics or religion was involved, the Crown challenged 42 Catholics, and the man was convicted. Is that not an abominable state of affairs? If O'Brien was guilty nobody in the community would have had the slightest sympathy with him. Even the people of the North of Ireland have not pretended that we have any sympathy with the killing of fathers-in-law. Why, then, is it to be declared that a Catholic upon his oath is unworthy of being believed? I mention that case simply for an à fortiori purpose. If the Government do this in a case of poisoning a relative, what will they not do when they believe the Crown and the Government are concerned? You deny, forsooth, that there was jury packing in the case of the Gweedore prisoners. I say your whole Government is tainted and poisoned, and instance after instance is brought forward by the Irish Members without finding a rebutter. The misgovernment of Ireland, flowing in a perennial stream, always affords sufficient matter to keep these Debates afloat Session after Session, year after year, Estimates after Estimates, and instead of Her Majesty's Government ministering one palliative to this system, it is maintained by Chief Secretary after Chief Secretary and by Attorney General after Attorney General, and the complaints of the Irish Members fall on unheeding ears. Because of that the Chief Secretary says we ought not to make our complaints; that, in short, we ought to forsake our duty to our constituents. We ought to give up even the satisfaction of uttering our complaints from our dunghill. He would deny us even that principle of representative Government. I say, Sir, that if it were only for the exposure of these wrongs, we should be false to our constituents and to our country if we did not bring them forward. At any rate, we shall have done our duty, and the shame will be upon you if, with these facts before your eyes, you who boast of law and order do nothing to redress our grievances.

Mr. T. M. Healy

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [14th July] reported.

First Resolution (see page 1620)
agreed to.

Second Resolution (see page 1643) postponed.

Third Resolution (see page 1679)
agreed to.

Fourth Resolution (see page 1679):—

(11.44.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I desire to ask a question which was put yesterday, and not answered.
It is, whether it is a fact that the Registrar General in Ireland has communicated to certain gentlemen in Dublin facts known to him officially, with the result that a criminal has been enabled to escape justice, and whether the Government propose to take any notice of his conduct under the Official Secrets Act of last year or otherwise?

(11.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I will spare the Government the trouble of rising. I was opposed to the gentlemen who had the benefit of this information, and I do not think it would come within the provisions of the Official Secrets Act.
The police had gone to the office, and made a public inquiry before the clerks and everyone else, and all the Registrar General said was that the police were making inquiries.

(11.46.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: I did not ask from a professional point of view at all, but from a public point of view.
I beg to ask whether, in consequence of this information being supplied, a criminal was enabled to escape from justice?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Nothing that was said yesterday gave me the idea that Dr. Grimshaw had violated the Official Secrets Act. If the hon. Member wishes I will undertake to make particular inquiries.

(11.47.) MR. E. HARRINGTON:
I desire to say that my hon. Friend made this charge against the Registrar
General last night.

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES]

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I listened to what the hon. Member said, and my own interpretation of his language was that Dr. Grimshaw was not guilty of any offence.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: The question still remains, whether the Registrar General in his official capacity has aided the escape of a criminal? I think the Chief Secretary or the Secretary to the Treasury, who was present last night, might certainly have been prepared with some answer on this particular point.
It is always better that matters affecting the disclosure of public documents should be probed to the bottom. I know quite well that in the case of a poor and humble man this matter would be inquired into.

(11.48.) DR. TANNER: I think we are entitled to some answer on this point. It would be better for Dr.
Grimshaw as well as for everybody else that, the matter having been brought forward, we should have some opinion expressed by the Government with regard to it.

Resolution agreed to.

Fifth Resolution (see page 1685) agreed

Postponed Resolution to be considered

SUPPLY [11TH JULY]—REPORT.

Resolutions read a second time.

Resolution 1 (see page 1492):—

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the First Resolution."

(11.50.) MR. DILLON: I desire to call attention to certain statements made by the Chief Secretary with reference to matters brought forward frequently in this House. It will be in the recollection of every Member that the Chief Secretary has repeatedly stated that the practice of shadowing is an old practice in Ireland, and that it was resorted to more frequently by the Government which preceded him than by himself. A sudden, swift, and fatal Nemesis overtook the right hon. Gentleman at a trial at Fermoy on Monday last. A man, David Kent, who was being shadowed at Fermoy Fair lately by a constable, was so exasperated that, seeing Sub-Inspector Ball, he proceeded to follow him at a distance of three or four feet. The Inspector told him he would have him arrested if he did not desist. Kent was arrested, kept in prison six hours, and then released and summoned before a Crimes Act Court, at which, on Monday last, he was charged with obstructing Sub-Inspector Ball in the discharge of his duty. In the course of that trial the Sub-Inspector was cross-examined by the counsel for the defence. He said he had his instructions respecting shadowing from a person whom he was bound to obey. He was made to describe what the practice of shadowing was. He said it was to follow as closely as possible the individual shadowed and to overhear all he said. In reply to further questions, the witness said, "The duty of shadowing commenced about 12 months ago in Ireland." Now, I would like to know what the right hon. Gentleman has to say to that? Is he going to tell us that Sub-Inspector Ball perjured himself, or is he going to stand by his police, and throw his own word overboard? The witness drew a distinction between watching and shadowing. He said habitual criminals in large cities were watched but not shadowed, and that the present state of the country rendered shadowing necessary. That is entirely a matter of opinion. The point is whether the Chief Secretary was mis-informing this House when he stated that shadowing was practised in Ireland before he came into office. Another witness, Constable Burke, deposed that he kept close to the defendant—"nearly treading on his heels." He believed it was very annoying and irritating to anybody who was shadowed, and he believed it might be punitive. There you have a definition of shadowing from the Irish police themselves, and it fully bears out all our statements on the subject. We were told by the Chief Secretary that shadowing was confined to men who were engaged in intimidation. I deny that. I say that the men who are being shadowed have nothing whatever to do with intimidation, and that, as far as we have information from either public or private sources, no individual who has been shadowed recently in Ireland has ever been suspected of or charged with intimidation. I have here a most remarkable and interesting copy of the Private Instructions which are issued from Dublin Castle for the guidance of shadows. These Private Instructions generally manage to fall into our hands. First of all, we have a list showing what classes of persons are to be shadowed. They are divided into Class A and Class B. Class A is the class of people who are to be partly shadowed, and Class B is the class of those who are to be completely shadowed. Then we have columns for county police district, name, residence, height, age, hair, eyes, nose, complexion, whiskers, moustache, beard, and particular marks. But this is not the part of the Circular that is really most interesting and important. I find that these particular instructions were issued with reference to the collection of the Tenants' Defence Fund, and that the people ordered to be shadowed are the collectors engaged in collecting funds for feeding and housing the evicted tenants all over the country. This Circular had reference to a district absolutely free, and free for months and years, from intimidation or crime of any kind whatever. Here are other directions applicable to those persons who are engaged in making collections for the Tenants' Defence Fund. The police are to furnish—"Names, occupations, and addresses of the parties who may be appointed to collect subscriptions in every parish. Their names are to be at once furnished if known; if not known at present a close watch should be kept, so as to ascertain what men may be appointed to go round and levy the 3d. rate."

Mr. Dillon

This is a voluntary rate; is it a crime to make such collections?

"The names of any person appointed to levy the tax and who are likely to use intimidation against persons not wishing to pay, should be specially reported at once, together with address and occupation. A close inquiry as to how the resolution levying the 3d. tax has been received by the farmers, whether they are likely to willingly pay it. If it is likely they will resist the imposition or yield to pressure and intimidation, collectors are to be shadowed discreetly. But if they use intimidation, or are likely to do so, they are to be shadowed openly."

Now, I should like to know how the knowledge of such a Police Circular would be received if issued in England? What would be the tone and temper displayed in such a case? Then we have a long series of directions in regard to people who are to be shadowed—

"In every instance in which a suspect in the general A list is shadowed a Report should be made by post without delay direct to the Inspector General by the District Inspector of the locality, who should briefly state what the suspect is doing and on what business employed, if known, and a duplicate Report sent to the Divisional Commissioner through the County Inspector. As regards the B list, persons named therein should be watched and wired after when they leave, and a Report of the same kind as is required in the A list sent to the Divisional Commissioners through the County Inspector as early as possible. The arrival of suspects in both the A and B lists should be notified to the Divisional Commissioner by wire. Members of Parliament leaving the country need not be wired after beyond the port of embarkation."

We are grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for this. It seems that, when once we take our departure from Ireland, the "shadowing" and the wiring of our movements is to cease. But is not this an outrageous, a monstrous system of espionage to which Members who do not sit under the protecting wing of the hon. Member for North Armagh should be subjected, and from which we are only relieved at the port of embarkation when we leave Ireland? Then we have instructions as to persons on a C list. Is this not like an account of the "third section" under Russian administration? As to this C list, the police are to report anything of a suspicious nature in relation to the persons therein to the Divisional Commissioners or County Inspector. I suppose that, seeing that lists A and B include Members of Parliament, and all active politicians opposed to the Government, this C list includes all the rest of the population of Ireland. This, then, is the system which prevails in Ireland! The whole country is divided for police purposes into A, B, and C lists. Is it not a scandalous, a disgraceful system, thus to turn the whole country into a gaol? All this in spite of the repeated disclaimers of the Chief Secretary. We have it on oath in the evidence of the police that this system of "shadowing" is new, that it was never known before it was introduced some 12 months ago. So much in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's declarations on the practice of "shadowing." There is one other matter to which I must allude, a matter of almost equal importance. A system has arisen in the House, introduced by the friends of the right hon. Gentleman, of putting down questions addressed to him embodying an account of any outrage that may come under their notice as having been perpetrated in Ireland, and then the Chief Secretary answers that the report is correct. I only wonder we have not had incorporated in a question the report which appeared in yesterday's Express of a dairymaid in Tipperary being stripped of her clothes and sent home stark naked as a mark of being obnoxious to Nationalists, but I suppose due warning was given of the falsity of the report. Every effort is made by means of these outrage questions to blacken our cause in the eyes of the people of this country. A few days ago, the Chief Secretary was asked by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) whether it was true that a man had been caught in the act of throwing an explosive machine into the house of a boycotted shopkeeper in Tipperary named Gubbins, and the right hon. Gentleman in reply said the report was true. Then my hon. Friend (Mr. Sheehy) rose and asked was there any shopkeeper in Tipperary of the name of Gubbins. It is beyond question that the name given was Gubbins, and the Chief Secretary insisted upon the truth of the statement. Now what are the actual facts? Mr. Gubbins is not a shopkeeper in the Town of Tipperary, but a farmer in the Parish of Oola, in the County of Limerick. It is true that on the 20th June two explosive bombs filled with gunpowder and cut wire were thrown into the house of Mr. Gubbins, one into the bedroom of the farmer, the other into the room where his children were sleeping. Fortunately, no injury was done. When inquiry came to be made it transpired that this could not have been an outrage committed by a member of the Nationalist Party, seeing that Mr. Gubbins is an active member of the Committee of the National League in this Parish of Oola, and it transpired that on a certain occasion he had taken part in a resolution passed by the committee by which a man named John Rafferty, of Cullen, was condemned for his conduct in having traded with a notorious land grabber named Ryan. Rafferty was condemned by the association, but, prepared as I am for cheers from hon. Members on strange occasions, I do not suppose that on this occasion they are meant to indicate that Rafferty was justified in throwing explosive bombs into the house of Mr. Gubbins. But that is what he did. On investigation it appeared that this emergency man Rafferty had thrown the bombs into the bedrooms of Mr. Gubbins in revenge for the part the latter had taken in the passing of the resolution I have referred to. For this abominable outrage Rafferty was arrested by the police. What expressions of horror there would have been on the opposite Benches if this outrage had been perpetrated upon a so-called Loyalist! Well, Rafferty was arrested and evidence brought sufficient for the Magistrate to commit him for trial, but, if you please, he is out on bail! Out on bail after throwing an infernal machine into a room where children were sleeping! Now, where is your law and justice? Now we see how the people of Ireland and their good name are traduced in this House. This abominable outrage was committed by one of the supporters of the party of law and order upon a member of the Nationalist Party, it has nothing to do with the movement in Tipperary, and as an outrage there it did not occur at all. And then the Magistrate deliberately releases the accused on bail. Why, if he had been a Nationalist all the money in Ireland would not have bailed him, and I will go further and say it should not have bailed him. Our movement in Tipperary has, I am glad to say, been attended with no serious outrage on the part of our people. There were some attempts at outrage in the earlier days of the struggle, and we condemned those attempts, and did our utmost to check them. They were attempts against property, not against life. There was no such abominable outrage as throwing an explosive bomb into a room with sleeping children. Why, if this had been done by a Nationalist or by any drunken rowdy whom you could by any cruel misrepresentation hold up to the people of this country as a Nationalist, the whole Press of England would have rung with horror and condemnation. But now we hear not a word of condemnation or indignation on those Benches because the man who suffered the outrage was a Nationalist ["Not true."] Well, I shall be perfectly willing to withdraw what I have said and apologise if it can be shown to be untrue, but I speak from the best information I have, and I believe it is reliable. Here are two specimens of the impartiality of Irish administration. We had a question the other day in reference to a poor Irish farmer who was arrested at a cattle fair on a charge of assisting at boycotting, nothing in the nature of intimidation, but simply recommending persons not to deal with certain other persons. On this charge he was dragged to Cork Gaol, bail being refused. Side by side with this, here you have a man employed by the landlord class who comes at night and throws an explosive bomb into a room where there are sleeping children, and he is bailed out! I leave the House to consider these examples of impartial administration without further comment.

(12.15.) MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): In reference to this system of "shadowing," which the Chief Secretary says, though it is contradicted by his own police, he found in existence, and that it had been exercised by his predecessors, I wish to draw attention to what occurred within my personal experience and in my own constituency. I had reason to attend the December fair at Waterford to buy store cattle, and as I went I met a young man named Farden, and knowing him to be a good judge of cattle I entered into conversation with him and asked him his opinion on cattle before us. Immediately a policeman came up and stood listening to every word we said. We walked along and looked at other cattle, and the constable followed and listened as before. Turning to him I asked the object of this, and he replied that he was under orders from his superior officer to follow Farden and hear every word he said in the fair. We went about and looked at various cattle, and I bought a few. Thence, having some purchases to make, we went into shops in the town, still followed by the constable. Finally, we went to the National Bank, whither the constable followed, and remained standing by while I transacted my business. Afterwards I took occasion to see the manger of the bank, and I told him that if the bank authorities allowed their premises to be used in this manner by police spies the matter should be made known, and my constituents would know how to deal with it. In the result Mr. Prosser waited upon the authorities, and the bank managers have set their face against the practice, and refuse to allow constables to interfere with the private business of their clients. We hear much about this system having long prevailed in Scotland, but I defy the right hon. Gentleman to prove that any such system was in vogue under the administration of Lord Spencer and the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division. We fought them for what they did do, and we should do so again in like circumstances; but I emphatically deny that this system of shadowing was practised when Lord Spencer ruled Ireland under a Coercion Act. It is a novel expedient introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary; and we have it on the evidence of his own subordinates that it has come in under his own beneficent rule. You complain of want of respect for order, and demand obedience to the law, and law and order are conditions of every civilised community. We are as anxious as you can be that law and order should prevail in Ireland; but if the law is to be respected and obeyed it must be worthy of respect. I hope the House will not think me egotistical in this personal allusion I have made. I simply give my own experience, that Members may realise the actual condition of things under this system of shadowing.

(12.20.) Mr. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): It may tend to shorten discussion if before the right hon. Gentleman replies he has the full statement of our case. My hon. Friend has given his personal experience, but I suppose the Chief Secretary will discount that statement as coming from an Irish Member, and we know he sets up the word of his agents against that of any Member on these Benches, no matter how supported or corroborated. We have more ground to go upon when we charge the Chief Secretary and his lieutenant the Attorney General for Ireland with giving answers to our questions which are calculated wittingly or unwittingly to mislead the House. I put a question the other day to the right hon. Gentleman, to which, he being absent, the Attorney General replied, giving me the answer I suppose I should have received from the Chief Secretary himself had he been here. I asked for information upon facts I put in question form, whether a meeting of the suppressed branch of the National League took place on Sunday fortnight; whether 500 or 600 men marched from the place of meeting into the town of Tipperary in order to demonstrate the fact that a meeting did take place? The Attorney General replied that no such meeting had occurred, that 500 or 600 people did not march into Tipperary as stated, and this answer was given with all the assurance of official information. Then I read in my newspaper the report of proceedings in which a noble Lord in another place made an attack upon Lord Spencer, and I found that the attack was based on the fact of that meeting having been held, and citations were made from a speech delivered there. Which are we to believe? Either Lord Londonderry stated a falsehood in another place, or else the statement made from that Bench in answer to my question was inaccurate, and based on false information. It is one of the usual modes of attack by the Government on those who sit opposite to them to say, "You did likewise when in office," and this was the whole burden of the noble Lord's speech, but I think it is time for someone to say, from his own knowledge, as I do, that there is no comparison between the state of things in Ireland now and the state of things under the régime of Lord Spencer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division. I know what occurred. I know there was crime all over the country, but I know that, while Lord Spencer sought to grapple with crime, liberty was restored to the people at the same time. The right of public meeting was restored, and the National League grew up under the régime of the noble Lord, and I know that the Government then tried to steer an even keel, and treated Orangemen in the North with the same severity as Nationalists in the South. Now, I wish to draw attention to another statement of the Chief Secretary. I forget now whether it was in debate or in answer to a question in reference to the state of Tipperary. The right hon. Gentleman said that a meeting which we declared had taken place there did not take place at all.

We stated that the meeting held at the opening of New Tipperary took place out of doors, but the Chief Secretary said if it took place at all it took place under a roof, and not in the open. Now, I know the Chief Secretary will prefer to accept his official information to our statements. But here I have further evidence. Photography does not lie, and here I hold in my hand two photographs, one of the exterior of the building where there are four persons only, and here I have a photograph of the exterior, where in the open air thousands of people are represented, and a platform erected, and speakers addressing the people. Then, I say the statement made from that Bench was calculated to mislead. The Chief Secretary said no open air meeting took place; here is a photograph of the scene of the meeting with all the accompaniments of a public meeting in the open air. If hon. Gentlemen opposite have any doubts as to the genuineness of these photographs, I should be happy to submit them to inspection. I have brought them here for the purpose of showing the House that, day after day, in answer to our questions, we get statements from the Chief Secretary inconsistent with the facts, and calculated to mislead the House, and I think this is a proper opportunity to bring this under the notice of the House.

(12.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have spoken several times to-night, and I will, therefore, now make my remarks as short as I can. The hon. Gentleman has brought forward two cases, which he states are instances of inaccuracies on the part of the Irish Government. The first relates to an answer given by the Attorney General for Ireland, on my behalf, denying that there had been an open-air meeting at Tipperary on a certain occasion, and the hon. Member contended that that statement was shown to be inaccurate by the fact that Lord Londonderry recently quoted from a speech alleged to have been delivered at that meeting by Father Humphrey. But that is no ground whatever for supposing that the police were wrong in the Report they made that no open-air meeting took place. The reports of alleged meetings of suppressed branches of the National League are continually appearing in certain newspapers, though no such meetings occur at all. But in regard to this instance, I admit that I rather over-stated the facts. It is true that an open-air meeting was held, but this was no part of the original programme that the authorities had to deal with.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: It was the principal event of the day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am inclined to believe from my general knowledge of human nature that the banquet was the principal event. Next, the hon. Member for East Waterford has referred to a case of shadowing that came under his notice. But I am not concerned to deny any of the facts stated by the hon. Member. I do not deny that the Irish Government direct shadowing. On the contrary, we openly avow that shadowing is a part of our policy to which we attach great importance. As to whether shadowing the boycotters at fairs is justifiable or not is another question, and one upon which I have already addressed the House. I have told the House that, in my opinion, it is the only way of protecting these poor boycotted people. If we permit such boycotting, it means practically a sentence of death on every man who holds a boycotted farm. Under the circumstances I consider shadowing perfectly justifiable, and, as far as I am concerned, it will continue. It is to be noticed that the boycotters also shadowed the boycotted person, and the only difference between the action of the police and of the boycotters is that the one has an innocent motive and the latter a criminal intention. Then, reference has been made to a case at Fermoy, in which it is alleged that the constable stated that this duty he had been on was new within the last 12 months. It is not denied that the shadowing of boycotters at fairs is new. But Lord

Spencer had not to deal with boycotting at fairs; that class of crime did not exist then. I do unhesitatingly assert that Lord Spencer's Government did not hesitate to shadow individuals who were suspected of crime, intimidation, or boycotting.

MR. DILLON: I wish to make my point clear. The Inspector swore that shadowing was unknown in Ireland till within the last year, and in his evidence a distinction was drawn between "shadowing" and "watching." Lord Spencer had persons suspected of crime watched, but he did not have them shadowed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it will be found, on reference to Hansard, that shadowing of a most rigid character was practised under Lord Spencer's administration. The character of the "watching" by the police differs with the character of the persons watched and the offence to prevent which they are watched. If the person watched is suspected of organising boycotting it is absolutely necessary, in order to prevent that particular offence being committed, that he should be followed closely—shadowed, as it is termed—to prevent him from carrying out the crime of boycotting.

MR. DILLON: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to admit now that what he considers absolutely necessary is a new departure.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I say that boycotting at fairs is new, and there was, consequently, till it came up, no necessity to shadow people at fairs. But Lord Spencer's Government, and every Government, have always shadowed and watched such persons as in the interest of public order they thought necessary. The hon. Gentleman proceeded next to discuss some inaccuracy of which he said I was guilty in answer to a question of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I am sorry the hon. Member for South Tyrone is not in his place; if he were he would have told the hon. Member that the person about whom he asked was Duggan, not Gubbins. Duggan was the only person in the mind of my hon. Friend and myself, and with regard to him the answer was perfectly accurate. I can only say with regard to this particular case I am sorry that the hon. Member should always speak of a particular instrument when used by his own Party as a squib, but when used by others, as a bomb, or an infernal machine. The latter description is, no doubt, the more accurate, but I hope that in both the cases of Duggan and Gubbins the real authors of these iniquitous outrages will be brought to justice.

(145.) MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I was looking for a much stronger defence from the right hon. Gentleman of this abominable method which is known by the name of shadowing. I had occasion to visit Ireland two or three months ago, and I had some personal experience of the system. I went to Tipperary to see the place which has created so much interest during the last few months, and I stayed at the best hotel. While I was at breakfast I happened to state that I intended to walk through the town, and a gentleman whom I met there offered to accompany me, but we had hardly gone 20 yards from the hotel when a policeman came so close to us that he might be taken as one of the party, and walked by our side, so that he could hear every word. I was naturally somewhat surprised, and was anxious to know whether I or my companion was thus being shadowed. I found that it was my companion who was shadowed. Whatever the Chief Secretary may say, this was a mean and contemptible method of causing irritation and annoyance. There was no need whatever that the policeman should walk by our side. It was done only to irritate, and was likely to cause a breach of the peace rather than to promote order. If a policeman was to walk in the same way by my side in my own constituency it would certainly lead to a breach of the peace. Trade Unions and their leaders in this country would not submit to such a thing, and I am satisfied that the Government would not attempt it in England. I met a friend in Tipperary who is a Magistrate of the County of Durham, and has been High Sheriff. That gentleman happened to be in the town when the meeting was held at which the hon. Member for East Mayo attended, and in a letter he gave an account of what he saw at the time. The letter speaks for itself. The writer says—

"I saw a policeman run after a poor man who was quietly walking across the square by himself, and on overtaking him he seized him by the coat collar, struck him over the face with his baton, fetching blood, and the man dropped down. There was no attempt at aggression or self-defence. The man was suddenly seized and knocked down while walking quietly, and some people were running up to see what was doing, when my car drove away out of sight. My daughter was with me. I was twice driven back into the new Mart by the police, whilst I was quietly talking to a friend, and my daughter was also driven back and told to go or they would have their heads broken. During the whole of the day I saw no obstruction or any breaches of the peace, except those for which members of the Constabulary were themselves responsible. The statement that Mr. Dillon made in the House of Commons is correct in every word."

These facts speak for themselves. They show clearly that the Irish Constabulary abuse their powers. If the Government will grant an inquiry into these events, my friends, I feel sure, will unhesitatingly come forward to give evidence. I hope that even now the right hon. Gentleman will consent to such an inquiry being held.

*(12.52.) MR. WOODALL: During the evening a discussion has arisen with regard to the trial of the Gweedore prisoners at Maryborough. There were some circumstances which seemed to the English visitors so exceptional as to call for a special appeal to the Lord Lieutenant, to advise that the clemency of the Crown should be exercised in the case of William Coll. As the Chief Secretary is aware, a Memorial was sent to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, signed by the visitors present, praying that the clemency of the Crown might be exercised in favour of the prisoner. This Memorial, I regret to say, had no effect on the Lord Lieutenant. The special points to which the Memorial drew attention were certain parts of the evidence of Constable Varilly, which, I hold, ought not to have been admitted, and the Judge and Jury's disregard of the evidence of most respectable and impartial men who were present to prove an alibi. I say, again, that the circumstances seem to call for a re-investigation. If I wanted any vindication for this appeal, I think I could find it in the action of the right hon. Gentleman opposite in connection with the Maamtrasna case.

*(12.56.) MR. MADDEN: No doubt the Lord Lieutenant will carefully consider any Memorial or representation made to him in a proper manner. The only point as to which there was a point reserved, and a difference of opinion among the Judges, was as to admissibility of questions founded on a deposition made by Constable Varilly. This deposition the learned Judge, actuated by merciful motives, did not admit, because he thought it might contain certain statements prejudicial to the prisoner. He allowed specific questions, based upon that deposition, to be put, his desire being to prevent the whole of the depositions from being made evidence and so to protect the prisoner. The minority of the Judges considered this to be an irregularity, and that is the utmost that can be said on the point.

(12.59.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I wish to call attention to the case of Mr. Nally who, seven or eight years ago, was sentenced to penal servitude for 10 years, and as to whom there is a strong opinion among people who do not hold the same political opinions as myself that he was not guilty of the crime alleged against him. The crime with which he was charged was an atrocious one, and I would not seek to palliate it did I believe he was guilty. I think the case is one in which the Lord Lieutenant ought to interpose. Nally was kept 10 months in prison before he was brought to trial and convicted. He was tried by a jury in Cork, and the jury disagreed. There was an application for bail in Dublin pending a new trial. This application was refused I believe, and the Judge at the trial, when he delivered sentence, made the declaration that the 10 months during which Nally had been imprisoned between his arrest and trial would be considered in his term of penal servitude. The father of Nally is a very old man, and unless the Government extend some grace in this matter it is probable that Nally will never again see his father alive. The point I wish to put is that the 10 months during which Nally was in prison before his trial and conviction ought to be counted in the working out of his sentence. I hope the Government will make some reply to this, and I trust that it will be favourable.

(1.3.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I ask the attention of the House for a few moments; a few sentences will be sufficient. I wish to point out to the Chief Secretary the serious state of affairs in Ireland, and I will confine my observations strictly to a narration of my own experience in that country. When hon. Members have heard me, I think they will admit that I have a fair case to submit to the House. I, in company with my wife and another lady, and several Irish Members, left the town of Cashel at 9 o'clock on my way to Tipperary. Our car was followed by four drunken policemen, who drove their horse into our waggonette. They had loaded revolvers in their possession, and they showed their loyalty to the Chief Secretary and to the Government by singing the Fenian song "When we at the rising of the moon." These are the champions of law and order. They say that drunken men and children tell the truth. Perhaps this shows the sympathy of the Royal Irish Constabulary with Home Rule; it is not improbable. We needed protection against the excess of the Constabulary, and we stopped at the first police station we came to. I am sorry to say that we had to call the Inspector out of bed, and I asked him if he would defend us against the only ruffianism of which we were afraid, and that was the ruffianism of these drunken policemen. We could get no redress from the Inspector for this reason—it had never occurred to me that we were not under protection—that these policemen were not in his district, and that he had no jurisdiction. It seems to me that Englishmen travelling in Ireland have as much right to protection against a drunken policeman as against a drunken civilian. Is there not to be some safeguard and assurance given that the rights of civilians to protection will be maintained against these men who are supposed to be the champions of law and order? While I was gone to the police station these drunken men surrounded the waggonette, in which my wife and another lady were left under the protection and safeguard of the Irish gentlemen, and these drunken men used words which I hardly like to repeat to the House. They called the party a "damn'd set of loafers." That is what ladies and gentlemen in Ireland are subject to. Is there a village or town in England where such a state of things would be tolerated, or where the police would offer such insults to men and to women? I ask the House to consider this state of things. The right hon. Gentleman informed me, in reply to questions, that the Inspector had been degraded in rank, and one of the constables fined. No redress was given in the case of the other two. I was told that I could resort to process at law. But it is quite impossible to go over to Ireland to see justice done in a matter like this. I ask the House to consider the terrible state of things in Ireland, and the protection which is vouchsafed by the Chief Secretary to these people, who feel that they can, without fear of being reproved or having their rights interfered with, go on persecuting Irishmen and Englishmen. I do not complain that I was shadowed; I have not the slightest doubt it was the Irish gentlemen with me who were shadowed. I do think that if hon. Members opposite would go to Ireland incognito, and share, as have certain English Liberals, the sympathies and wretchedness of the Irish people, and see what they are subject to at the hands of the Irish police they would see to it that, before the Chief Secretary had the Vote of his salary, he brought this system of the Irish Constabulary to an end.

(1.12.) MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I wish to offer a few remarks on the case of Mr. Nally. None of us would ask for any favour from the Government for Mr. Nally, but we have a right to claim that on the ground of justice he should be released. He spent 10 months in custody before his sentence, and as he received the maximum sentence that 10 months ought to be taken as part of the sentence, in which case he is now entitled to his release.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no right to speak again, but I will assure the hon. Member that if the case turns out as has been represented the matter shall be brought before the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I think the case brought forward by the hon. Member for Durham is one on which we ought to insist on an inquiry. That case having been put forth on the authority of an ex-Sheriff and Magistrate of Durham, it ought not to be passed over in silence.

DR. TANNER: I only wish to call attention to the facts which came under my personal cognisance last year. Two English ladies, one of them the wife of an eminent Judge in this country, and both ladies of position, happened to be in Cork, where I called upon them and showed them round the city. They were Catholics, I being a Protestant. They went inside a Catholic place of worship, and found policemen stationed at the door, where they waited till they came out. The police followed us round from place to place in the same mean, low, and despicable manner as has been proved in the cases of shadowing that have come before us. I know what the Chief Secretary wants. He wants people to hit out in order that they may put themselves within the meshes of the law. I sincerely hope our people will not do this, but will continue to have confidence in the sense of justice of the English people, and the leaders of the English people, who will soon sit on that side of the House.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I be allowed to say a word upon the case of Mr. Nally, which has been brought forward by my hon. Friend. He was convicted on the evidence of a paid informer, named Colan, a person of infamous character. The impression in the district is that Nally was innocent of the crime charged against him, and also that he was the means in that district of preventing crime and outrage, and even of saving life. Between his arrest and conviction the extraordinary period of 10 months elapsed, during the whole of which period he was kept in custody. He has conducted himself so well in prison, that he has reached and maintained the first class for good conduct, and has never incurred the loss of a good conduct mark. If his good conduct marks are added together, and his 10 months' imprisonment before sentence were taken into account, he would have nearly served his full term of 10 years. I think that special weight should be given to his previous imprisonment. I have only to add that while Nally will not abase himself by making any appeal to the Government, he has a very aged father, who is in bad health and whose life cannot be much further prolonged. Under these circumstances, I think it would be a graceful act if the Government would consent to release Nally without further detention.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter shall be carefully considered.

CLASS III.

1. £80,099, to complete the sum for Supreme Court of Judicature and other Legal Departments in Ireland.

(12.30.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £50,000. I feel very strongly that there are many other Members in this House who are better qualified to criticise this Vote than I am. But I look upon the question as a large question of principle, and I think that while in almost every other Department of the expenditure of public money we have, after considerable efforts and prolonged struggles, attained something like purity in principle, we have arrived in the expenditure connected with the judicature of Ireland at a very large and gross misapplication of the public money. That is the reason why I venture to propose the reduction of the Vote. I do not propose to enter into the subject in great detail; but I would venture to hope that some Member of the House who is better acquainted with the legal business of Ireland will supplement the statement I desire to make. In the first place, I should like to compare the figures for this expenditure in Ireland with those for the same purpose in England and Scotland. The Vote is one for £85,000, exclusive of £10,000 for the Court of Bankruptcy. In England the whole expenditure for the Supreme Court of Judicature amounts to £390,000, and I am not at all sure that I am not entitled to deduct from that the large sum of £42,000 applicable to the District Probate Registry in order to make a fair comparison. But, supposing that I do not make that reduction, the Supreme Court in England costs £390,000, while in Ireland, including the Court of Bankruptcy and a small sum for the Admiralty Court,

VOL. CCCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

we have a sum of £97,000. Consequently, the Supreme Court of Ireland costs one-fourth of what it does in England. The comparison with Scotland is even more instructive. The population of the two countries is much nearer—that of Scotland being 4,000,000, while the last estimate for Ireland was 4,700,000. In Scotland, making a somewhat liberal estimate as to what is to be included in this expenditure, I find that the Supreme Court, civil and criminal, costs £25,400, against £97,000 in Ireland, so that the cost in Ireland is one-fourth of what it is in England, and nearly four times as much as in Scotland. There is absolutely no justification for this difference, and it is not only a wasteful, but it is an improper expenditure of the public money. It is true that this is not the first time the subject has been brought before the House, although I do not think the issue has been raised for a considerable number of years, nor, as far as I am aware, has it been directly raised on the Estimates in the way in which I propose to raise it on the present occasion. There was, however, an important discussion upon the subject in 1877, when the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill was passing through the House, and no motive of false patriotism prevented the most representative men who were sent here by the Irish constituencies from being the foremost to denounce this improvident expenditure in Ireland. I need not say that, for my part, I do not grudge the money to Ireland. It is said that Ireland is too heavily taxed, and that we are not too liberal in dealing with her in regard to money questions. Upon that matter I express no opinion, although considerable countenance has been given by eminent authorities in this island and in this House to the contention of Irish Members on that point. It is not because we grudge the money, but because we say that it is wastefully, improperly, and mischievously spent. Referring to the Debate which occurred in 1877, I find that it is somewhat difficult to separate the expenditure upon the staff of the Court from the salaries of the Judges, although the salaries themselves do not come upon the Vote, but upon the Consolidated Fund. In the Debate of 1877 the two subjects were a great deal mixed up together, and I find that, on it is for the sake of purchasing peace that we pay out of the purse of this country £100,000 a year, instead of £50,000, to provide for the legal establishments of Ireland. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £50,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That this Vote be reduced by £50,000.”
 —(Mr. Donald Crawford.)

(12.50.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Member has complained of the excessive amount of the establishment charges for the administration of the law in Ireland, and he went on to say that it was a species of bribery employed by the English Government for the purpose of purchasing peace. Now, I take it that if the cost of the establishment is great in proportion to the population of the country it is due to the fact that the establishment and the number of Judges are in excess of what is required in England. I believe it is admitted that the Irish Judicature is over-manned; but the present Government take credit to themselves for having done something to improve that state of things, and a Bill was introduced into this House by myself with that object. I think that the proper way to reduce the amount of the establishment charges is to reduce the number of Courts, or the number of Judges, but to cut down the charges without economising the duties would be to put the cart before the horse. The hon. Gentleman says that the expenditure is maintained as a species of bribery on the part of the Government; but he must be aware that the legal system of Ireland is not administered by the Chief Secretary or by the Lord Lieutenant, but that it rests entirely in the hands of the Judges, and devolves upon the Executive Government. It, therefore, cannot be regarded in any shape as bribery in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. I am given to understand that since the Judicature Act was passed, in 1877, the total amount of this Vote has only been increased by something like £300. How far it may be possible to reduce the number of Judges I am unable to say. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details to be able to give any information to the House. I am satisfied, however, that the Lord Chancellor and the other Judges will do their best to comply with the wishes of the hon. Gentleman, and see that the work is carried on with due regard to economy.

(12.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I raise no objection to the amount of this Vote. I never care a brass farthing what it costs England to govern Ireland. In my opinion the more the merrier; but I would support any proposition to cut down the expenditure incurred in the administration of law in Ireland, provided that the sum saved were appropriated to some useful Irish purpose. That is the position I take up in regard to all of these proposed retrenchments. Give us the money for education, and you may cut off as many Judges and their salaries in these bloated and inflated establishments as you please. But so far as effecting economy is concerned, I confess that it does not wring my heart to find that the cost of governing Ireland is three or four times what that of governing Scotland is. Perhaps I may be allowed to call attention to instances which have occurred in connection with this Vote of pure jobbery. The Act of 1877 abolished the office of Receiver Master, and thereby effected a saving of something like £1,200 or £1,500 a year. The office was abolished in express terms; but, nevertheless, I find in this Vote a sum of £200 for the travelling expenses of the Receiver Master, Mr. Edmund Murphy. This seems to have been done by collusion with the Treasury, or by some occult arrangement which I am unable to understand, and it also seems that a salary of £1,000 is paid by stamps. The Receiver Master is getting a round sum of £1,000, and if we ask what the effect of the arrangement is we are told that there has been great economy, and that the entire sum is now paid by stamps. Mr. Edmund Murphy figures in the Vote, at page 275, for an additional sum of £200 for travelling expenses. Well, what does he travel for?

THE CHAIRMAN: The salary of £1,000 for the Chief Receiver is in the Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It always happens, Mr. Courtney, that you know more about these Votes than anybody else.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The fact is that the items did not appear in the Vote last year.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Was the Chief Receiver without a salary last year?

Mr. MADDEN: No; but he had only just been appointed, and the Estimates did not include his salary.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Then Mr. Murphy's salary is in the Vote this year, and £200 in addition figures as his travelling expenses, yet we are told by Statute that the office has been abolished. Has it been created over again by the Judges by a rule?

Mr. MADDEN: He is not Receiver Master.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: No; that is the trick. He is now "Chief Receiver." A job by any other name is quite as odious. This Chief Receivership has been invented in the interests of the landlords. A large number of estates in Ireland are under the control of the Court of Chancery, and if you do not pay your rent to that Court you are immediately put in gaol. If you cut a piece of bog on an estate in Chancery that also is contempt of Court, involving imprisonment, and I believe that at this very moment there is a poor woman who has now been in gaol for two years, because of some little act of trespass for which she could not have been punished by imprisonment if the case had gone before Petty Sessions. This office had been invented for the purpose of prostituting the Irish judicial system, and I should advise landlords like Mr. Smith-Barry to file a bogus petition for sale, and thus get placed at their disposal all the resources of the Court of Chancery. Mr. Edmund Murphy is, in addition, employed as a perambulating auctioneer in the interests of landlords, and he gets £200 a year for that. This same gentleman was described by the Bishop of Limerick, when he was sent down to the Glensharrold Estate, where the Plan of Campaign was in operation, as "a man in the deepest sympathy with the Irish tenantry." It was suggested that he held even the scales of justice. He has, too, been employed by the Board of Works in connection with a light railway scheme in Donegal, and he was so employed in the interests of Messrs. Barton and Price. In fact, up springs Chief Receiver

Murphy everywhere like a Jack in the box. While he is supposed to be sitting among the cobwebs in his office in Dublin he is strangely enough found jumping up among the daisies in the country. He is in the habit of giving evidence before the Land Courts, and when we ask why he is not attending to his duties in Dublin we are told that he is only giving evidence in cases where he valued the farm prior to his appointment; that he condescends to go down to illuminate the Courts with his evidence. It is, I say, a prostitution of his position; the idea of a man in Government pay acting in this way as the bottle washer of the landlords! The fact is, he has made himself so useful to the landlords that he has been rewarded with this Receivership, which has been invented for his benefit, and an old office, which was distinctly abolished by statute, has been revived in his behalf. This, I say, is a scandal, and if it can be done in the case of Mr. Murphy, why should it not be done in the case of every parish officer in Ireland? Then there is the job connected with the Supreme Court of Judicature. You put a tax on the subject in the shape of Stamp Duty, and with the proceeds revive an abolished office, and then, forsooth, you put forward the plea that the office costs the Exchequer nothing because the salary is paid for by stamps. Why, no end of jobbery could take place under those circumstances; it opens up endless avenues and vistas of corruption. It is proposed under the Land Purchase Bill of the Government to consolidate the office of the Land Judges with the office of the Land Commission. Will any retrenchment be achieved thereby? We shall hear, no doubt, of the reduction of staff and of clerkships; but Mr. Murphy will not go. The Land Judges Court was able to do without him for 12 or 13 years; indeed, since 1885 (I believe that is the date) the duties of Receiver Judge have been discharged by the Bankruptcy Judge, Judge Boyd. Lord Ashbourne slipped into his Bill after it had left this House a proviso relieving the existing Land Judges of some of the Receiver's duties and providing for their discharge by the Bankruptcy Judge. Judge Boyd has ever since discharged these duties, but at last he began to kick, because he found that the salaries of the Bankruptcy Judges were the only Judges' salaries which appeared on these Votes, and not upon the Consolidated Fund. Will it be believed that it is proposed in the Land Purchase Bill of the Government to place the £3,000 a year salaries of the Land Commissioners on the Consolidated Fund? Will it be believed it is proposed to remove them from this Vote while the salaries of the superior Judges are still to remain open to discussion every year? The whole thing savours of jobbery. The Government owe the House an explanation on this point. Mr. Edmund Murphy may be, from the point of view of the Bishop of Limerick, an excellent judge of land, and it may be right and proper that he should be sent down to the Glensharrold estate; but I say that as the Court of Chancery have managed to do without the office ever since the abolition of the Receivers Mastership, it is not right to invent a tax on the subject in the shape of Stamp Duty in order to give Mr. Murphy £1,000 a year. That is a little too strong. Now I come to the charges for Election Petitions. There have been very few Election Petitions in Ireland for the last 12 or 13 years, and since 1886 there have been none at all. In that year there were two—one in Derry, and the other in West Belfast. Yet will it be credited that on every years' Votes there have been charges under this head? I think that this is a great scandal. Last night we passed a Vote containing a charge of fees for Counsel and other Law Officers for conducting Election Petitions, and in to-day's Votes we find provision for two salaries for clerks and other officials in connection with the trial of Election Petitions. Is not this a scandal? Where is your Treasury spy, the Remembrancer, who is daily to be seen sniffing round the Four Courts seeking whom he may devour? You employ Mr. Holmes to see what offices can be curtailed, but he has most remarkable eyes, for he only sees it possible to curtail offices which are held by Nationalists or their sympathisers. Why, some of the most egregious jobs are committed in connection with his own office; yet he winks and connives at them. And this is done by the gentleman who has for the time being charge of the conscience of the Treasury. Although we Irishmen are looked upon as a miserable, wretched, selfish, priestridden people wanting education, I do sometimes think that we could run the Government of our own country in a better way than this, and if we started an Irish Government tomorrow we probably should do away with some of these salaries paid for Election Petitions, which are not heard. Of course, it must always be remembered that we Irishmen are enjoying the fruits and privileges of the British Constitution; that we live under the flag of the Army, the Navy, and the Volunteers; and that we ought to bow our heads accordingly. The only other point I wish to deal with is the Registry of Deeds Office. This is one of the best offices in Ireland, the men in it work like blacks, and perform some of the most useful functions known to any department, and the consequence is that because there are a few Nationalists on the staff the Treasury Remembrancer has taken it into his head to suggest a reduction of the staff. The men in the office have been slaving from morning till night trying to get off the arrears of work. The office is the most important one in the country, yet the Treasury Remembrancer wishes to starve it because a few Catholics are employed there. And does the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury denounce that action? Oh, no. He approves it. And what is the result? A word from the Treasury Bench against an official in Ireland is like a sirocco. It is read in the newspapers by every member of the Castle gang, and the official is at once spoken of as having a black mark against his name. I challenge the Attorney General for Ireland to say that he has any sympathy with this proposed retrenchment. He will not, because he knows a good deal more about the work of this office than any other man in the country. He would protest against the conduct of the Treasury, but he knows that the Government do not care about his opinions on this matter; they prefer to adopt the view of Mr. Holmes. Would it not be as well to increase the staff of this office and use the salaries now paid for Election Petitions for the benefit of the most deserving office in the entire administration of the country? I warn the Government that when the Land Purchase Bill comes under discussion next year we intend to raise the question of placing the salaries of the Land Commission Judges in the Consolidated Fund, and also the way in which the Banking Judges are being treated. We shall also discuss the appointment of Mr. Edmund Murphy.

*(12.6.) MR. MADDEN: I am bound to admit that the hon. and learned Gentleman has called attention to several matters which are deserving of the serious attention of the Government, inasmuch as they are so closely connected with branches of the Public Service in Ireland. There are two points in which I take especial interest, namely, those connected with the Registry of Deeds Office and the appointment of Mr. Edmund Murphy as Chief Receiver. The appointment of Mr. Murphy as Chief Receiver was assailed as a job on the part of the Treasury and of the Judge. I think I can satisfy the Committee, in a very few words, that there never was any appointment less open to such an imputation. There are two circumstances which are worthy of consideration. One is that the salary of that gentleman will not cost the taxpayers a single shilling, because it will fall upon the cost of administering the estates in Court, and will, therefore, come out of the pockets of the persons interested in the estates. But that is not all. The appointment of this gentleman will effect the saving of something like £10,000 a year in the administration of the estates. Considerable abuse existed prior to the coming into force of the new arrangement. The number of estates administered by the Court had risen from 565 in 1880 to 1,320 in 1887. It is not for me, on this occasion, to discuss the causes which led up to that circumstance, but what I do wish to point out is that the management of the estates under the old system was exceedingly expensive. It was necessary to make application to the Judge to sanction anything involving an expenditure of money, and, consequently, applications were made for power to paint walls or to repair roofs. The very able Judge who now presides over the Land Court, seeing the enormous waste of money which that involved, suggested to the Lord Chancellor and to the Treasury that it might be avoided if a gentleman of admittedly great experience in such matters were temporarily appointed, not to act as Judge or as Receiver Master, but rather to act as Chief Receiver. That gentleman's appointment has not cost the taxpayer a single sixpence. The salary is provided by the imposition of an additional charge of £1 when the Receiver's accounts are passed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Under what Statute?

*MR. MADDEN: Under the Judicature Act and Landed Estates Act. I can satisfy the hon. and learned Gentleman that the charge is perfectly legal, but my desire at this moment is to show that the appointment of Mr. Murphy has effected a great saving in the cost of administering estates. It was, indeed, estimated originally that a saving of £10,000 a year would be effected if that salary of £1,000 a year were paid, and I think I am justified in saying that the actual saving has been considerably in excess of that amount.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why does the item appear in the Estimates as only a temporary appointment if it is such a valuable one?

*MR. MADDEN: The reason is that Mr. Murphy is not a member of the permanent Civil Service, and the existing arrangement may be terminated at any moment if it is found the results do not prove as beneficial as is expected. Mr. Murphy's services can be discontinued at any time, and he will not be entitled either to compensation for the termination of the engagement or to a superannuation allowance. With regard to the complaint made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Longford as to the charges in the Estimates for Election Petitions, I may point out that it is necessary in the Estimates to provide for all contingencies, but that when the Appropriation Accounts are examined it will be found that where there had been no Election Petitions the money had not been expended. Finally, as to the complaints raised with regard to the treatment of the staff of the Registry of Deeds Office in Dublin, I desire to place on record my appreciation of the admirable manner in which the duties of that office have been performed. I have had the whole question long before me. Twenty-two years ago I published a book on the subject of the registry of deeds. I was also 12 years ago a member of the Commission which inquired into the subject, and as such member it was my duty to inquire into all the details of the office. I was greatly impressed with the admirable manner in which the duties were performed and the office administered. I may say that I have this year introduced a Bill consolidating and amending the laws relating to the office, and I hope that it will find favour with the House. With regard to the complaints of the hon. Member as to the position and treatment of the staff, this is not a matter within my province, but I feel quite sure that they are now quite safe in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, and are not likely in any way to receive other than fair treatment.

(1.40.) MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I desire to say a few words with reference to another Department, and to point out where economies which might have been effected have not been carried out. I believe that in the whole range of the Judicial and Civil Services in Ireland there is no Department in which abuses in the shape of over-manning the staff are so rife as in the case of the Irish Bankruptcy Court. Long before the Act was passed, which gave special Courts to Belfast and Cork, the business in the Dublin Court had been gradually and continually decreasing, and now things have come to such a pass that there is now not sufficient business for one Judge, instead of the two which you have there, each with a separate staff. One would have thought that when the Local Bankruptcy Courts were established the Government would have transferred the redundant staff from Dublin to those Courts, and thus have secured those economies to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. But that was not done. I have moved for and obtained two Returns, which afford some valuable information on this matter, and they lead me to the conclusion that only one Judge is necessary, and that the offices of one Judge, one Registrar, one chief officer, one Deputy Registrar, and a first clerk might be abolished, and a saving of £5,000 a year effected. What is done under the present system? Why, the Receivers have to resort to expedients in order to make business, and one of these expedients is the continual adjournment of cases, a process which heaps costs upon costs on the poor debtor and his unfortunate creditors. I am told that the Judges scarcely ever refuse an application for adjournment, simply because it gives an excuse for an additional sitting. Since the establishment of Local Courts in Cork and Belfast one would have thought that the Dublin Court would not have dealt with cases coming from those districts, but, as a fact, whenever Petitions from those districts are filed in the Dublin Court, the Judges, instead of adopting a common-sense view, and remitting the cases to the Local Courts, they deal with them themselves. Bankrupts in the Cork and Belfast districts know that if they can get their cases taken to Dublin they can get through the Courts more easily, because creditors will not take the trouble and expense to go to Dublin and to have their affairs thoroughly investigated. Now, this can only lead to an increase in the number of fraudulent bankruptcies and of "runaway" bankrupts. I think Ireland should be divided into three districts, and that the Judges should confine themselves to cases belonging to their own districts. The Deeds of Arrangement Act, which will come into force next November, will still further tend to decrease the business. What do the Returns which I have obtained show? In 1879 the number of Petitions for arrangement was 945; in 1889 it was only 323. In the same years the numbers of cases tried were respectively 9,448 and 4,284. Thus the business has fallen off two-thirds in 10 years. Yet the same two Judges and the same staff, costing altogether £10,000 a year, are retained to do one-third of the work they did in 1879. The lists of cases at present are mainly swelled by the Judges assenting to almost every application made for adjournments. Ten years ago the Judges sat, on an average, five or six hours a day on three days a week: now the average sittings are two hours a day on two days a week; and half of that time they have little else to do than allow trivial talk and unnecessary argument to go on. In fact, they have no work to do. It is a monstrous thing that the country has to pay £10,000 a year, when at the utmost £5,000 is sufficient. I have put a notice on the Paper of an Amendment to reduce the vote by £5,000, but I will not move the Amendment, as a reduction has already been moved.

(150.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I desire to call the attention of the Committee to a matter arising out of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire. The Chief Secretary has practically admitted that the charges for the Supreme Court in Dublin are excessive, and that it is due to the fact that the Judges are more numerous than they ought to be, and that if a reduction could be made in the staff of Judges there could be a corresponding reduction in the establishment charges. Now, last autumn an opportunity occurred for effecting an enormous economy in this respect. A vacancy occurred in the office of Chief Justice in Ireland in consequence of the appointment of Lord Chief Justice Morris to the post of Law Lord in the House of Lords. A chance was thus given of amalgamating the Court of Exchequer with the other Courts in accordance with the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1887. In the year 1887 there was a vacancy in the post of Chief Justice of the High Court, and, at that time, the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Exchequer existed as separate Courts, and advantage was taken of that vacancy to promote Lord Justice Morris of the Common Pleas, to the post of Lord Chief Justice in Ireland. In 1887 an Act was passed by the now President of the Board of Trade, who was then Chief Secretary for Ireland, abolishing the post of Lord Justice of Common Pleas and amalgamating that Court with the Supreme Court. An immense economy resulted from the adoption of that course. The Act also provided that whenever a vacancy occurred in the post of Chief Baron the office should be abolished and the staff of the Court should be amalgamated with that of the Supreme Court. Now, last autumn an economy might have been effected by transferring the Chief Baron to the post of Chief Justice. There was an opportunity of effecting a very great economy. An economy had been effected by the amalgamation of the two judgeships of £6,000 a year, and another economy of £4,000 in the case of the Chief Baron—altogether an economy of £10,000. Although I cannot, according to your ruling, Sir, criticise the fact that the Chief Baron was not appointed to the post of Chief Justice, I cannot but express regret that this opportunity was not availed of by the Government of effecting a very great economy, which, in accordance with the general view of the Act of Parliament to which I have referred, was effected in 1889, on the vacancy of the post of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and very much to the benefit of the Public Service. And I say that the same economy could have been effected if a different course had been pursued on this occasion, although it is not open to me to criticise the appointment of the Chief Baron.

*(2.2.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I only wish to refer, on this Vote, to the question of the bankruptcy administration in Belfast, and I deprecate my right hon. and learned Friend giving me any answer until he has had opportunity for reflection in the recess. The mercantile community in Belfast and neighbourhood are at the present moment entirely dissatisfied with the administration of the Local Bankruptcy Act. The hon. Member for West Belfast introduced a Bill for the purpose of enlarging the scope of the Local Bankruptcy Jurisdiction of Belfast, and the Bill was backed by hon. Members sitting on this side of the House. The Government were unable to accede to a Bill promoted by private Members on this subject, but I trust Her Majesty's Government will consider this matter more carefully, and that they will see it is absolutely necessary in order to make the Local Bankruptcy administration effective in the most important mercantile and industrial community in Ireland, that the object of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Belfast should be acceded to. I know that there are several reasons which can be given against enlarging the bankruptcy jurisdiction in Belfast, though I cannot see any valid reasons except from the bankruptcy officials' point of view. If I had any connection with the Dublin Bankruptcy Court, if I were a practitioner before the Court in either branch of the profession, I should certainly resist with the utmost strenuousness any attempt to extend the bankruptcy jurisdiction in Belfast. I hope the Government will not consider suggestions made in the interests of these officials. I trust that my right hon. and learned Friend will take this question into consideration before the next meeting of Parliament, and I earnestly hope that, in the interests of the mercantile and industrial community, the Government will see fit themselves to introduce a Bill for the purpose of making the Local Bankruptcy Act effective both to Belfast and Cork. The only other observation I have to make on the Vote is this. I cannot help feeling that the Courts in Dublin are over-weighted at the present moment. There are more Judges in Ireland than there is work for them to do. I do not go so far as hon. Members opposite, but I cannot help feeling that the Judicial Bench in Ireland is overmanned. If you compare it with the Judicial Bench in England, you cannot resist that conclusion. I hope that on the first convenient opportunity the Government will endeavour to effect a reduction of the expenditure on the High Courts of Judicature in Ireland. I know that all political parties in Ireland view such a reduction with favour, and they expect that the Government will undertake it. I trust when the favourable moment arrives that the Chief Secretary will accede to the general wish of the Irish community.

(2.10.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The hon. Member has said that all political Parties are in favour of this reduction. It is the first time we have heard any utterance from his Party.

MR. MACARTNEY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Member, but he has perhaps not read the speeches of my hon. Friends.

MR. DILLON: I confess I am not acquainted with that literature. I know that we on this side of the House have drawn attention, year after year, to these monstrous charges. No other word adequately describes them. I am glad to see that better councils are prevailing among the Party opposite. I rejoice to see that the Conservative Party in Ireland are at last awaking to the monstrous waste of money going on in this establishment. I shall await with considerable interest what the Government have to say on this matter. I noticed that the hon. Member for South Antrim said when a convenient opportunity arises. Will that be when the Irish people are reconciled to the Government, and do not need to be bribed?

MR. MACARTNEY: I said when an opportunity arises.

MR. DILLON: I think we are entitled to know from the hon. Member and his friends when that convenient moment may be expected. I want to know on what ground reform is to be postponed. I say the Government were bound, after the declaration of the hon. Gentleman as to the gross waste of public money upon a bloated establishment, to put a stop to this waste. On what ground can the Government resist this unanimous desire of the people of Ireland for reform? They must adopt either of two courses. They must either say they differ from the unanimous expression of opinion, or they are bound to bring forward the grounds on which they refuse to save the public money. They are bound before this Vote is passed to justify their conduct. Allow me for a few moments to direct the attention of the House to the nature of the abuse. I have travelled a very great deal in the English speaking world. I have seen Judges dealing with business infinitely more important in the colonies than ever comes before a Dublin Judge. I have seen Judges of the highest intellectual ability in New South Wales and Victoria, discharging their duties for a salary of £300 a year. When we remember the facts that the leaders of the Bar—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is entering on a branch of the subject outside the Vote. The salaries of the Judges are charged on the Consolidated Account.

MR. DILLON: Is there any Vote on which we can discuss the cost of the Judges to the State?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no opportunity of discussing the salaries of the Judges on the question of the expenses of the Establishment.

MR. DILLON: I do not propose to go into the question of the Establishment at present, because the point I wished to draw attention to was that of the salaries of the Judges. As that is ruled out of order I will not continue my observations.

(2.14.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I desire to call attention once more to the Registry of Deeds Office, in regard to which I think the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman is not at all satisfactory.

*MR. MADDEN: I made no answer so far as the staff of the Office of Registry is concerned. This is a matter for the Treasury. I said that I had no doubt that the Treasury would deal fairly with the office.

MR. CLANCY: The history of the matter is this. This office, which was one of very great importance and rather popular with the Irish public, discharged very useful and necessary functions, which have become still more necessary. The office has been the subject of several public inquiries. In 1866 a Commission was appointed by the English Treasury to inquire into this Department, and it reported favourably upon it, recommending certain changes, which, when carried out, added to the efficiency of the Department. In 1874 another Commission was appointed, and it reported favourably on the manner in which the work was being done. It recommended certain changes increasing the value of the Department, and these were carried out. In 1881 the Commission, of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a member, presented their second Report, a copy of which I hold in my hand. I should like to draw attention to two or three of their recommendations. The first of these was with regard to the character of the clerks to be employed in the Office of the Registry, and the Commissioners say that it is necessary to employ a superior staff of clerks, and that they should have every possible inducement to remain permanently in the office, inasmuch as it takes many years of continued training to fit a clerk for the discharge of the higher duties of the office. They added that if the then rate of increase in the work of the office should continue, it would be necessary to add to the number of the clerks. Well, instead of a proportionate increase, such as the Commission recommended, although the business of the Department has doubled during the last 25 years, the number of the staff has been reduced from 66 down to 45, with the result that, so far as the promotion of the clerks is concerned, that has been stopped. The Commissioners stated on this point that, inasmuch as the Department requires a superior class of clerks, the question of promotion was one that deserved attention. But the promotion has stopped, and there is now no promotion, and, as a result of all this, the solicitors are loud in their complaints as to the block of business which has occurred in the office. Another recommendation made by the Commission was with regard to the searching room. That is the room in which the public are allowed to search for deeds, &c., and in reference to this the Commissioners say that they are of opinion that the accommodation afforded by the present building is wholly inadequate for the work that has to be done in connection with the office, and that the accommodation ought to be largely increased. I am informed that the business of this Department has so increased up to the present time that the room is inconveniently crowded, and yet nothing is done to carry out the recommendation of the Committee. Turning to another part of their Report the Commissioners stated that the office ought not to be a source of Imperial revenue at all; that it was clear from the language of the section relating to this matter that the fees were never intended to be applied to the Imperial Revenue, but to be used for the benefit of persons having business in connection with the office, and for the maintenance of an efficient office and staff. They also say that over £40,000 a year had been received by the Treasury on account of fees between 1832 and 1864, and that while that was accumulating the Revenue derived from the office Stamp Duties yielded a large profit, the exact amount of which cannot be ascertained. That is to say, if I understand the Report aright, this large sum of £40,000 has been abstracted illegally from the uses of the office in Dublin, and applied to the purposes of the English Treasury, to which it was never intended to be applied at all. I may be stupid, but that is the meaning I place on this statement, and if I am not correct I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman will set me right. The Committee added that the entire Revenue derived from duty stamps, as well as fee stamps, appeared from the evidence before them to have been at all times sufficient to balance the expenditure, and as they were of opinion that the Revenue derived from the duty stamps as well as the fee stamps should be exclusively expended on the maintenance of the office, they did not consider that it should be applied by the Treasury to Treasury purposes. I should advise the right hon. and learned Gentleman to carry out the recommendation to which he has put his signature, and yet if we were to ask for anything like £40,000 for improving the office in Dublin we should be told that we proposed to dip our hands into the pockets of the British taxpayers. That £40,000, as I have shown, was never intended for the use of the English Treasury, and I contend that it is due to us at the present moment for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of the Committee. It is probable that the right hon. and learned Gentleman who signed that Report will shortly tell us the reasons he now sees for dissenting from it; but if he cannot do that I know what the Secretary to the Treasury will say. He will remind us that the English Treasury appointed another Committee of Inquiry, and a very curious body it was. All of our Commissions—Lord Percy's Commission and the Commission of 1878—were composed of independent gentlemen; but the last body appointed to inquire into matters relating to this office was composed of three Treasury clerks and a Mr. Williams, an English gentleman whom the Government thought it necessary to send over to Ireland, under the notion that they could not get on without they had an Englishman to assist them.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): That gentleman was sent over because of his special experience in connection with the Yorkshire Registry.

MR. CLANCY: I think it was a bad compliment to pay to his Colleagues to bring over from England a gentleman who was to instruct the Attorney General and several of the Judges as to what ought to be done in Ireland. This is how matters are managed in Ireland, and helps to explain why it is that things are so rotten there. I suppose Mr. Williams was appointed because the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson) comes from Yorkshire himself.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): "Yorkshire relish."

MR. CLANCY: My hon. Friend suggests that it was a case of "Yorkshire relish." But Mr. Williams, who is connected with the Registry of Tithes in Yorkshire, is sent over to instruct all these gentlemen. For my part, I regard this part of the business as an insult offered to the Royal Commission by the Government. At any rate, this body was sent over and did just what the Treasury wanted. They desired the Commission to report against all the recommendations of the Commission of 1881, and this they did. They said, for instance, that the staff should be brought down to 45, it has been brought down from 66 to that number, although the business of the office has doubled during the last 25 years. Again, they studiously avoided any allusion to the recommendation of the previous Commission that the £40,000 was illegally abstracted from the Office Returns, and they said the fees were not sufficient to support the office, which is an untruth, because the duty stamps, of which the Royal Commission have made much, amount to about £40,500 a year.

MR. JACKSON: They do not amount to that now.

MR. CLANCY: When did they cease to amount to that sum? It will not do to put us off with a denial like that. I have got my information on very good authority, and I assert that if the fees have not amounted to that sum the falling off has been of very recent date indeed. I claim—and here I ask the sympathy of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury—that this office should be kept up even if it is not self-supporting. The matter is one, I will not say of Imperial concern, but in regard to Ireland is a matter of National concern. I hold that you are bound in the public interest to keep up an office of this sort, even if you never get a penny in fees from it. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman will object to that statement. This worthy quartette—including the gentleman from Yorkshire—did carry out one recommendation of the Royal Commission, that is to say, they joined the third class clerks to the second class, and thereby improved the position of the juniors; but in doing that they abolished some of the higher positions, thereby seriously retarding promotion, in spite of the recommendations of the Royal Commission that the clerks in the office should be taught to look to promotion in the office as their only reward. Promotion was retarded, and the efficiency of the office was thereby damaged. It is nothing to me whether these clerks are promoted or not—I do not know any of them, and I am only interested in the efficiency of the Service. The matter is a comparatively small one ; but I maintain that the reduction of the staff from 66 to 45 or 44, notwithstanding that the business has doubled within the last 25 years, has tended to a block in the Dublin office which is very injurious to the public interest. I have to complain of one thing more, and that is, that the head of the office made a reply to the last Commission I have referred to, and that that reply has never yet been published. I want to know why it has not been published. Is it a confidential document, and, if so, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether any such document has ever before been regarded as confidential? Is not the real reason for the non-publication of this document that the Registrar replied to the statement and recommendation of the last Commission, and gave the clearest reasons why they should not be adopted. If that is not the reason the right hon. Gentleman should say so; if it is I say that gross injustice has been done to the Registrar, and the sooner it is redressed the better.

No reply being given,

MR. CLANCY (rising again) : I think the right hon. Gentleman is bound to make some reply to the statement I have made.

(2.35.) MR. JACKSON : I trust the hon. Member will not allow himself to become excited on this matter. I, at the moment, did not observe that he had finished his observations. I have no desire to refrain from answering, shortly, the hon. Member's charges. In the first place, as to calling in the Yorkshire Registrar to serve on the Commission, that was before my time, and I had nothing to do with it. I suppose that Mr. Williams was sent over because he was acquainted with the working of an office of a similar kind. With regard to the answer of the Registrar it is not usual to publish documents which are departmental. The hon. Member says that there were in former years fees on Stamp Duties levied in excess of the requirements of the office—

MR. CLANCY : Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the reply of the Registrar confirmed or disputed the recommendations of the Commission?

MR. JACKSON : It would be extremely inconvenient for me to say what the Report contains, because that would be the same thing as presenting it to Parliament. I may say, however, what I think is much more to the point, that I have been endeavouring quite recently—as I have stated in reply to a question put to me in the House—to ascertain where the block of business exists, and what inconvenience has been occasioned, because I admit at once that in an office of the kind the interest of those who have business with it ought to be first considered, and I hope before the end of the year arrangements will be made by which, if all the arrears will not be quite overcome, matters will be greatly improved. I sent over to Dublin a person who has had experience in an office of this kind, and he has, in conjunction with the Registrar, come to a conclusion as to the course to be taken, which I believe will be found to remove all the block and pressure which now exists. I take it that the only object the hon. Member has in calling attention to the office is his natural desire that the business of the office should not suffer. In that I am heartily with him, and, as I say, arrangements have been made by which satisfactory progress will be made with the work. The accommodation in the office was rather insufficient, and I understand that it is proposed to remove to another office in Dublin some of the work which has to be performed. The seven hours' system is to be applied to the clerks in this office; and I hope the Committee will accept these statements in proof of the fact that this office is not being neglected. I say, as I have always said, that the office ought to be sufficient to meet the requirements of all those concerned, and that I shall not be satisfied until it is. I am assured that arrangements are being made whereby it is hoped that deeds lodged on a particular day will be entered on the same day, or the day following. I have much pleasure in assuring the Committee that the Registrar and the Treasury are thoroughly in accord, and are working together, with a view to the efficiency of the Department.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do you withdraw your attack on the Registrar?

MR. JACKSON: I certainly do so if I have made any. I am sorry that anything I have said should be taken by him in that light.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not know that it has. I am not acquainted with him.

MR. CLANCY: What about the £40,000?

MR. JACKSON: As to the £40,000, it is a long way to go back to 1864. Of course the money was paid into the Exchequer, and formed part of the income of the year.

(2.48.) MR. CLANCY: I must say that of the many ways in which Ireland has been robbed since the Union this is one of the meanest. Fees which should be applied to the use of the office have been diverted to the use of the Treasury. Every Secretary to the Treasury whom I know has either perpetrated, or joined in perpetrating, frauds of this kind. (2.50.)

(3.5.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Many grievances connected with the Vote have been referred to by my hon. Friends, and I have no doubt that some good will accrue from the discussion. I have no doubt that some effort will be made in the dim and distant future to rectify the evils that at present prevail. One statement was made by an hon. Friend of mine which I wish to emphasise, and that is the statement with regard to the Bankruptcy Court. I find that, although two Bankruptcy Courts, with full staffs, have been set up in Ireland, there has only been a decrease between 1889-90 and 1890-91 of £93. There has only been this decrease, notwithstanding that the business of the Central Bankruptcy Court has, in the last 10 years, decreased by two-thirds. While the Attorney General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary referred to some of the more glaring anomalies under the present system, they have not referred in the slightest degree to the statement made by my hon. Friend regarding the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin. These anomalies form a scandalous state of things, which ought to be looked into; at all events, it deserves the notice of Ministers of the Crown. I trust that before the Debate closes we shall have some assurance that the salaries of the staff of the Court will be revised; that the cost of maintaining the Court will be brought to an amount reasonably proportionate to the amount of business done in the Court. I think we owe to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wick a debt of gratitude for having exposed the anomalies of the present system. The hon. Gentleman has pointed out the enormous cost of the Supreme Court in Ireland as compared with that of the Supreme Court in England and Scotland. This disproportion is all the more glaring when we know that although the Irish people may be naturally litigious, as I believe they are supposed to be; they are, as a body, too poor to indulge in legal proceedings. We find, from the figures of the hon. Member for Wick, that the cost of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland is one-fourth of the cost of the Supreme Court in England. Ireland, a poor country, has legal establishments imposed upon it costing one-fourth as much as similar establishments in England, where there is 10 times the population, and where the people are sufficiently rich to indulge in the luxury of the law. That is an anomalous state of things. But it is not so anomalous as a comparison between Scotland and Ireland affords. The hon. Member for Wick pointed out that the cost under this head in Ireland is four times the cost under a like head in Scotland. There is not any great disparity between the populations of Scotland and Ireland. They are very nearly the same, or they are becoming more approximate to each other every day—the population of Scotland is becoming greater and that of Ireland is becoming less. Although this is so, we have this anomalous state of things: that the cost of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland is four times greater than that in Scotland. Not only are the populations becoming approximate, but the population of Scotland is much wealthier than that of Ireland. Every day in Scotland there are large transactions of a commercial character; there are manufacturers and mining operations; there is a state of things existing in Scotland that calls for the interference of the law, that necessitates the pleading of cases before the Superior Courts in Scotland. There are not the same occasions for the interventions of the Courts in Ireland. Why do I desire to emphasise these facts? Because I am convinced it is high time there should be retrenchment in this particular. It is a matter of great moment to us that this retrenchment should take place as soon as possible. I believe we are on the eve of great and important changes with regard to the Local Government of Ireland. Both sides of the House seem to be agreed that a change in this respect must soon take place. One great Party in the State believes that a large measure of National Self-Government should be bestowed on the people; another of the great Parties say that a large measure of Local Self-Government should be given to Ireland. Whether the settlement will take place according to one system or the other, whatever Government is called into existence in Ireland, must necessarily place before itself the task of cutting down the legal expenses of Ireland. The moment we in Ireland apply ourselves to this great and important work, what will be one of the great necessities of the case? If we are to discharge a great number of those who are at present engaged in the overmanned legal establishments in Ireland, it will be necessary to place them upon the country as pensioners, or otherwise we should be charged with doing injustice to the Civil servants of the country. I have no doubt the Irish people will do the Civil servants justice for their own sake, but it is time that a beginning was made in the direction of retrenchment. We do not want to go back to Ireland and have saddled upon our shoulders all these bloated establishments the growth of years and years of bribery and corruption and unfair dealing towards the people of Ireland. Both the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland have evaded the large and important issues raised by the hon. Member for Wick. It is the habit of the Government to evade great issues brought before them and to hinge their speeches upon comparatively small issues, raised with regard to individuals. I wish to emphasise what the hon. Member for Wick brought before the Committee. There is a great burden on the people of Ireland with respect to the administration of the law, and I trust before this Vote is taken the Government will give some assurance that they will look into the great and important issues raised, and that before long an honest effort will be made to meet the demand of the poverty-stricken people of Ireland for justice and fair-play.

Vote agreed to.

2. 80,687, to complete the sum for the Irish Land Commission.

(3.22.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I think we may fairly argue that it would have been true economy on the part of the Treasury to have increased this Vote considerably, in order that the work of revising rents in Ireland might have been proceeded with at something like a satisfactory rate of progress. The last Land Act, passed presumably for the benefit of Irish tenants suffering under rack-rents, has now been three years in operation, and a large majority of tenants have been unable to take advantage of it owing to the fact that an insufficient number of Assistant Commissioners have been appointed. Owing to the undermanning of the Commission, a large number of tenants who sought relief under the Act of 1887 were debarred from getting any, because the landlord came down upon them, served them with notices under the 7th section of the Act, and thereby cut them off from all relief. They have lost all interest in their holdings, and many of them are now in the position of caretakers. On the general subject of the Land Commission, we have very great complaints to make. If the tenants of Ireland have not obtained the relief which the Land Acts were intended to give them, it has been owing to the manner in which from first to last the Land Commission has been juggled with. The manner in which the Commission is being gradually packed in the interest of the landlords by partisans of, and sympathisers with, the Land Courts, is a glaring scandal. What is the good of this House providing for the appointment of Commissioners for the purpose of settling fair rents in Ireland if those who are appointed are biased strongly on one side or the other? It has excited very great suspicion in Ireland that one of three Commissioners, just on the eve of the promulgation of the last revision of judicial rents, resigned his post. True, he was not a strong man; but the circumstances of the resignation were such as to cause the gravest suspicion in Ireland. It is a very remarkable fact in connection with the revision of judicial rents in 1887 and 1888, that Mr. Justice O'Hagan dissented altogether from the manner in which the Commission had endeavoured to revise judicial rents. He did not come boldly forward to state his reasons for differing; but everybody in Ireland knew what they were, namely, that he could not agree with Commissioner Litton and Mr. Wrench for the absurd manner in which they approached the revision of judicial rents. They obtained Returns from the various Poor Law Unions as to the price of produce, without taking into account the yield of the produce. In the case of butter, for instance, they have said that when its price is high, owing to the comparative scarcity of the make, they must fix the revision of the judicial rents upon the basis of the high price, although the yield is small. Taking it all round, therefore, it has come to this: that in a year of actual scarcity and famine, when prices are naturally highest, the revision of judicial rents may be altogether against the tenant. It is desirable for us to hear the reason why the Commissioners proceeded on this ridiculous basis. There is a consensus of opinion that Justice O'Hagan resigned his post rather than share in the responsibility of putting this revision before the public. The suspicion is strengthened by the curious fact that the revision was made in 1890, although, according to the Statute, it should have been made in 1889. It is still an open question whether this does not invalidate the whole list. We want to know from those responsible for these things in Ireland why it is that County Court Judge Fitzgerald has been appointed on this Commission in the room of Justice O'Hagan. What proof of his fitness has he given? He was remarkable as a County Court Judge for the very severe manner in which he dealt with the Coercion Act cases that came before him. That was a characteristic that recommended him to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman before he was appointed a Commissioner.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Mr. FLYNN: Well, it is not necessary to follow this matter up, but there is a strong suspicion in Ireland that the Land Commission has been rigged, more or less, in the interests of the landlords, and that the Sub-Commissioners appointed from time to time are biased in exactly the same way. The dissatisfaction with the revised rents is more apparent in Ulster than in any other part of Ireland. Ulster is the only part of the country where meetings have been held and resolutions passed condemning the revised rents. There was a very important meeting of Ulster tenant farmers a short time ago to consider the recent order of the Land Commission. It was presided over by Mr. William Stewart, J.P. The resolutions were proposed by Mr. John M'Iderry, J.P., and Mr. John Browne, who pointed out that the Land Commission had proceeded on an entirely improper basis in the revision of judicial rents. The meeting resolved that "we hereby indignantly protest against this Schedule for the following reasons." The first of these reasons was that—

"The agricultural interest was being destroyed by the exaction of impossible rents, and the equitable clauses of the Act of 1887, as well as other similar clauses, were intended to arrest a crisis which threatened ruin and turmoil to the country."

The second was—

"That there has been no imprisonment in agricultural matters to justify such a wide difference between the Schedules of 1887 and 1888, and the Schedule of this year displays not only defective knowledge, but gross abuse of the powers conferred by the Act of 1887."

The third was, that it would have been well to have fixed the averages at about the same rate as those of last year. The fourth was—

"That while the reductions are unjust, inadequate, and reprehensible, we view with even more extreme dissatisfaction the increases in judicial rents, and are constrained to regard these increases as legalised robbery of the tenants' property, and utterly devoid of those moral sanctions which constitute the basis of satisfactory, social, and public contracts."

The fifth was—

"The repeal of the fair-rent section of the Act of 1881, in relation to the rents of 1885, is a violent and unwarrantable reversal of the policy of that Act, and calculated to re-kindle those popular passions which were coming under the sway of happier influences; and hence we cannot contemplate the repeal of the most salutary section of the Act, otherwise than as an actual blunder and a crime."

Now, these resolutions were passed by cool-headed farmers in the North of Ireland, and who would not denounce anything connected with the present Government for any consideration whatever. They have, however, been moved by the facts to pass a series of resolutions stronger than anything that has come from other parts of Ireland. In some parts of the country so deep is the dissatisfaction with the judicial rents fixed by some of the Sub-Commissioners that large numbers of tenants have withdrawn their cases from the Courts in a body. This is notably the case in Cork and Waterford, where the cases would be tried by Mr. Doyle. Mr. Doyle took part in the decisions on the Mitchelstown Estate. At one of those trials the tenants applauded their advocate's speech, and Mr. Doyle ordered the Court to be cleared, calling the tenants who had applauded a parcel of savages. I contend that if a man can show himself to be possessed of such a savage temper, and of a mind of so unjudicial a character as did Mr. Doyle on that occasion, he will carry some of his political bias into the cases he tries. The people prefer to rely upon such reductions as they can extort from the landlords rather than go into the Land Court and have their cases decided by such men as Mr. Doyle. I repeat that it is useless to pass Land Acts for the benefit of the cultivators of the soil if the persons who are set up to act as arbitrators between landlord and tenant are as hopelessly biased as this Land Commissioner undoubtedly is. On the estates in Cork, where judicial rents were fixed in 1882, 1883, and 1884 by another Commissioner, Mr. Walpole, hardly any of the tenants have since been able to pay the full amount. The landlords have been obliged, nolens volens, to give reductions of 20, 25, and 30 per cent. on the judicial rents in places where Mr. Walpole has adjudicated. I myself have seen lands on which Mr. Walpole has put £2 an acre, marshy lands which were almost wet enough in rainy seasons to float one of Her Majesty's ironclads. That has occurred on the Bog of Allan where, although the tenant has had to pay £2 per acre, the hay has been sold for 10s. an acre. All over the Counties of Cork and Waterford, wherever this Commission has roved, it has been found necessary for the landlords and tenants to go through the judicial rents again and strike 10 and 20 per cent. off them. In regard to the Court Valuers there are, no doubt, hon. Members from other parts of Ireland who will be able to bring forward many cases of Court Valuers who up to the time of their appointment had been employed solely in the landlords' interest, and who, of course, could not be expected to bring an unbiased mind to operate in the matter. But even if they should report rightly, is it sound policy that you should have Court Valuers whose appointment is viewed with distrust by the people whose holdings they are about to value? I will give an illustration of what I mean. There has recently been appointed on one of the Commissions connected with the County of Cork a Mr. Robert Martin, of Littleisland. I put a question in the House a few weeks ago in regard to this gentleman. I asked whether he had not acted in many cases as valuer for the landlord, and I was told by the Attorney General for Ireland that I had been misinformed, and that the gentleman had not been appointed Court Valuer but only as Sub-Commissioner. Will the Committee mark that. Here is a gentleman who had been a valuer for the landlords, appointed regularly to fix their estimate of the value of the land, and having been for a long time in the employment of one side he is appointed a Sub-Commissioner to decide for both sides. Such a thing is repugnant to every sense of fair-play, and if there is a want of confidence in the administration of the Land Acts the Government have only themselves to blame. I will give the Committee an example of the manner in which the valuers do their duty. In the case of Kenmare, a few months ago, a Commission, consisting of a Mr. Green, Mr. John Houston, and Mr. James Rice, were sitting. A tenant named Sullivan had applied for a reduction of his rent, and a Court Valuer was brought forward. He valued the land at a figure much higher than the tenant; but when this gentleman—Mr. F. R.

Baker—was cross-examined he said, "I consider £24 to be a fair rent for the farm." In reply to the tenant's solicitor he admitted that he had only gone over corners of the farm, here and there, and had not examined every part of it. I submit that that perfunctory valuation is a system adopted by the majority of these valuers, who are sent out by the Sub-Commissioners to discharge the most responsible duty of properly estimating the value of the land. Many of these gentlemen are persons who, up to the time of their appointment, had no particular knowledge of the land. They have either been civil engineers or connected in some way or other with the innumerable land offices and agencies throughout the country, but having had no acquaintance with or knowledge of land valuing. In conversation with a tenant a few months ago, on whose holding a Court Valuer had gone, I was told that this gentleman had driven up to the place, alighted from his car, and simply looked over the fence and examined the cottage garden—which everyone knows is usually the best part of the holding, neatly laid out and even adorned. The tenant asked him to go and see the wet and marshy part of the land, but he refused, saying he could see enough of it from the step of the car, and he drove off after that cursory examination of the land. I say that men who take such a perfunctory view of their duties ought not to be appointed. We want to know, from whoever is responsible for the administration of the Acts, on what system the Government or the Commissioners proceed in appointing the Sub-Commissioners and the Court Valuers? Are the appointments made in a haphazard sort of way, or, as the people suspect, and have strong reason to believe, has the influence of the landlords and land agents with the authorities of the Land Commission anything to do with the selection of the Court Valuers? We believe it has. If our belief is ill founded it would be wise for the Government to give some explanation on this Vote of the system on which they proceed. If explanation of that kind cannot be forthcoming I contend that our case is made out, and that the suspicion and distrust entertained by a vast body of tenantry in Ireland towards the administration of this Act is only too well founded. This is a very serious matter. The land business in the Courts is in a congested state, and appeal after appeal has been made to the right hon. Gentleman to increase the number of Sub-Commissioners. Complaints are constantly being made that the Sub-Commissioners do not go to such and such a district, or that the intervals between the visits are too long. All this shows the anxiety of the tenantry in Ireland to take advantage of the rent-fixing clauses of the Land Act, but if, in the appointment of the men who are to administer the Act, the selection is made on the recommendation of landlords and agents in order that they may minister to the greed of a territorial oligarchy, the Government will have made a mistake from every point of view. They will have made the people distrustful of the intention of the Government, and have gone far to destroy for ever the benefits that would otherwise have accrued from the beneficent legislation of 1881 and 1887.

(3.58.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Reference has been made to the Ulster farmers and the meeting at Ballymoney, where resolutions of the strongest character were passed expressing dissatisfaction with the way in which the Protestant and Loyalist farmers have been treated by the Land Commission. But my hon. Friend need not have confined himself to the Ballymoney meeting. All over Ulster meetings of that kind have taken place, though the Conservative Ulster Members have always been absent, and resolutions have been passed calling on the Irish Land Reform Party to bring their grievances under the notice of Parliament. I happen to represent an Ulster constituency which has been considerably affected by the action of the Land Commission, and I should like, as an Ulster Nationalist Member, to give expression to the dissatisfaction which is felt generally throughout Ulster, although the farmers are not represented here. I can imagine nothing more calculated to open the eyes of the Ulster people to the futility of relying on their present line of action than the absence from the House of almost every Ulster Member when these subjects come on. What could be of greater advantage to pass over, there will be another inch of dust over the grave of these discussions of grievances, and the whole thing will go on for another year. While I say this of Mr. Fitzgerald, I in no sense complain of his appointment. I think on the whole the appointment is a fair one, and, so far as I am able to judge, he will make an excellent Land Commissioner. But I do protest against his conduct in doing what I have described, and I have not the slightest doubt that, through Mr. Wrench, the signature to this document was the price of Mr. Fitzgerald's appointment. I really think that when they are so anxious to make law and order respected in Ireland it was a bad start for the Government to make with a new Commissioner, and they might have induced Mr. O'Hagan to carry on a little longer. There are hundreds of things of which we may be certain, though we cannot prove them, and we know well that the right hon. Gentleman was not willing that Mr. Litton should be appointed to Mr. O'Hagan's place. We know that he had other arrangements in contemplation, and but for the fact that Mr. Litton would have resigned his appointment as non-judicial Commissioner if he had not been appointed the Chief Secretary would never have appointed him. I think it is creditable to Mr. Litton that he is not in the favour of the Chief Secretary. So much in reference to that matter. With regard to the leaseholding section of the Act of 1887, renewed last year under the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, I would appeal to the Government, in the interests of landlord and tenant alike, to renew the section for another year. Suppose a tenant goes into Court under a lease, and imagines himself to be a tenant, as for all rent-paying purposes he is, and ejectment proceedings may be taken against him, he, by reason of a technical point, the appeal being heard outside the time in which the lease may be broken, will have no remedy whatever. The Government are very slow in getting the judicial rents fixed, and it is very hard for tenants to be shut out for all time from their fair rent, because of the sluggishness of the Commission. I hope we shall have a statement that the leaseholders' clause will be continued for another year, and I do not anticipate there will be any objection to that being done in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. There are one or two other matters to refer to. There is the insufficient appointment of Sub-Commissions and the manner in which appointments are made. There are cases have come under my notice in which tenants have been waiting three years as leaseholders to have fair rents fixed, and there are instances in which landlords' solicitors have threatened proceedings to recover rent, and it has turned out, when finally the fair rent application was heard, that the tenant had overpaid half-a-year's rent, the new rent dating from the date of the originating notice. I know another case in which, when matters came to be settled by the Commission, the tenant found the landlord was his debtor for two and a-half years rent, yet, all that time while hearing was delayed the tenant was liable to eviction. Scores of evictions have taken place merely in consequence of the inability of the Land Commission to grapple with its arrears of work, and we know that tens of thousands of tenants under lease may be prevented from re-habiting their position from this cause, and the section expiring at the end of the present year. I do trust the Government will do something in this matter. It is true the Government do something, and they do it in a very remarkable and inconsistent way. There is unsteadiness in the way in which they act. One of the most recent things that have come under the notice of those who watch the progress of affairs in Ireland is the unfair and entirely landlord character of all these appointments. Some people allude to the appointment of the brother-in-law of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). I do not complain of this. I am glad the hon. Member has a brother-in-law able to get something out of the great landlord party. In fact, it is a most reasonable appointment, for if a man works and slaves for the landlord party, it is a very hard thing if he cannot get a miserable £700 or £800 a year out of that party. I think there is no stronger proof of the kind of appointment made by the Government than the appointment of Colonel Bailey on Mr. Doyle's Commission. Colonel Bailey is a gentleman of landlord proclivities: he is an agent, but he is an honest man. He was appointed in 1881, and if you turn to the Sub-Commission on which he sits in County Wicklow with two other gentlemen from the County of Cork, it will be seen that landlord as he is he is, nevertheless, obliged to differ from his brother Commissioners, and say that the rents are abominably high. The consequence is that Colonel Bailey is a marked man; his days will not be long in the land from a Sub-Commission point of view. We have heard of the "last sigh of the Moor," and if this Sub-Commission goes on in the way it is intended it should do, this may be the last sigh of the Irish peasant with regard to the fixing of fair rents in Ireland. Why is Mr. Doyle allowed to act in this way? Why do the Government keep him in Cork? Why not send him to Ulster? I should like to see him engaged in fixing rents in loyal Fermanagh or Down, where I think he would be tarred and feathered if he fixed in those places the rents he is fixing in County Cork. I have had under my notice a statement in reference to the father of Mr. Doyle, that he had on the mere word of Lord Portsmouth in the County of Wexford sold steadings and houses twice the value of the fee-simple of the soil without a tittle of legal protection, and that the son came down upon those who had acquired this property. That he, the son of a tenant farmer himself, should, for the sake of a few hundred pounds from the Government, desert his own kith and kin, shows the corrupting effect of the dog collar of Dublin Castle when once it is slipped over a man's head. We are told by the Chief Secretary that one complaint is that Catholics are not appointed, and that the major portion of these gentlemen are Protestants. We say, however, at any rate you might act honestly, and see that you get honest men to do your work. Instead of this you pick out the worst rack renters of the country from the landlords and agents, and these are the men you put on your Sub-Commissions. With regard to Mr. Wrench, I have no personal charge to make, but his position is a remarkable one. I remember reading about a stable boy who became Prime Minister, and one can understand how this happened; but how Mr. Wrench became a Land Commissioner at a salary of £3,000 a year is a strange illustration of the kind of flotsam and jetsam met with on the coast of Dublin Castle. A few years ago he had never been in Ireland. He wanted an agent for Sir Thomas Bray's estate. He advertised for a good man and took him down to his hut at Aldershot, on the principle, I suppose, that if you want to know what a man is you must see what he would do in a hut at Aldershot. He got Mr. Sub-Commissioner Crane, after a decision he had given, which was upheld by the Court of Appeal, removed from the district and sent to a new appointment, and now we find that whenever we get an honest man like Colonel Bailey he is to be Botanyised, or sent to a sort of Irish Botany Bay. The fixing of rents under circumstances like these can hardly command the confidence of the Irish tenants. The Government are well aware of all the circumstances, they know that rents are unpaid, and that the people are unable to pay them, and yet knowing what we do of Mr. Wrench he is to be placed at the head of the Land Commission. Up to the present moment, in spite of all his efforts, the Land Commissioners have held themselves independent, but they have not given satisfaction, and Mr. Wrench is to be appointed by the Government as the saviour of Ireland. I denounce these appointments, and every attempt that is made to screw up the rents. Of course the Sub-Commissioners are beginning to tremble in their boots, for they know that they are more removable than the Removable Magistrates. They may be dismissed at a day's notice. All I say is that the system of hunting Sub-Commissioners from pillar to post, discouraging them from honest administration of the Act, will do more to prevent a settlement of this question in Ireland than any other action of the Government. It is oppressive and irritating to rack-rent a man for 15 years, and then if he does not pay he is driven to the road side. You place a fine on him, and if he does not pay it involves, practically, sentence of death. So long as the present Government remain in Office these men do not expect any improvement. The right hon. Gentleman himself does not desire that these men should do anything more than practically leave things as they are. I must say he has set a very bad example to his successors. He boasts that his successors will do just as they think fit. But the Conservatives will not always be in power, and the right hon. Gentleman's successors might appoint extreme men, not landlords, but tenant farmers and agitators, and members of the local branches of the National League. It must be remembered that 9 out of the 15 years have expired. In six years I can conceive a Liberal Government being in power. That is not a very strong assumption, and I say that if the bad example of the present Government in making unfair appointments is followed by their successors it will be disastrous to the landlords.

(4.50.) MR. DILLON: I wish to impress upon the Government the terrible evils which arise from the delay in settling fair rents under the Act. I have a letter from the County Clare from a tenant farmer. It says—

"Our case has been in Court for three years, and we have not been able to get a hearing."

The letter further states that the Sub-Commissioners had been in the neighbourhood, but had not called at Ennis, where the writer of the letter resides. That is a most extraordinary condition of things, and one which the Government are bound to explain. These men are suffering under a rack-rent, notwithstanding that their case was legislated for in 1887. If these men are evicted because of their inability to pay the rents, no doubt gross injustice will be done, and you will, no doubt, have agitation and boycotted farmers, all due to the mal-administration of Dublin Castle. Now, there is another matter. We have been accustomed, during the past year, to hear the boastings and felicitations of the right hon. Gentleman on the peaceful condition of Ireland. I admit that in considerable portions of Ireland peace has settled down upon the people. But the cause is that we have had, comparatively speaking, two good harvests. The Irish are a long-suffering people, despite all that is said to the contrary. When the small tenants are able to pay their rents, all the agitators that ever were born will not induce them to refuse. The fact is, there has been a sudden and phenomenal rise in prices; but, according to the best information I have been able to obtain, I believe the prosperity is only temporary. If we have a bad harvest, I venture to say that the Government will be plunged into a sea of trouble as great as ever they have experienced. It is undeniable that, during the last three years, the Government have promised a policy with regard to the appointment of Sub-Commissioners of a most factious and dangerous character. The result is, that there has been a marked increase in the standard of the judicial rents fixed. A more dangerous proceeding could not possibly be conceived. I say this, that if advantage is taken of the temporary prosperity of agriculture in Ireland to raise the rents, the Government will prepare for themselves a tremendous sea of trouble. The agitations of the future, like the agitations of the past, will result in bringing the rents down to a lower standard than before. The course has ever been in Ireland to resist reasonable demands peacefully made, and then, in the alarm caused by agitation, to yield more than was asked for in the first instance. The Government cannot manipulate the Commissioners, and prevent them doing justice between landlord and tenant, without expecting to have Nemesis upon them. Past history should have taught that prices were too high, and we have warned you that this may prove disastrous to the landlord class. What else can be expected? If the policy of the Chief Secretary is to be pursued to the end, we may not be able, with our utmost influence, to secure the carrying out of that policy of moderation and fair play we wish to see maintained. Let me draw attention to a remarkable fact in connection with the administration of the Sub-Commissioners. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) mentioned the name of Colonel Bailey as a Sub-Commissioner who has the confidence of the Irish people. He is not a class representative, he is not in that sense a friend of the farmers; he is a Protestant gentleman, a landowner in County Wicklow, and I understand, though I have no personal acquaintance with him, a Conservative in politics. From the time of his appointment, in the early days of the Commission, he has continued to enjoy the confidence of the people of Ireland. There is another name to be mentioned with honour whenever the work of the Land Commission is discussed, that of the lamented Mr. Reeves. He died a short time ago, and the Irish people were deprived of one of the most upright honourable Judges connected with the Land Court. Mr. Reeves was a Conservative gentleman, a landlord owning property in County Clare, and he was appointed by the Liberal Government in pursuance of their policy in mixing their Commission by appointments from either political Party. From the day he took his seat on the Bench down to the time of his lamented death Mr. Reeves was respected, beloved, by Irish tenant farmers. Now, what do I argue from this? That there is truth in that often quoted saying of that famous Attorney General, Sir John Davis, uttered 200 years ago, that in his experience there was not a nation under the sun appreciated even-handed justice more than the Irish people. Here are instances of two Protestant Irish landlords, honourable men, doing justice in their position, revered and respected by the people, who never quarrelled with their decisions. I say deliberately that there would have been no objection if the Government had appointed half-a-dozen such Sub-Commissioners. There would have been no protest from tenant representatives. But the Government did nothing of the sort. They selected men whose records were not clean, men who were rack-renters, or the friends of rack-renters, and we had the discreditable spectacle in Ireland of men sitting on a so-called Bench of Justice, fixing fair rents for farmers, while their own rents were being reduced 30 or 40 per cent. in another county. So long as the power of manipulating Sub-Commissions is in the hands of men such as Mr. Wrench, so long will you have agitation continue, and the rents fixed will not be regarded as judicial rents, but as rents settled under form of law to suit the wishes of the landlord class. My hon. and learned Friend has alluded to the well-known fact that Mr. Wrench deliberately broke up two Sub-Commissions, which had been in operation for three or four years, and was composed of men who had worked harmoniously together and given the greatest satisfaction. That was what he was brought into office to do. Everybody knows of the indignation, the rage of the Irish landlords, at the decisions of Colonel Bailey's Sub-Commission, and hence it was that by Mr. Wrench this and another similar Sub-Commission was dissolved, and its members distributed among other Sub-Commissions, where their impartiality will have less influence. I will say no more on this point—this fair-rent fixing part of the Commission. I will leave that subject, merely saying that at enormous expense, frightful expense, you are carrying out this system of fixing fair rents in such a way as to prepare a certain ground for future violent agitation, such as from time to time has occurred in the past history of Ireland. I now turn to the Land Purchase Department; and, willing as I am that this Vote should be taken to-night, I regret that there is not more time to bring on questions now at issue in reference to this Department. I regret it the more because this question has enormous importance in view of the intention of the Government to bring on a Land Purchase scheme of gigantic proportions, a scheme which, if passed, will make land purchase by far the most important part of the work of the Commission. A struggle is now going on whether the Treasury of this country shall be grossly swindled or not. First of all let me refer to the judgment of Commissioner J. G. McCarthy, delivered a fortnight ago, as to the sale of farms of substituted tenants. In this judgment, Mr. McCarthy lays down a most important principle—a principle which, I think, is absolutely essential to the due administration of a Purchase Act, if any regard is to be had at all to the safety of the Treasury. But, Sir, I find that to enter upon this must needs be a long discussion, and it is a vital question. I do not wish to prevent the Vote being taken this evening, and so I will defer the question to the Report stage, which I will ask the Government to take at a time to allow of discussion.

(4.12.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Report, no doubt, will be taken at a time to allow the opportunity for discussing a single question of that kind. Speeches have been made on points of detail, but I do not think hon. Members will desire that I should now traverse the whole ground, but I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that I have done my best to secure that such appointments should be made as would ensure the Act being justly and impartially administered. I fear that in regard to the fixing of rents it would be difficult, under any circumstances, to obtain a general agreement as to the justice of the tribunal.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In reference to my inquiry as to the leaseholders' clause being excluded in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That will be so.

Resolution [15th July] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

CLASS III.

"That a sum, not exceeding £50,577, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

*(5.18.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): In Debate in Committee, language used by Lord Spencer was quoted as approval of the practice of jury-packing as carried out at Mary-borough last October, and I now wish to point out what I was not prepared to do at the moment that Lord Spencer specially reserved matters referring to three important points, and these reservations show that his words are in no way applicable to the trials at Maryborough. In the first place, Lord Spencer expressly limited himself to Dublin, and did not refer to other parts of the country. Then Lord Spencer said that his Government did take precautions to prevent publicans and farmers in isolated positions being placed on juries in certain cases. From what I know of Queen's County, and from information furnished me by others better acquainted with the county than I am, I can say that among these jurors, all of whom must be rated at either £50 or £100, there were no such cases of farmers in isolated positions among those who were challenged, and not a single publican appeared on the list. The Attorney General for Ireland would do well to be more careful in his quotations the next time he cites Lord Spencer in defence of such proceedings as those I witnessed at Maryborough. There is another point of considerable importance in reference to the reply made by the Attorney General for Ireland. As justification of the course pursued the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the prisoners, after the trial of two of their number, pleaded guilty, but he did not say to what charge they pleaded guilty, and the context of his speech would give a false impression to those who did not follow the actual facts. In the first case, that of William Coll, the charge of wilful murder, was made, and a verdict of manslaughter, brought in. In the second case, that of Gallagher, the jury disagreed. Now, there were six others who had been sent there on a charge of wilful murder, and these pleaded guilty to manslaughter, getting what may be considered, under the circumstances, very harsh sentences. Against one of the accused, William Ferry, the Crown did not proceed. Then nine other persons pleaded guilty to misdemeanour, obstructing the execution of a warrant, and in four cases the Crown abandoned prosecution. Lastly, there was the case of the Rev. Father McFadden. The first charge against him was wilful murder, then the Crown altered the charge to conspiracy to murder, and what finally he pleaded guilty to was merely obstructing the police, and he was released on his own recognisances. I cannot, therefore, see how the right hon. and learned Gentleman can find any justification for the course pursued in the fact that persons charged with wilful murder were ultimately allowed to plead guilty to a charge of obstructing the police. I have thought it right to make this explanation, because I think the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland might lead people ignorant of the facts to suppose that the prisoners pleaded guilty to the charge of wilful murder.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Resolution agreed to.

SUPPLY [14TH JULY]—REPORT.

Order for further consideration of postponed Resolution read:—

“That a sum, not exceeding £24,661, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland.”

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the House do agree with the Committee in said Resolution.”

(5.29.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I have to call attention to what I conceive to be a most remarkable instance of the way in which the Government have allowed legislation passed last year to become a dead letter. I do not know whether Members remember some exciting scenes here on a Saturday in August last year on the discussion of the Public Works Loans Act, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer attempted without a word to drop a clause from that Bill in collusion with the hon. Member for South Hunts and others. It had been decided in Ireland that when loans are advanced by the State to the tenant, and then the tenant is evicted by the landlord, the landlord should get the whole benefit of the loan obtained by the tenant in the way of buildings or drainage, not having a penny to pay the State, but getting the land free of all encumbrance. Of course, that was putting a premium on eviction. This puts a premium upon eviction, because if a tenant borrowed £500 from the Board of Works for drainage and buildings, the landlord, if he fell into arrear, would be entitled to serve him with a notice, and evict him. Evictions of this kind, with the object of grabbing the money of the State, have been perpetrated in Ireland, and since the recent decision the State has been wholly unable to recover one penny from the landlord. Last year the Government brought in a Bill providing that the moment the tenant was evicted the loans should be recoverable as against the landlord, thus giving the tenant something like security in his holding, and giving the landlord no temptation to evict. But the moment this clause was proposed the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved its omission in order that it might be re-cast, and made to apply to future loans only. We resisted that, and a compromise was agreed to, to the effect that the Valuation Commissioners should fix the value of the improvements. If a tenant borrowed only £500 from the State, and the improvements were only worth £150 or £200, it was thought it would be unfair to tax him with the full amount. So anxious were we that equity should be done that we assented to the compromise. The moment the House met this year I asked the Attorney General for Ireland what had been done to enforce the law. The question will be found in Vol. 2, page 853, of this year's Hansard. The right hon. and learned Gentleman replied that he had made inquiry on the subject, and that since the passing of the Act only two cases, which were still under consideration, had come before the Board. Observe, Sir, “since the passing of the Act.” Other cases must have occurred previously. I asked him whether the Board of Works would allow the Act to remain a dead letter, or would compel the Magistrates to disgorge. The Attorney General replied that he had no doubt the attention of the Commissioners would be drawn to the question. The hon. Member for West Cork (Mr. Gilhooly) yesterday, or the day before, put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) on three specific instances. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman was most unsatisfactory, because he practically said he knew nothing whatever about it. I put it to the House whether common honesty towards the State might not be observed, and whether some attempt ought not to be made to compel the landlord to pay the amount due to the State. You are very ready to charge the tenants with dishonesty, but here you are yourselves neglecting to prevent dishonesty on the part of the landlords. We detected you last year in an attempt to prevent this clause being made retrospective. We caught you in the act. The incident is reported in Hansard, vol. 406, page 434, of last year. My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), myself, and others, made a vigorous fight, and, after a long discussion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave way. His words are thus reported:—

“Mr. GOSCHEN: If we can remedy the retrospective character of the clause that is all we desire. We will consent to report Progress, and I will endeavour on Monday to see whether we can deprive the section of its retrospective character.”

But you did not alter it. The section stands as it was originally proposed, with the subsequent qualification that the valuation was to be assessed by the Valuation Department under rules which were to be made. I would like to know whether those rules have been made. I ask for a Return of all the money the State has lost by reason of the merging of the two estates in the landlord's hands. There ought not to be one law for tenants and another for landlords.

(5.41.) MR. MADDEN: The Section to which the hon. and learned Member has drawn attention referred to loans made to tenants under the Act of 10th Vict. It was decided that these loans were made to the tenants on the security of the tenants only, that the landlord was not privy to the loan, and if from any reason the tenancy expired, and the security came to an end, there was no further security. It was to meet this that the Act was introduced, and it provided that the charge should become a charge on the estate of the landlord, but only to the extent of the improved value. As to the extent to which this has been actually worked, I have, of course, no information. I have communicated with my right hon. Friend (Mr. Jackson), and we are ready to grant a Return of cases under the Act to which the provision of last year would be applicable. I should prefer the hon. and learned Gentleman to frame the Return.

Mr. T. M. Healy

(5.42.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I have no option but to accept the Return, but I take the right hon. Gentleman's statement as an admission that the law has been allowed by the Government to fall into contempt, and that they have done nothing whatever to make the landlords pay their full and just share.

Resolution agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 290.)

Order read for consolidation of Bill, as amended.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I object.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My hon. Friend's objection may prevent a most useful measure being passed. It is most desirable, in the interest of the public health, that the Bill should become law, and I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in his objection.

MR. KELLY: I object.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till to-morrow.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 167.)

Order for Consideration, as amended, read, and discharged.

Bill re-committed in respect of two new Clauses and the Preamble.

Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert Clauses to enable persons holding land for public, ecclesiastical, parochial, charitable, or other purposes, to grant such land for library purposes, and to extend the provisions of 18 and 19 Vic., c. 70, s. 18, to the Metropolis.—(Sir John Lubbock.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1886) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 342.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BIRSTALL WESLEYAN CHAPEL TRUSS SCHEME CONFIRMATION BILL.—
(No. 368.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BANKRUPTCY (SCOTLAND) BILL.
(No. 218.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 49.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

GLEBE LANDS BILL.—(No. 160.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT AMEND-MENT (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 317.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*Mr. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I hope the House will allow this Bill to be read a second time, in order that it may be amended in Committee.

Mr. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I object. The Bill was only printed this morning, and I think it desirable that shipowners should have a glance at its contents before it is read a second time.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

AGRICULTURAL COMPENSATION PROCEDURE BILL.—(No. 343.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. CHANNING (Northampton. E.): This Bill provides for an assimilation of the law between England and Scotland, and I hope the House will consent to the Second Reading.

Mr. J. KELLY: I object.

Mr. CHANNING: Then I must withdraw the Bill. I deeply regret the action of Her Majesty's Government in not helping the passage of a Bill which would have the effect of enabling farmers to obtain their compensation more cheaply and expeditiously. Next Session I will move for leave to introduce a Bill dealing on wider lines with the whole question.

Order for Second Reading discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION (CONSOLIDA-TION) BILL [LORDS].

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Friday, and to be printed. [Bill 383.]

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

STANDING COMMITTEE FOR BILLS RELATING TO LAW, &c.

Tuesday, July 8th, 1890.

LORD HERSCHELL IN THE CHAIR.

SETTLED LAND BILL.

Clauses 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4—

LORD SELBORNE: There seems to be a want of definiteness in the words, "as part or by way of any family arrangement." No doubt there is a class of cases known to the Courts of Law in which the expression has been very frequently used; but, on the other hand, it might be advisable to include under this Clause instruments which do not embody any family arrangement at all. I will put a case to illustrate what I mean. Suppose a tenant for life is very much in debt, and that in order to secure the means of living he makes some arrangement for a re-settlement with the person entitled to the reversion, who gives quite full value for what is done. Practically he is entitled to such valuable consideration, and not only in a nominal, but, it may be, in a very substantial sense. I suppose that would come within these words?

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: As far as he paid money I suppose he would be a mortgagee.

LORD SELBORNE: I am not supposing a case in which he would have a right to receive payment in any shape, but a case of a re-settlement made between the parties for valuable consideration. That would come within the Clause—I do not say it ought not.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: If it were all done under one deed, the re-settlement would come under these words. This, I should think, is only designed to apply where a family arrangement, which is in reality a settlement, is carried out by more than one instrument.

LORD SELBORNE: I should have thought that that would be the law at present.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Some doubt has been suggested about it. Suppose a tenant for life settles pin-money on his wife without power of anticipation—

LORD SELBORNE: I doubt whether that would come under these words.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: If there were consideration money.

LORD SELBORNE: That would be quite another matter. My only reason for raising the question is that one does not carry in one's mind all the cases which might fall within these words.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: The object, no doubt, is to sweep in everything except the case of a purchaser or mortgagee.

LORD SELBORNE: The present Act includes, or is meant to include, I suppose, everything commonly coming under the denomination of a settlement; and beyond doubt most settlements might be called family arrangements, especially those which are by way of re-settlement upon a tenant in remainder coming of age and so on. I think those are all within the present law. But there is something which is supposed to be omitted which ought to be included, and which this Clause is to provide for. What I want to know is, exactly what cases are had in view.

LORD THRING: This clause debars persons holding under such an arrangement from using the powers created by the Act of 1882.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: A person who takes an assignment or charge from the tenant for life under the 50th Section of the former Act, is enabled to stop any power of sale in the tenant for life. This clause is intended to alter that. Of course a person will have the same charge against the money that he would have against the land, but the power of sale would still be left in the tenant for life. That is the object. However, perhaps the best plan will be to leave the words as they are for the present. Before the Bill comes into Committee of the whole House, I will consider with the draughtsman the points put by my noble Friend, and see whether any better words can be provided.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 8 agreed to.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: After Clause 8 I move to insert a new clause ("Power to reserve a rent-charge on a grant in fee simple.") It enables, on a grant for building purposes by a tenant for life, a rent-charge in fee simple to be reserved, issuing out of the land conveyed, and with all necessary powers and remedies for recovery thereof.

LORD SELBORNE: According to the practice of Lancashire.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Yes. My attention has been called to it from more than one part of England. It will avoid many difficulties which arise out of leasing. I am told that in many cases you cannot sell a piece of land for building purposes; the builders have not the money for purchase; but if they could get it on a perpetual ground-rent of this description they would be able to build, and would probably prefer building on those terms to doing so upon the leasehold system, to which sometimes both the tenant for life and the builders have objections. It could not do any harm to the estate, and I believe in many cases it would be a very great advantage. This is really selling the land for an annual rent in perpetuity, instead of selling it for a sum down; that is what it comes to. It is like a Scotch feu.

LORD SELBORNE: I suppose the principle of this new Clause would be attacked by those who think that all ground-rents should be the subject of some special tax.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: It is the same thing for the inheritance whether the land is sold for a sum down, or is let at a rent which represents what the sum down, if properly invested, would bring in. If you have a well-secured £2. 15s. a year ground rent, it is just as good as if you take £100 down and invest it in Consols. It is the same thing so far as the inheritance is concerned. This Clause does not prevent the tenant for life leasing, if he can make that arrangement more advantageously, but it substitutes for the power of sale out and out for a lump sum the power to sell for an annual rent.

LORD SELBORNE : There are parts of the country where it is very difficult to sell on any other terms.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN : Exactly.

New Clause—

“Where, on a grant for building purposes by a tenant for life, the land is expressed to be conveyed in fee simple with or subject to a reservation thereof of a perpetual rent or rentcharge the reservation shall operate to create a rentcharge in fee simple issuing out of the land conveyed, and having incidental thereto all powers and remedies for recovery thereof conferred by Section 44 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and the rentcharge so created shall go and remain to the uses on the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions which, immediately before the conveyance, were subsisting with respect to the land out of which it is reserved.”—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to and added.

Clause 9.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN : Sub-section 3 of this Clause excludes from the definition of “principal mansion house” any house, the site of which, and the pleasure-grounds, park, and lands usually held therewith do not exceed 100 acres in extent. I have to move to leave out “100” and insert “25.” My attention has been called to the fact that in many cases where there is only one house on the settled property, although the surrounding land is of very limited extent, the house should be deemed the principal mansion house within the meaning of the Act. I am told that the object in view can be attained without putting in so large a quantity as 100 acres, and that 25 acres will fully meet all the difficulties that have arisen.

Amendment moved in page 3, line 6, to leave out, “one hundred” and insert “twenty-five.”—(The Lord Herschell) ; agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10—

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN : This is a Clause which enables a tenant for life finding it necessary to raise money for any of the purposes for which he is allowed to sell any part of the settled land, to raise it by way of mortgage instead of sale. The reason for that is this: that very often, although the property is considerable, a comparatively small sum is required for the purpose of some necessary improvements. Very often it is difficult to find part of the property which could be sold with anything like a decent advantage, and it would be greatly to the benefit of the estate to raise the money on mortgage instead of by sale. That is the object of the Clause. But it has been represented to me (indeed, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor called attention to it on the Second Reading of the Bill) that this may be said to be to some extent running counter to the objects of this Bill, inasmuch as the result would be that the remainderman would get the estate burdened with a charge instead of the estate, to some extent reduced, but without any charge. To meet this, I propose to limit the provision in this Clause in a way which I think will remove all objections to it. One object of this Clause, I think, with which everyone will agree is this: at present the land cannot be re-mortgaged, that is to say, mortgages cannot be consolidated, although the tenant for life might, by getting a new mortgage and paying off the existing mortgages, reduce the interest from 5 to 4 per cent. One of the main objects of this Clause is to enable him to do that. In order to guard against any improper use of this power, I now propose an amendment, providing that, except where the money is required for the purpose of discharging an encumbrance, an order of the Court shall be required declaring that it is for the advantage of all persons interested under the settlement that the money shall be raised.

Amendment moved in page 3, at end of Clause 10, to add—

"(2.) Except for the purpose of discharging an incumbrance on the settled land, or part thereof, money shall not be raised under the power conferred by this section without an order of the court declaring that it is for the advantage of all persons interested under the settlement that the money should be so raised."—(The Lord Herschell.)

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: The provisions of the Act of 1882 are directed to farmhouses and drainage. Of course, there are other things, but those are the principal ones. It is obvious that there should be power, in the general interests of the estate, to raise money for the purpose of paying off existing incumbrances; but I am not quite clear that there should be power given to the Court to authorise the raising of money for other purposes. How can the Court obtain its information? Only by the evidence brought before it by the tenant for life, and he will bring forward his agent, who will declare what are the necessities of the estate. The temptation of agents is very strong to spend money. The great difficulty of the landed proprietor is to ensure that his agent does not spend too much money. The principal blot on the Act of 1882 is, that it enables capital money to be spent for improvements which are not durable, whereas the charge created on the estate lasts for ever. You are now extending that. I maintain that it is useless attempting to guard against this evil by requiring an order of the Court, because, unless the remainderman is sufficiently wealthy to be able to employ agents and valuers on his side, the Court will have no means of information, except that which is brought before it by the tenant for life, whose agent probably is distinctly interested, not in the practical welfare of the property, but in the amount which he can spend upon it.

LORD SELBORNE: I think there is something in what the Marquess of Bath says as to there being many cases in which the inquiry would be of a one-sided kind. I should like to know how this provision will affect the operation of the Land Improvements Act. Under that Act, for purposes pretty much the same, power is given to raise money, but it is upon the terms of there being a payment which would cover interest and redemption money. Is there really any clearly sufficient reason for not relying upon those powers except in the case of consolidation of incumbrances, which we are all agreed about?

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: The o'd Land Enclosure Commissioners, who had power to permit the advance of money on terminable authorities, had an independent means of obtaining information. They sent their inspectors down in the first instance, and approved the work, and from time to time approved the progress of the work. But the Court here has no means of obtaining independent information on the subject.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Would it meet the difficulty if, instead of the Court, we put in the Land Commissioners?

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: They would certainly have powers of investigation which the Court has not.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: That would not get rid of the objection that it would be to the interest of the agents of the tenant for life to have as much money as possible spent.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: The tenant for life, as a reasonable being, will do the best for his property. You already have practically the same thing under Lord Cairns's Act; it is a very small alteration that you are making.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: The great object, of course, is to preserve the estate free from incumbrances, and any provision which involves any exception to that should be carefully safeguarded.

LORD SUDELEY: I understand Lord Herschell's view is that this power should only be used when it is quite clear that it will be impossible, unless you sell a portion of the land to the detriment of the estate, for the improvements to be made.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Under Sub-section 2 of Section 26 of the Settled Land Act, the Trustees can only apply the money towards the whole or part of an improvement—

“(1) On a certificate of the Land Commissioners that the operation has been properly executed, and what amount is properly payable by the Trustees in respect thereof. . . . (2) On a like certificate of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor nominated by the Trustees, and approved by the Commissioners, or by the Court; (3) On an Order of the Court directing or authorising the Trustees to so apply a specified portion of the capital money.”

So that they cannot spend it on improvements at their own will. The Land Commissioners, or persons substituted for them and approved by them, have to be satisfied that the money is properly expended, and that such and such an amount is properly chargeable to the Trustees.

LORD SUDELEY: Does not that rather confirm the suggestion that instead of the Court we should substitute the Land Commissioners?

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Yes: I have no objection to that.

A NOBLE LORD: How does the Clause differ from the existing power under the Land Improvement Act?

LORD SELBORNE: It differs very much, I think, to the disadvantage of the remainderman. Under the Land Improvement Act, the whole sum would be paid off in a certain number of years. This may go on for ever.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: It may go on for ever; but, on the other hand, suppose you can only raise the money by selling a portion of the estate. It may be very much more to the advantage of the remainderman that you should raise upon mortgage, say £3,000, than that you should sell as much of the property as would bring in £3,000. It is, in fact, because in many cases it would be much more to the general advantage of the estate that I have been asked to press this Clause.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: I doubt very much its advantage. There is another very curious question here. What is the meaning of the word “encumbrance”? Is it merely a mortgage, or would it include a terminable annuity charged on the land for a term of years?

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I think it is very undesirable to give powers to raise money by way of mortgage for improvements which are always of a perishable character. If Lord Herschell will limit his amendment to raising money for the consolidation of existing encumbrances there will be no objection to it.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: In reply to the observation of the Marquess of Bath, I should certainly say that a terminable annuity would not be an “encumbrance” within the meaning of this section.

LORD SELBORNE: Is the word “encumbrance” defined anywhere? There should be provision against any inducement to get rid of the burden at once instead of by instalments.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: I will propose words that will meet that. I think it will be better to leave in the words that I now propose to substitute for my amendment, and I will consider before the next stage whether there is necessity to define the word “encumbrance.”

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, in page 3, at end of Clause 10 to add—

“Where money is required for the purpose of discharging an incumbrance on the settled land or part thereof, the tenant for life may raise the money so required on mortgage of the settled land, or of any part thereof, by conveyance of the fee-simple or other estate or interest the subject of the settlement, or by creation of a term of years in the settled land, or any part thereof, or otherwise, and the money so raised shall be capital money for that purpose, and may be paid or applied accordingly.”—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clause 12—

LORD SELBORNE: I suppose nobody would object to “bridges” as improvements; but I confess I am astonished at the next definition—

“Putting the settled land or any part thereof in the condition necessary or proper to enable the same to be let to the best advantage to agricultural or other tenants.”

That cannot mean building, because building is provided for in what follows.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: I have an Amendment to propose which would make it read “in the condition reasonably necessary or proper.”

LORD SELBORNE: Even then I think the principle of the objection I at present feel would not be removed. It must mean in substance taking the land in hand, cleaning it out of weeds and putting it into a good agricultural condition, which is a very transitory operation and should be done by the tenant for life at his own expense.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: The tenant for life might say, “The land as it was was not worth 5s. an acre: I put bones upon the land and vastly improved it.” No doubt it would be an improvement, but the value of the bones—particularly if the land is not properly farmed—does not last more than five or six years.

LORD SELBORNE: The principle, as I understand, in the former Act is, permanent improvements. Surely putting the land into proper condition for agricultural purposes is not a permanent improvement.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: Besides, if the tenant for life has allowed the land to get into an unfit condition, it is his own laches.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Has not the public some interest in the land being in a condition to be let? These arrangements are no doubt very nice between tenants for life and remaindermen, but has not the public some interest in seeing that there should be some means of putting the land in a condition reasonably necessary in order that it should be let, so that the land of this country should not become derelict because of these arrangements between tenants for life and remaindermen?

LORD SELBORNE: That may be a forcible way of putting the argument against permitting settlements, but whilst you have settlements I do not think an abstract argument of that kind has any great weight.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (LORD ASHBOURNE): I think it would be better to leave out the whole sub-section. I agree entirely with the objections raised by Lord Selborne. The estate would be charged for an indefinite time for improvements of a most transitory character. The objection, I think, applies also to the third sub-section, but certainly it is unanswerable to this one.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: It must be remembered that the money could only be expended on a certificate of the Land Commissioners or an Order of the Court, and security would, no doubt, be taken that only proper expenditure was allowed. Improvements of a merely temporary nature would be treated as a tenant for life's expense.

LORD ASHBOURNE: If this sub-section stands it will be a statutory declaration that if the Court determines that the improvement is necessary it must be allowed.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: No doubt, what the Court would have to see would be that it was necessary (or, as I propose presently to alter it, that it was “reasonably necessary”)—that is to say, that the land could not be let without it.

LORD ASHBOURNE: Then the Court would make the order, although it might be satisfied that the improvement was such that any prudent tenant for life should have made out of his own income.

Amendment moved in page 3, line 34, after the word “condition” to insert the word “reasonably.”—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

Amendment moved, in line 35, to leave out the words "the best advantage to."—(The Lord Herschell.)

SUB-SECTION (III.):—Amendment moved, in line 37, after the word "buildings" to insert the word "reasonably."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

Amendment moved, in line 38, to leave out the words "to the best advantage."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

On question, "That sub-section (iii.) as amended stand part of the Bill," the Committee divided:—Contents, 13; not contents, 2.

SUB-SECTION (IV.):—Amendment moved, in page 4, line 3, to leave out the words "for buildings."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: The Lord Chancellor, who is not able to be here, asked me to make a suggestion to the Committee. Under the Settled Land Act as it as present stands you may build cottages to accommodate farm servants and artisans. It is suggested that there ought to be a power to build residences for agents, bailiffs, overseers, or foremen or others proper to be employed on the settled land. My noble and learned Friend thinks that that should come within the same purview with offices and cottages for labourers and farm servants, and that it is a power that it would be expedient to give.

LORD SELBORNE: One might almost suppose that that is already covered by the word "farm-servant"; but if the Lord Chancellor thinks that "farm-servants" properly construed would not cover bailiffs and so on, we had better have it made clear.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: It might be, "Houses for agent, bailiff, officer, foreman, or other servant proper to be employed on the settled land."

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: If the Committee had seen as much as I have seen of landowners (not small, but large) who have been built or improved out of their property in the South of England, in Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, they would be most reluctant to give these powers.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I am quite sure it is contrary to public policy to allow anybody to indulge his architectural tastes at the expense of the estate. This would, I think, be a very dangerous power to give.

LORD ASHBOURNE: We might suppose the case of a childless tenant for life, who has an agent with a big family and with extravagant tastes, and who would only be glad to have a big house built for him.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I had better leave that until the Lord Chancellor can personally explain his views. I now have to move in page 4, line 5 at the end of the Clause to add "(v.) Restoration and rebuilding of buildings damaged or destroyed by fire."

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: I think this would be a very dangerous Clause indeed. Buildings should be insured in insurance offices. To give power to rebuild at the expense of the estate buildings destroyed by fire would be to whittle away the estate.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: If the tenant for life is under an obligation to insure, he is bound to expend the insurance money on rebuilding. If he is not under an obligation to insure and rebuild, he may insure and put the insurance money in his pocket, and the remainderman will get the estate with a ruin instead of a house.

LORD SELBORNE: That is rather suggestive of a difficulty which had occurred to me before—that, even if he had insured and put the money in his pocket, this would enable him to rebuild at the expense of the estate. If he does insure and receives the insurance money, it cannot be necessary to throw on the inheritance the burden of rebuilding. This would actually give the tenant for life, where now proper motives would induce him to rebuild out of the insurance money, an inducement to put the money in his pocket and rebuild at the expense of the inheritance.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: It does not follow that it would be to the advantage of the tenant for life to do that, because he would have to sell a portion of the estate sufficient to raise the money.

LORD THRING: It would be rather a premium on him not to insure, because he will know that if any damage is done by fire he can fall back on a mortgage of the estate for the purpose of re-building.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: No. He cannot mortgage; he can sell. Would a tenant for life be likely to say, "I will not insure, because if the buildings are destroyed by fire I can sell part of the estate to make them good?"

LORD BEAUCHAMP: I think different considerations arise in regard to the mansion-house and in regard to agricultural buildings.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: This would appear to apply to both. I admit that I quite see the force of what has been urged, although I rather doubt whether this provision would disincline the tenant for life to ensure when he otherwise would do so. And, on the other hand, this money is expended for the advantage of the remainderman, because if no such money is expended it will be a very bad thing for the estate.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: If this is adopted, the tenant for life will be obliged to rebuild; if there is destruction by fire he will have no choice but to rebuild.

LORD SELBORNE: I should think the cases would be very rare in which the buildings are not insured.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: The cases would be very rare where the buildings are not insured at all; but it may often happen that the insurance is insufficient, and that the money received for the insurance office is quite inadequate to replace the buildings. I should imagine that that is the class of cases which would rather be met.

LORD SELBORNE: Is not the existing power as to buildings under the Act of 1882 sufficient? Surely a reasonable Court, where it has power to allow an entirely new building, would not disallow it because some use is made of the remains of the old one.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: I think practically this would only apply to houses other than the farm buildings.

LORD SELBORNE: At all events, we must take care that no motive is created for the tenant for life omitting to insure, or, having insured, putting the money in his own pocket.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: It is rather hard on the remainderman, if the house is burnt down, that he should have no voice in the style or accommodation of the building to be erected in its stead.

LORD ASHBOURNE: I hardly think that a motive would be given not to insure, but this would be almost equally dangerous in allowing a man to rest easy in his mind and carelessly to let things slide.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: I will not press the Amendment, as the view of the Committee is against it.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

Clause 15—

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: I propose to omit this Clause. I think it is really too wide. Whether it might not be possible to narrow it somewhat I do not know. As it stands now, if you had a settlement of realty and personalty, it would enable the personalty to be applied for the purpose of improvements—of course, improvements under the Settled Land Act, but still improvements—on the realty. I think, in many cases, a person who settles both realty and personalty does so with a view to the uncertainty of the value of realty, and to secure that there shall be a certain income from personalty. In many cases, there would be danger in allowing personalty indefinitely to be applied to improvements in the realty. It would often defeat the intentions of the settlor.

LORD SELBORNE: Certainly, where there is no power to lay out the money in the purchase of land.

THE NOBLE CHAIRMAN: Even then it is one thing to be able to buy land, and another thing to merely spend money in the improvement of the estate. I think it is much too large, and I propose to leave it out.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON LAW AND COURTS OF JUSTICE AND LEGAL PROCEDURE.

Thursday, July 10th, 1890.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire) IN THE CHAIR.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4—

MR. CHANNING (Northampton) moved, in page 2, line 12, to leave out “prejudicial” and insert “dangerous or injurious.”

Question, “That ‘prejudicial’ stand part of the Clause,” put, and negatived.

Question, “That the words ‘dangerous or injurious’ be inserted,” put, and agreed to.

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 10 agreed to.

Clause 11—

MR. CHANNING: I beg to move the addition of the following words:—
“The provisions of this Clause shall apply to any scheme of reconstruction hereinafter provided in Clause D, part 2.” That clause in the second part of the Bill relates to the displacement of the inhabitants by any improvement scheme, and it contains provisions which provide for building and accommodation for the working people. The question I wish to raise is simply this, whether we should not apply to the rural sanitary district the same provisions and powers with regard to replacing the district population, as we have here in the first part of the Bill in regard to the Urban Sanitary Authorities. At present I maintain that the efficacy of the Bill will be destroyed without some such Amendment as this, because it provides that the first part of the Act shall not apply to Rural Sanitary Districts.

MR. RITCHIE: I am perfectly willing, when we come to Clause D, to which the hon. Member has referred, to apply practically the provisions of this Sub-section 2 to the Rural Districts.

MR. CHANNING: Then I will not move the Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 20 agreed to.

On Clause 20A—

MR. CHANNING: I wish to raise in reference to this Clause a point as to the procedure in regard to compensation, and especially to those parts of the Bill which apply to the Rural Sanitary Authorities. It is provided in line 25 of this Clause that there shall be no additional allowance in respect of the compulsory purchase of an area, or of any part of an area, in respect of which an official representation has been made. Under the 49th Section of the Bill I understand that the same powers are given to the Rural Sanitary Authorities. That Clause gives power to take property without the payment of anything additional in respect of compulsory purchase. But under the Lodging Houses Acts which are applied in Part III. the Rural Sanitary Authorities do not possess power even after having obtained the requisite certificate from the President of the Local Government Board. The point I wish to raise is whether the Rural Sanitary Authorities, in putting the Act in force and buying land compulsorily, whether for the purpose of erecting lodging houses or healthy buildings, shall enjoy the advantage of the compensation procedure of the Acts of 1879 and 1882. The Amendment I propose to move is, to insert at the end of Clause 20A, in page 13, these words, "Sub-section 3. The provisions of this Clause shall apply to any purchase of land otherwise than by agreement under the provisions of Part III. of this Act."

Amendment moved to insert, at the end of Clause 20A, in page 13, the words, "Subsection 3. The provisions of this Clause shall apply to any purchase of land otherwise than by agreement under the provisions of Part III. of this Act."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The hon. Gentleman has raised what is really a very serious and important issue. The position of the matter stands thus. With regard to the question of compensation, the Rural Sanitary Authority has the same power and the same obligations with regard to the acquisition of property as any Urban Authority, and I take it, therefore, that, so far as unhealthy and unsanitary areas are concerned, the provisions with regard to compensation are provisions which meet with the approval of the hon. Gentleman. I think that, in regard to the property dealt with in Part II., the Committee will be of opinion that the 10 per cent. allowed in cases of compulsory acquisition ought to be excluded as proposed by the Bill. The hon. Gentleman comes to a totally different class of property now, and contends that we ought to apply the 10 per cent. exclusion to this other property as well. Now, what is the property to which he proposes to extend this provision? It is not property that is necessarily in itself unhealthy at all, and there is no question of acquiring land or property for the purpose of demolition. The only question is the acquisition of land for the purpose of enabling the Local Authorities to erect dwellings, and for that purpose it is proposed that the Local Authority shall have power to acquire land anywhere, and belonging to anybody. If this 10 per cent. exclusion is to apply to such a case, there is no reason why it should not apply to every class of property, and to all questions of compensation. This will be the position of all Local Authorities in nine cases out of ten where they have acquired an unhealthy area under the Bill. No question of 10 per cent. will arise if they want to erect dwellings on that area. But if they wish to erect dwellings on lands which are not subject to the provisions of the Bill with regard to unhealthiness, they must come under the ordinary principles of compensation. I do not think myself that it is a matter which will practically have very much effect, because, if the Local Authorities do not build on the sites they have acquired, they will probably endeavour to acquire land which is not covered by houses at all. I cannot think that the Committee will consent in a Bill of this kind so seriously to alter the provisions of the law with regard to compensation where no fault of any kind exists.

MR. CHANNING: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has quite grasped the situation which arises. In the first place, he has evidently not followed in his mind the conditions under which the adoption of the Lodging Houses Acts in the Act of 1885 was agreed to by Parliament. In the Act of 1885 the definition of a cottage with a garden attached to it was inserted at the instance, I believe, of the hon. Member for Bordesley. Certainly it was understood, both in the evidence given in the report of the Commission and in the Bill which resulted from it, that the question of sanitation was bound up in the application of these Acts to Rural Sanitary Authorities. Therefore, in order to enable sanitation to be completely carried out, the adoption of an Amendment such as this is a matter of extreme importance and urgency. To have the Rural Authorities brought face to face with a denial of the same privileges of getting land as they would have in a town would, I think, paralyse the operation of the law we desire to carry out. The object of the Amendment is to provide the Rural Sanitary Authority or the County Council from being hampered, from having difficulties hunted up and brought against them under the provisions contained in Part III. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman cannot see his way to the acceptance of this Amendment. I may have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, but I certainly understood him to say in the Debate on the Second Reading that the principle in regard to compensation and the special exclusion of the 10 per cent. was to apply to the proceedings of all Rural Sanitary Authorities, and especially to the question of providing open spaces or healthy gardens around a town. If the right hon. Gentleman can see his way to the introduction of machinery in the second part of the Bill which will affect village cottages, I will not press the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman must have misunderstood me. A short discussion took place upon this point, but it was almost of a colloquial nature. What I wished to say was this—that, as far as the Rural Sanitary Authorities were concerned in the case of unhealthy buildings, the same procedure should apply as in the urban districts. It was in my mind at the time whether, under a modified scheme of reconstruction, the Rural Sanitary Authority, like the Urban Sanitary Authority, might not be willing to lay out, if necessary, the space they acquired as an open space.

MR. CHANNING: I was certainly under the impression that, as regards compensation, the Rural Sanitary Authority was to be placed in the same position as the Urban Sanitary Authority.

EARL COMPTON (York, W. R., Barnsley): I certainly understood that was what was meant. As far as I can see, they are exactly the same up to a certain point. Then there is a difference, of course, between the clearances—between the character of the clearances. I see the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman quite clearly. I think the latter ought thoroughly to understand that the question of compensation has been omitted altogether from discussion since we have been considering these Bills. The question of compensation is a huge one, which will have to be grappled with, and a Bill will have to be passed, I hope next Session. There will be some means, no doubt, of bringing it forward. But I should have thought some Amendment might possibly be made to this Bill in the direction suggested by my hon. Friend.

MR. RITCHIE: The noble Lord agrees with me that, so far as compensation is concerned, the Rural Sanitary Authority is exactly in the same position as the Urban Sanitary Authority. If the Urban Sanitary Authority desires to acquire land which is not unhealthy land, for the purposes of a scheme, the point of the exclusion of 10 per cent. does not arise. That is equally the case whether it is rural or urban. Wherever the land is to be acquired under the scheme, when no consideration of health arises, but in order to build houses, the Urban and Rural Sanitary Authorities stand on precisely the same ground.

MR. CHANNING: If the definition of a cottage and land in the 3rd Part could be transferred to the 29th Sub-section of the 2nd Part, that would settle the matter. Surely, it would be an intolerable state of things that the ratepayers in villages in every part of the country should, on the Rural Sanitary Authority undertaking a scheme, be victimised and fined by having the machinery of the Lands Clauses Act put upon them; and I really do not think the right hon. Gentleman is justified in such a refusal. The Rural Sanitary Authority, backed up by the County Council, may be carrying out a policy of building healthy cottages with sufficient garden space, and it would be absurd to say that that was not a policy of sanitation, and that it was a mere policy like that of laying out a new road, or something of that kind.

MR. RITCHIE: I do not quite gather what the hon. Member moves.

MR. CHANNING: I suggest the transference of the definition of cottage from the 3rd to the 2nd Part. I daresay it would entail other alterations. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, knows that we have had a hard week, and that we have had only an hour or two in which to consider the effect of these provisions. If the definition of "cottage with garden surrounding it," in the 56th Section, which, as hon. Members know, is the definition taken from the Act of 1885, were transferred to the 2nd Part, and other alterations, logically connected with it, were made, it would carry out the effect which I have in view.

MR. RITCHIE: I understand the hon. Gentleman desires something to be inserted in Clause 29 to make it clear that cottages and gardens are included. But in lines 15 to 18 the expression "dwelling houses" is defined to mean "any inhabited building," and to include any yard, garden, or outhouses.

MR. CHANNING: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman quite grasps my argument, which is based on some knowledge of the habits of the Rural Sanitary Authorities. If hon. Members look at the 3rd Part of the Bill they will find the definition "cottage and garden"; and naturally, when schemes are made to deal with areas in villages in the way it is suggested they should be dealt with, it will raise difficulties, because they will be hampered with the machinery of the 3rd Part. If the whole were transferred to the 2nd Part, of course the difficulty would be got over.

MR. RITCHIE: Now I see the cloven hoof of the hon. Member. It is not that he says that cottages cannot be dealt with by Clause 29, because, clearly, dwellings would include cottages; but by transferring part of the 3rd into the 2nd, he then gets the benefit of the Compensation Clauses, which he desires to obtain by means of an Amendment on the Paper. That is only another way of doing what the Government cannot assent to assist him in doing; that is to say, to take away the rights which holders of property, not in any degree unhealthy, have under the existing law. It may be a proper thing to consider, when the proper time comes, whether 10 per cent. is a right or wrong amount to give. If the subject is to be dealt with at all, it ought to be dealt with in some general way, and not by means of an Amendment under this Bill.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I should like to clearly understand the situation. Take the case of a cottage by the roadside. It often happens that the father or grandfather squatted there, and got a small strip of land. That land is specially desired by that Sanitary Authority in order to erect upon it lodging-houses. I understand my hon. Friend to propose that the Sanitary Authority should have the power of purchasing compulsorily, without adding 10 per cent., the land and the cottage, although they may be in a perfectly satisfactory condition, and may be the only property the owner possesses in the world. I do not think that the Committee will assent to that.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I am beginning to see what the announcement of the hon. Member means. In itself, there is no doubt that it is most necessary that the Local Authorities should not be able to deal with the housing of the cottager, unless something of the kind is done; and what the hon.

Member wants is, that in cases, not the extreme case which the hon. Member (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth) has mentioned, but in cases where cottages require more land, such land should be taken without this extra expense. There are thousands of cottages that are built, it may be by squatters, along that roadside, without a yard of land behind them, and with scarcely any escape for the sewage or anything. It is a mistake to suppose that these cottages have been built there after the hedges were put up. In many cases, perhaps the majority of cases, these cottages were built on the open common, and the enclosure has come up close to the back doors, and cut off every bit of spare ground behind them. Surely, it is reasonable when they find cottages in that condition, that the Local Authority shall be able to get the land so as to make those cottages into reasonable and healthy ones, by giving them strips of land behind, without being mulcted in expenses under the Lands Clauses Act. I do not see what objection there is. The object of the Amendment is very simple, and does not deal with the question of compensation, except in a very small degree, and with reference to one class of property in the rural districts. The class of cottages which are sought to be rectified by the Amendment are a growing evil in rural districts, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will agree to accept the Amendment.

MR. CHANNING: Before the Division is taken I would like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman, if he will kindly give me his attention for a moment, that supposing this Amendment were inserted in the Bill, the only difficulty would be the application of any provisions which would be necessary to cover the circumstances alluded to by my right hon. Friend, the Member for Clitheroe, or other cases of that kind.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): On this point I raised some discussion the other day, and I confess I was content when I found that, if the dwellings were needed, and the land on which they stood was unsuitable, compulsory power could be given, as the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate satisfied me it was given, to the Local Authority to take land convenient to the neighbourhood, and which was suitable, in order to build houses upon it. The question now raised is a very narrow one, namely, whether a person who has a suitable property which he does not want to sell, shall be obliged to sell without the 10 per cent., which is allowed to him under the Lands Clauses Act. I am sorry to say that my experience is that people under these circumstances get a good deal more than 10 per cent., and that is a great evil which probably is not avoidable. But I am glad to say I have always thought that 10 per cent. was not an unreasonable compensation to a person who did not want to part with his property. I hope, therefore, my hon. Friend will not press this to a Division, because in the circumstances, it would be pressing a little hard upon the man who has a bit of property which he wishes to retain, but which he must give up under the Lands Clauses Act compulsorily. I think that to give him 10 per cent. under the circumstances is not unreasonable.

MR. HOBHOUSE: As I understand this amendment, it is making a man pay for the sins of his neighbour. If a small owner allows his property to fall into an unsanitary condition, the Sanitary Authority must take the land of his neighbour in order to effect an improvement. Under those circumstances, I do not think the neighbouring land owner ought to be put in a worse position than if his land were taken for any other purpose.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 4 ; Noes, 20.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 28 agreed to.

Clause 29—

MR. CHANNING: I want to raise the question as to the meaning of cottages, and whether we cannot put the definition in Part III. into Part II. I venture to submit that if we included the words in the definition of dwelling houses it would make the matter perfectly clear to the ordinary understanding. It would show that the dwelling houses included cottages, and also the power of providing garden ground by the Act of 1885. I should like to see the words of Part III. inserted.

Amendment proposed—

“That the expression dwelling house shall include after the word ‘defined,’ in line 21, these words—‘The expression dwelling house shall include cottage, and may include the garden of not more than half an acre, providing the annual value of such garden shall not be more than £3.’”

Question proposed : “That these words be there added.”

MR. RITCHIE: I have no objection personally to the amendment, but I would point out that there is always the danger in an absolute definition that you rather narrow than widen the provision.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member that the expression “dwelling house” in the Bill as it stands means any inhabited building.

MR. CHANNING: The question is really a question of drafting more than anything else, and it is a question which requires some consideration. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman rather as a suggestion which I should like to see carefully considered as to its effect upon Part 3. Before it is adopted it would probably entail the exclusion of a Sub-section in Part 3 of Clause 56. The object, I have, in view is to make it perfectly clear that cottages can be dealt with in villages, and that the presence of the word “cottages” in the 3rd Part does not exclude them from the 2nd Part.

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman wishes to see the reason why the words are wanted in Part 3 and not included in Part 2. It might perhaps be fairly held that the “housing of the working classes” did not necessarily include cottages with gardens, and, therefore, it is defined that it shall so include them. But the word “lodging-house” is in itself a somewhat narrow word, and therefore it is right to make it perfectly clear that cottages with gardens are included. But when you come to deal with dwelling-houses, surely it is enough to say that a dwelling-house shall mean an inhabited building.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I only meant to point out to my hon. Friend that half an acre of ground at £3 a year is an extreme restriction. Unfortunately, it is the case that there are unsuitable dwellings near railway stations, where land, worth much more, would be excluded from the operations of the Act.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I think the effect of the amendment would be to limit the word “dwelling-house.” With regard to the expression “dwelling-house,” I think it would be convenient if the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill told us why the word “dwelling-house,” which seems to limit the operation of the Act, has been used instead of the word “premises.”

EARL COMPTON: My hon. Friend has raised this question, and it shows at once the very great difficulty everybody has in defining the particular terms. It is one of the difficulties that Sanitary Authorities have had to contend with for a very long time. They do not understand what is meant by certain terms, and medical officers have very great difficulty in defining the terms. I am not a lawyer learned in defining terms, but I confess that as a layman the words “dwelling house” convey to my mind a house in a town, and not a cottage in the country. I confess that it includes “cottage,” but if some term could be inserted in order to make it perfectly clear that cottages are meant, it would be an advantage.

MR. RITCHIE: Inhabited buildings.

EARL COMPTON: Inhabited. Yes, but I see at the side of the scheme the notes, “Definition of Street,” and other words, all which point to its being a house in town, and not in the country; and if I were not accustomed to reading these Acts, and if I were like the majority of Local Authorities in the country, I should certainly turn to Part 3 with reference to cottages, and not to Part 2, to see what was to be done.

MR. RITCHIE: My hon. Friend asked me why "dwelling-house" was inserted instead of "premises." I believe in drafting the Bill, it was considered that the "dwelling house" would more directly point to what we wanted to deal with than the word "premises," which in many men's minds might mean other buildings besides dwelling-houses.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 29 to 37 (B) agreed to.

Clause 37 (C).

Amendment proposed: On page 17, line 40, before the word "injurious," to insert the words "dangerous or."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question: "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed: On page 18, line 7, after the word "authority," to insert the words, "not being in the Administrative County of London, or not being a Rural Sanitary Authority."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed: "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HOBHOUSE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain what is meant by this Amendment?

MR. RITCHIE: It is in accordance with the suggestion that there should be an appeal, not only in the case of the County of London, but also in that of the Rural Sanitary Authorities.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I say that I do not quite understand the proposal. Is there to be an appeal beyond the County Council?

MR. RITCHIE: There is an appeal to the County Council of London, but not to the Local Government Board.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I would point out that the words of the Clause are, "But the absence of any such complaint shall not excuse him from inspecting any dwelling-house, and making a representation thereon to the Local Authority." Surely this ought to apply to any district.

MR. RITCHIE: Under the Local Government Act you could only appeal to the Local Government Board; but the Committee have adopted an appeal to the London County Council, and to the County Council from the Rural Sanitary Authorities.

MR. COLLINGS: I should like to know what will be the effect of inserting the words "or not being a Rural Sanitary Authority?"

MR. RITCHIE: By the law, as it at present stands, if the complaint or representation be made to the Local Authority, and the Local Authority declines to take proceedings, there is an appeal, or at any rate a petition on the part of the householders who make the complaint to the Local Government Board, and an enquiry ensues; but as is now proposed, the County Council will take the place of the Local Government Board in the case of the inhabitants of London, and the County Councils elsewhere will receive the appeals from the Rural Sanitary Authorities.

AN HON. MEMBER: But is there no appeal beyond the London County Council?

MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid not; I do not think it would be possible under the circumstances to call on the Local Government Board to intervene.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I only wish to make the remark, that the distinction between rural and urban districts which will be set up by the adoption of this Amendment is one that cannot be expected to last very long.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Consequential Amendments made.

Clauses 38 to 47 agreed to.

Clause 48.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I have to move an amendment to this Clause, page 22. line 14, after the word "four" insert the words "or more."

Agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: This will necessitate other Amendments of the same character.

Consequent Amendments made.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause D agreed to.

Clause 49 agreed to.

Clause 50 agreed to.

Clause E agreed to.

Clause 52 agreed to.

Clause F.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I understand that this Clause refers back to Clauses 37 and 48, and that being so, I desire to move an Amendment to line 1, page 31, so as to make it read, "Where the medical officer of health or four or more inhabitant householders." I desire to insert the words "four or more" in order to make the Clause run clearly with the Amendments that have already been agreed to. A difficulty arises from this—that in Clause 37 the inhabitant householders make their complaint, not to the Vestry or the District Board, but to the Medical Officer.

Amendment proposed: on page 1, line 31, after the word "health" to insert the words "four or more" (Mr. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed: "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE: The Amendment of the hon. gentleman is not necessary, because the clause makes it the duty of the medical officer to forward the complaints made by the inhabitant householders to the authorities.

EARL COMPTON: I think it most necessary that there should be power on the part of the inhabitant householders to make representations on the subject. I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) will see the point.

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member will see that there are two processes, and that either the Medical Officers may make a report, or there may be a representation made by inhabitant householders. If inhabitant householders make a representation, it is not a representation made by the Medical Officer, but the Medical Officer is bound to forward the representation to the authorities, although it may not have been made by himself.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I am quite content with having pointed out the difficulty which occurred to me, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I think we ought to amend this Clause in one particular. Instead of "primary authority," I think the descriptive phrase should be one that is familiar to students of Local Government questions. A few years ago the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Local Government Board, introduced the general phrase "District Councils," and I think it would be much better if, instead of the "Primary Authority," we were to introduce the words I suggest, namely, "District Authority." I move, therefore, that the word "Primary" be omitted in order to insert the word "District."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. LAWSON: I hope there is no doubt that in the London district the inhabitant householders are subject to the same rule in regard to the appeal to the County Council as has hitherto been the case with regard to the appeal to the Local Government Board.

MR. RITCHIE: I think there can be no doubt about it.

Consequential amendments made.

MR. CHANNING: I have put down an Amendment to Clause F, line 37 the object of which is broadly to take the sense of the Committee as to whether County Councils in rural districts should not have the power of contributing to the expenses of the Rural Sanitary Authorities. Of course, there may be verbal alterations required, but I move the Amendment as it appears on the paper to raise the question whether, when we give the power of appeal on the part of the Rural Authority to the County Council, we should not at the same time give the power of contributing to the expenses necessarily incurred.

Amendment proposed, in page 31, line 37, after "authority" insert as sub-sections (3), (4), and (5) the sub-sections (5), (6), and (7) of Clause G, pages 32 and 33, adding the words "or rural sanitary authority" after the word "board," in page 32, line 34; the same in line 35; the same in page 33, line 8; the same in line 10; the same in line 14; the same in line 18; the same in line 21; the same in line 22; the same in line 23; the same in line 34."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE: I think it is injudicious to give powers of this kind unless it is intended to throw an onus on the authorities to whom the powers are given. No doubt, the reason why the hon. Member has proposed this amendment is because of the somewhat analogous provision in the case of London. In London, under the existing law, there are two sets of Acts which are constantly quoted on this subject, and they are called Cross's Act and Torrens's Acts. What is done under one falls on the whole of London; what is done under the other, falls on the locality. We propose a medium plan in this Bill—a something that will be between the two. We provide that if the County Council carry out the work required in default of its being done by the Local Authority, they may call on the Local Authority to contribute; but if the Local Authority does it they may call on the County Council to contribute a proportionate share of the cost, while, in case of there being a difference of opinion between the two, the point in dispute is to be settled by the Secretary of State. This may be a very useful principle when applied to London, but it may not be at all applicable to many of the country districts. London is one huge town, having in its vast population a community of interests, and Parliament has recognised by the provisions of the Acts to which I have referred that there is such a community of interests, by providing that where the scheme is under Cross's Acts the cost shall fall on the whole of London. I think it only right that we should carry that principle to its legitimate conclusion. But it is proposed to apply this principle to the rural districts which cannot have interests such as are found in a community like that of London, and I should be sorry to seem even to imply that the County Councils should make a contribution in aid of a particular village scheme which is an entirely new thing. I am afraid I cannot accept the amendment.

MR. LAWSON: I am bound to say I look on the Amendment of my hon. Friend as a logical consequence of the operation of the Government in enlarging the clause. The right hon. Gentleman would allow any County Council to take the action that was originally allowed to the London County Council alone. While I agree as to his definition of the unity of London, I cannot say that when the County Council contributes to the cost of a sanitary improvement, under the Artisans' Dwellings Act, in a certain district, it is not a rate in aid. It is a rate in aid. If a rate is made for the common fund of London it is a rate in aid, whatever be the community of interest in the county, and if that is good for the County of London it is surely equally good for other counties. I think it a very proper thing that the County Council should have power to do this.

MR. COLLINGS: This question has been up before. Take the case of a county very wealthy in itself—in its aggregate. Take Devonshire or Somersetshire, for instance, which include several large towns, you can easily imagine that the County Council would see the dark spot in the county. A poor village might be the cause of unhealthiness to the surrounding districts, but that locality would not be likely to be able to bear the expense of carrying out the improvement; and surely if, under those circumstances, the County Council like to give a grant in aid from the general purse of the whole county for an improvement which will undoubtedly benefit the whole county, and perhaps directly benefit it, there is no reason why it should not do so. This poor village may be adjacent to a large town, and we know that fevers and other infectious diseases cannot be confined to a particular spot. Nobody is safe from them. An inhabitant of this miserable fever-stricken village may go into a neighbouring town and spread the infection, and this seems to me the very thing an enlightened County Council would be glad to have the power to do. There is nothing compulsory about it, and with the consent of those who sent the Representatives to the Council they should be able to vote assistance towards carrying out improvements in a particular locality, which locality was not likely to do it for themselves. Everyone living in the county must be interested in the adoption of precautions for preventing the spread of fevers which may exist in villages even miles away. Fever may come from fever-stricken places to market towns, and in that way spread disease all over the county, therefore I cannot see what objections there are to enabling a County Council if they like to exercise this power. We ought not to be afraid to give it to that Body. They are an elected Body, and therefore we may be sure they will take care of the rights entrusted to them. To refuse to give them this permissive power is a thing not to be desired.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I join issue very seriously with the hon. Gentleman over this clause. I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite enunciated a very proper principle when he said the responsibility should be finally on the owners of properties which are unhealthy, and the idea that this Bill should come in and enable the County Council to saddle the ratepayers with contributions in order to prevent the spread of disease arising from unhealthy dwellings is a principle which ought not to be accepted. We ought to bear in mind that the dangers are described as coming from private property, and that the ordinary taxpayer suffers. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will stand to the principle that responsibility shall be fastened to the owners of the property, and that they will have no means of escaping, and that no commiseration from healthy localities shall be allowed to operate. I think there is a great principle involved here, and I wish to take this opportunity of saying that I adhere most decidedly to the idea that the responsibility should rest on the owner of the property, and that they should not look for contributions from the county, however wealthy it may be. We must bear in mind that the working man has to bear his share of the county rates; and if he is not responsible for the evils that we wish to prevent, he should not be called upon to pay anything in regard to them.

AN HON. MEMBER: We do it in London.

MR. ESSLEMONT: So much the worse for London. It is a bad principle, and one which ought to be stamped out.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: I would point out that there is a great difference between the case of London and a rural county. It is of importance to all Londoners that a really unsanitary area should be stamped out. We have an enormous population, and if there is a question of plague in our midst it is a danger to the whole of London. I think the matter was pressed rather too far by the hon. Member who spoke of rural counties. My own impression is that in a county like Devonshire it would be extremely unpopular to throw the responsibility of managing and stamping out unsanitary areas on the County Council at large. I believe there is a very strong feeling in the counties that responsibility in these matters should be thrown on the owners of property. If owners of property have themselves neglected to maintain their cottages in proper order, I cannot conceive anything worse than that such men, who have been pocketing large sums of money through not maintaining their houses in a healthy state, should come forward and say to the rest of the community, who are not in the least affected by these unsanitary areas, "Oh, we cannot afford to put our property in proper order, and therefore we ask you, the ratepayers of the county, to do the work for us." That seems to me a most dangerous and retrogressive policy, and I trust that we shall not enter upon any course of the kind. The effect of that would be, that these men, whom this Bill ought to punish, would be the very men to derive the benefit from their own misdoings and neglect of responsibility.

EARL COMPTON: All the arguments raised by the last two speakers apply to London equally as much as to the country, and in this way. We have people in London who do not do their duty as regards putting their property in a proper sanitary condition. In the same way, we have houses getting into an insanitary state and everyone wishes to stamp them out. In the same way, somebody has to do it, because the owners will not do it. The question is, who is to step in? We say the County Council is able to give a grant in aid to the Local Authorities, in order to enable them to demolish and reconstruct. I maintain that London stands exactly on all fours with the country, with this exception: that London, taken as a whole, is one town, and that country districts are largely divided into villages and sanitary areas. At the same time I would like to point out that the County Council is composed of gentlemen not representing one particular district, but the whole county. You may take any county in England in the same way as you take the County of London; it is a county in precisely the same way. I submit that no arguments have been brought forward which would not apply to London. So much the worse for London it is said, but I maintain that it would be a pity for London if we had not this power.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The noble Lord misunderstands me. I am all for giving this power, but the question is, On whom shall the expenses fall? I would give the Local Authorities power to pull down houses, but my point is that the cost should fall upon those who are responsible.

EARL COMPTON: I should have thought that that matter would have come under provisions dealing with the incidents of taxation.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I would point out that we have already passed Clause 50, Sub-section 2, which throws the expense, not on the district, but on the parish, and now we are asked to throw a portion of this expenditure, not on the parish or the district, but on the county. I submit that, if you are going to widen the area of the cost of executing the Act, you should have amended your action on the previous Clause. You should have said that this cost shall be cost on the whole district, instead of saying now that it shall be spread over the whole county. The cost that will be incurred under this Clause will be comparatively small. It is simply the cost of closing the buildings and of clearing away obstructions. I do not think that there is any case for such a contribution as is proposed to be made.

Question put, and negatived.

Other Amendments made.

Clause F agreed to.

MR. CHANNING: Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to insert words in Clause 11 to give Rural Authorities the same power of rehousing the dispossessed population as he has given the other authorities?

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member is referring to a part of the Bill we have disposed of. We cannot go back on that. On Report I will undertake to introduce words to cover the point raised by the hon. Member.

Clauses G. H., 42, 54, T., and 55 agreed to.

Clause J.—

MR. RITCHIE: I have an Amendment to this Clause which is to put right an informality which occurred at the last meeting as to the exclusion of Municipal boroughs. The Amendment is to put the Clause on the same lines as the other part of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 35, line 37, to leave out from the word "district" to the word "shall," in line 39, and insert "in the administrative county of London, or to any Rural Sanitary Authority in any other county.—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HOBHOUSE: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the present Amendment widens the exception. The former decision was to exclude all boroughs. He now proposes to exclude all urban districts.

MR. RITCHIE: That is true, and that is one of the reasons for my Amendment. The Amendment is to bring the Clause into line with the provisions agreed to by the Committee as to an appeal to the County Council. The Committee have confined that appeal to Rural Sanitary Authorities. When the amendment was moved, it was only to embrace Municipal Boroughs, leaving Urban Districts alone. Without this Amendment, the position would be that in Urban Districts it might be held that the County Council had no power whatever, as the question of appeal has been confined to Rural Districts. Whether that is right or wrong, it seems to me only right that this particular provision should be brought in line with other provisions, giving an appeal to Rural Authorities.

MR. COLLINGS: Any addition to Boroughs is defined by the Municipal Corporation Act of 1882; all other Local Governments are excluded—Local Boards, for instance—are they to be excluded from the Bill?

MR. RITCHIE: I am not responsible for what the Committee has already done. The Committee has already given the right of appeal in the case of Rural Authorities. That was an Amendment of an hon. Member opposite, and it has been accepted and embodied in the Bill. It is with a view to bring the Clause dealing with Urban Sanitary Authorities into accord with that Amendment that I make this proposal. The hon. Member knows quite well that there will be a considerable difficulty if you exclude Municipal Boroughs, some of which go down to an extremely small population. There will be a great difficulty in including all Urban Sanitary Authorities, some of which embrace a population of 10,000.

MR. COLLINGS: The right hon. Gentleman started by asking us to pass all these Clauses, as we have been doing, like flashes of lightning, on the ground that we were not going to interfere with the original Act. Well, I say that he himself has interfered with that original Act in two important particulars. He has, first of all, made Cross's Act absolutely impossible—although I did not notice it at the time. That I call an interference in a manner which we were not asked to adopt. Then a strong appeal is made to us as to the necessity of altering the present Clause, and if we refrain from doing so—

MR. RITCHIE: What does my hon. Friend mean?

MR. COLLINGS: I am referring to your Amendment, which puts the losses to Current Incomes instead of to Loans. It is in the 23rd Clause, I think. The right hon. Gentleman is himself interfering, under the Amendment before us, with the principle he laid down, and he would now release all Urban Authorities, including Municipal Corporations.

MR. RITCHIE: The appeal is confined to Rural Sanitary Authorities.

MR. COLLINGS: There is no reason why it should be.

EARL COMPTON: What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by the word "appeal?" I understand "appeal" to mean that which I was decided upon when the point was raised. This is a question of petition or representation—petition from inhabitants, or representation from a Medical Officer of Health. I understand when the right hon. Gentleman speaks of appeal he means petition.

MR. RITCHIE: Action in default.

MR. HOBHOUSE: By accepting this Amendment the Committee are excluding all urban districts other than boroughs which have already been excluded by the unfortunate action of the Committee from the operation of this clause. This clause provides that the representation of the Medical Officer in a county be referred to the Local Authority and the Local Authority shall take action on the representation as if the presentation were made by their own Medical Officer. The right hon. Gentleman now proposes to except all urban districts other than boroughs. I think he is going further to weaken any power the County Council may have had under this Act. There is no doubt the County Councils have considerable power at present, owing to the reports of medical officers being sent to them, though under the Local Government Act they have no direct power of taking action on these reports. They can consider these reports and forward them to the local authorities, and stir up local opinion on these questions; but if you accept the Amendment—

MR. RITCHIE (interrupting): I will not press the Amendment. I do not wish to raise a discussion. I only proposed it in order to bring this part of the Bill in accordance with the previous decision of the Committee. My own sympathies are all the other way.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has given way upon this point. I was, I must confess, taken by surprise at what he says that the Committee settled as to limiting to Rural Sanitary Authorities the appeal to the County Council. I think it would be a pity to diminish the power of the County Council to that extent. I am prepared to concede that you cannot give them power to deal with large boroughs, but I should like to see them have power in the case of very small boroughs and Local Boards. Before the Report stage I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider carefully whether he is wise in giving up any powers the County Council may have with respect to Urban Sanitary Authorities and Local Board districts.

MR. LAWSON: The right hon. Gentleman has expressed an opinion against the Amendment already agreed to, but when it was proposed, the right hon. Gentleman accepted it without challenging a Division. It would have been carried against the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester.

MR. RITCHIE: I explained the reason I was anxious that the Bill should pass, and I thought that if you included Municipal Authorities it would raise great opposition from Municipal Corporations, and prevent the passing of the Bill this Session.

MR. ESSLEMONT: No doubt there is great difficulty in the matter. There are boroughs containing 10,000 or 15,000 inhabitants without a Municipal Council, and no doubt they would contest this very strongly. It does not follow that because a Corporation is small it mismanages its affairs, and I think the right-hon. Gentleman was right in drawing the line where he did. This would be resisted to the very death; the idea that we should in a Bill like this interfere with their prerogative would raise a storm of opposition. Those who are acquainted with small boroughs will, I think, appreciate the great difficulty that will have to be encountered. I would say further —

MR. RITCHIE: I withdraw.

MR. CHANNING: Before the Amendment is withdrawn, I should like to ask a question as to Clause F. Are the Local Boards included in the powers of appeal to County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE: No.

MR. COLLINGS: I do not think it was understood by every Member of the Committee that anybody was excluded except Municipal boroughs. If that is the sense of the Committee, and if there is anything necessary to be put right, perhaps the right-hon. Gentleman will do it upon Report.

MR. RITCHIE: Of course; nothing more can be done in Committee, because the thing has been already passed.

MR. COLLINGS : It can be done on Report.

MR. RITCHIE : It will be for the House to decide whether or not Urban Districts shall be included.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses J and 56 agreed to.

On Clause 57—

EARL COMPTON : I want to move an Amendment in line 15. There is a proviso in the Clause, the reason for which I am at a loss to imagine, though it is only a matter of form. I think it would be better that the usual course should be taken, and the local authorities should be able to pass resolutions that they adopt. It only wastes time. I move to leave out the proviso.

Amendment proposed : Line 15 after the words " schedule mentioned " to leave out all the words to end of the Clause. (Earl Compton.)

Question proposed : " That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HOBHOUSE : I hope the right-hon. Gentleman will consider this. Is it wise, now that we have got a proper elective authority in London and in every county in England, that the Authorities of every rural district should have to come to the Local Government Board for its sanction? Why should such delay occur in regard to the adoption of the Act as is provided by subsequent Clauses. The County Councils must be much better acquainted with the feeling of the district than anyone else.

MR. LAWSON : I do not wish to interfere with other counties, but a Representative Authority has been created in London, and I cannot see why the Home Office should object to the adoption of the suggestion.

MR. STUART WORTLEY : In practice the Secretary of State acts as a kind of arbitrator between the parties. As to whether that is wise or not, different opinions may be held.

EARL COMPTON : The hon. Gentleman does not seem to see that this is the commencement of the adoption of the Act, and that when a scheme is prepared it is sent on as a matter of course for the approval of the Government.

MR. RITCHIE : This is rather a large question, and affects the Home Office, with whom I have had no opportunity of conferring. I should hardly like to accept an Amendment of this character without having that opportunity. I think that if the noble Lord will allow the clause to stand as at present, the matter might be raised again on Report. Certainly if the noble Lord takes the sense of the Committee upon the point I shall be obliged to say no.

MR. LAWSON : The course the right hon. Gentleman suggests may put us at a disadvantage. We are discussing the question from a practical point of view, and not with any Party intentions. It must be borne in mind that in the County Councils there are representatives of the districts, and they speak for the districts, and I cannot see why the Home Office should value this particular power when there is a representative authority at hand.

MR. HOWELL : I think this is a case in which the right hon. Gentleman might well give way. We have now a representative Council, and I think the provision of the clause, as it stands, would rather impede than forward matters.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE : I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board how it would be, supposing the adoption of this Act be put within the power of the London County Council, and such questions as those raised by the hon. Members opposite should come up. Is there any clause in the Bill which will deal with such a point, that is to say, that will constitute the Secretary of State an arbitrator between the London County Council and any local people who raise objections?

EARL COMPTON : At the present moment the Housing of the Poor Committee of the London County Council are in active negotiation with the Home Secretary as to lodging houses. We approached him in the first instance, and asked him to allow us to adopt these Acts for the county of London. After some time—I will not say there was any unnecessary delay—the Government consented. We then submitted it to the Council, and the whole thing was carried through. Whenever we wish, and we have wished, to adopt some scheme of lodging houses in London, we have to submit the scheme to the Secretary of State. This is only a matter of official routine, which we want to get rid of in order to save time. I think it will save time if we can come to some decision now, instead of waiting until the Report. I am sure the Home Secretary will not raise any objection.

MR. RITCHIE: I am prepared to meet my noble Friend. The questions of London and the rural districts stand on a very different footing. If my noble Friend will look at the Bill he will see that certain representations have to be made to the Local Government Board to hold a local inquiry upon an application being made to them. As I say, the Rural Sanitary Authority stands upon a different footing to the London County Council, and I am prepared to allow Sub-section (a) to disappear, subject to this one reservation, that, if my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary differs from me in the matter, he must be at liberty to raise the question on Report.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I think that this point may be fairly conceded in fulfilment of the right hon. Gentleman's own scheme for the representation of the counties. I do not admit that, with regard to the London County Council, any exception should be made. On the contrary, I think they have greater access to the Department than any other authorities in the country, and, therefore, I think we should reserve the powers to the County Councils in rural districts, even more so than to the London County Councils.

DR. COMMINS: It is evident that the building of lodging houses in London may draw an undesirable population to a particular district. That, however, cannot happen in Rural districts, because the population must be there, or no one would think of erecting lodging houses for them.

MR. HOBHOUSE: The right hon. Gentleman has not dealt with this matter as affecting the rural districts on its merits. In this very Session of Parliament he has introduced a Bill which allows us to go to the County Council when we cannot get allotments from the Rural Sanitary Authority. Surely, having got a proper authority in the counties, you might perfectly well put them in action and trust them.

MR. CHANNING: I may enforce what the hon. Member has just said by one remark. The intention which the right hon. Gentleman himself has again and again expressed was to make the County Council the Central Sanitary Authority for the rural sanitary district, and surely it is simply a question of time when the extension of powers should take place. I hope he will be able to see his way to consent to this Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE: I hope the hon. Member who moved the Amendment will divide the Amendment into two, and let us divide upon the two parts separately. I am afraid I cannot consent to make so great a change as that proposed—certainly I cannot do it with regard to the rural districts. So far as London is concerned it is merely a question of the adoption of the Act, but as to the counties a great deal of machinery is to be set in motion, and I cannot consent to the alteration in regard to them.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I fully understand that, without consulting the Home Office, the right hon. Gentleman cannot, off-hand, pledge that Department; but what I submit to him is, that if he himself is favourable to our idea with regard to the rural districts throughout the country, he should go the length of assuring us that he will consult the Department, and, if possible, on Report, introduce a clause which will carry out the proposition we make. I think this is not asking him to go too far.

MR. RITCHIE: What I have proposed to do is to accept the Amendment under the reservation I have made so far as London is concerned. I am at the head of the Department concerned in the case of the rural districts, and I do not see my way to make the transfer from the Local Government Board to the Council upon the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord. No doubt the whole question as to the powers which are possessed by the Local Government Board will have to be considered shortly, and this amongst them. But I do not wish to prejudge the action of Parliament by accepting this Amendment in its present stage. I suggest that the noble Lord should divide his Amendment into two.

MR. HOWELL : Does not Section 58 provide all the right hon. Gentleman wishes ?

MR. RITCHIE : Clause 57 is as to the adoption of the Act, and Clause 58 provides that in rural sanitary districts certain things shall be done.

Amendment proposed, in page 36, line 18, after the word "mentioned," leave out all the words down to the word "and" in line 18.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 36, line 15, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words "provided that."

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

MR. ESSLEMONT : The right hon. Gentleman is willing to take away the power from the Secretary of State, but he says he is not willing to take away his own power. We all know that so long as the right hon. Gentleman himself is at the head of the Local Government Board the office will be administered with discretion, and we know it is human nature never to give up power so long as one can stick to it ; but I think we may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to trust the County Councils, and accept the decision of the Committee.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I hope the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that this is just one of the occasions of new legislation when we cannot forget the fact that the great Act of 1888 has been passed, and this is but an early step towards handing over a great many of the powers now possessed by the Local Government Board to the County Councils. I think it would be well if the right hon. Gentleman would recognise the fact that it was one of his intentions, when bringing in the Local Government Act, to relieve the Local Government Board of many of its duties. As a matter of fact, the passing of the Bill in the form in which it is now administered has really amounted to an enlargement of the work of the Local Government Board rather than otherwise. Here is an opportunity of relieving the Local Government Board of work, and of entrusting it to representative bodies, the County Councils.

MR. RITCHIE : I accept.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, Clause 57, page 6, line 21, leave out the words "Local Government Board," and insert the words "County Council of the County in which such district is situate."

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words proposed be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 57, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. HOBHOUSE : Will the effect of the clause be that the Act will be adopted by the Vestry or District Board without the consent of the Council ?

MR. RITCHIE : No ; this clause cannot be put in force by a Vestry or District Board. It must be put in force by the London County Council.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 58.

Amendment proposed, in page 36, line 24, leave out the words "Local Government Board," and insert the words "County Councils of the County in which such district is situate."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 58, page 36, line 28, to leave out the words "Local Government Board," and insert "County Council."

Agreed to.

MR. HOBHOUSE: May I suggest that instead of the words "one of their Inspectors," in line 29, we should put in the words which the right hon. Gentleman accepted in the Allotments Bill, which were to the effect that the inquiry should be held either by a paid officer of the Council, or by one or more members of the Council?

Amendment proposed, in page 36, line 29, to leave out the words "one of their Inspectors," and insert the words "by a member of the Council, or any officer or person appointed by the Council for the purpose."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 36, line 30, to leave out the word "Inspector," and insert the words "the person holding the inquiry."

Agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 58, page 37, line 4, to leave out the words "Local Government Board," and insert the words "County Council."

Agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 37, line 5, to leave out the words "the London Gazette," and insert the words "one or more papers circulating in the locality."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Agreed to.

Consequential Amendments made in lines 8, 26, 29.

Clause 59 agreed to.

Clause 60.

MR. CHANNING: I do not move the Amendment standing in my name.

EARL COMPTON: I had no idea the Amendment was to be withdrawn, or I should have put down an Amendment myself. Certainly, unless I get some satisfactory explanation from the right hon. Gentleman, I am afraid I shall have to give notice that, on Report, I shall raise the whole question dealt with in this clause. I shall regret if it is necessary to raise a discussion on Report, but I really do not see how I can raise the point in any other way. Sections 175 and 178 of the Public Health Act relate to the purchase of land, and by those sections the process which is to be gone through is provided. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me as to the complicated or, at any rate, lengthy character of that process. We find that there is a great deal of time wasted whenever we have to undertake some of these schemes. In consequence of the long period of time during which the question is discussed, there is some loss, because the people in the locality to be dealt with always put up the price considerably. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to say whether he has directed his attention to these particular clauses, and whether he sees any means whereby we can simplify the machinery. My suggestion would be that there should be a Provisional Order. I do not want to raise the question on Report, and if the right hon. Gentleman will tell me that the question is engaging attention at the present moment, or that it will engage attention before next Session, I shall advise those whom I represent on this Committee, the County Council Committee of the Housing of the Poor, not to press the point this year.

MR. RITCHIE: The noble Lord offers me a considerable bribe, and I hope that nothing I may say will deprive me of the reward he dangles before my eyes. I do not, however, wish it to be inferred that the noble Lord would unduly take up the time of the House in the matter. If he wishes me to answer the question whether I think the whole machinery of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act are satisfactory, I do not mind saying that, in my own private opinion, I think they are capable of considerable improvement. In fact, I do not think they are satisfactory, but if I were to go on and say this has been engaging my attention with the idea of bringing about any practical result, I am afraid I should go a little beyond strict accuracy. But my attention has been engaged in so many other directions that I admit I have not had time to seriously consider the question. I wish to tell my noble Friend, in return for the consideration he gives me, that whenever the time arrives when I shall have an opportunity of considering the whole question I shall gladly do so. I am not at all sure that it will fall to the lot of my Department to deal with the question, but, in any case, I think the present machinery is cumbersome, and, if it falls to my lot, I shall be glad to consider the subject.

MR. LAWSON: The House has amended the Act by the Artisans' Dwellings Act, under which machinery is set in motion for acquiring land with a penal intention. Under this Bill, however, the cost of acquiring land will be just as great as if it were acquired by a Railway Company, under compulsory powers, for their own profit, and it certainly seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman might consider that special point.

MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid that would be a very invidious thing, because it would seem to imply that for this particular purpose land might be taken away without the same consideration being given for it as would be given if it were acquired for any other purpose.

EARL COMPTON: I am glad to hear what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and I shall do the best in my power to prevent the question being raised on Report. I hope I may say to the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman is willing to listen to any particular views we may lay before him on the point.

MR. RITCHIE: Hear, hear!

MR. J. COLLINGS: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see the distinction between land acquired for railway purposes and land acquired for workmen's dwellings. There will be no proposal to erect such dwellings unless they are wanted. They might possibly be wanted through the demolition of insanitary houses, and, therefore, it may become absolutely necessary for the Local Authority to acquire them. I do not see any difficulty in amending the Land Clauses Consolidation Act for that particular purpose without going to the trouble of opening the whole question raised by that Act.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg to move to omit, in line 22, of Clause 60, the words "With the consent of the Local Government Board," in order to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman an expression of opinion as to whether this is not one of the cases in which the County Council may be substituted for the Board.

Amendment proposed, in page 38, lines 22 and 23, to leave out the words "Local Government Board," in order to insert the words, "County Council of the County in which the land is situate."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Agreed to.

Clauses 60 to 66 added to the Bill.

Clause 67.

Amendment proposed, in line 35, to leave out the words "Local Government Board," and insert the words "County Council of the County in which the lodgings are situate."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Agreed to.

Clause 68.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to move, in line 13, to leave out the words "Local Government Board."

MR. RITCHIE: I cannot accept that.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I should like to ask how the expenses of the County Council under this clause are to be provided for. I may mention that, under the Allotments Act, the question has already arisen whether the expenses of a local inquiry should be borne by the County Council or the Sanitary Authority.

MR. CHANNING : Sub-section 3 of Clause 58 deals with the exact point.

MR. HOBHOUSE : If a local inquiry is held by paid officers of the County Council certain expenses are incurred, and the question is whether these are expenses of the Sanitary Authority or the County Council. If they are to be paid by the County Council there ought to be some direction as to how they should be borne.

MR. RITCHIE : The expenses of inquiry will fall upon the County, and be paid by the County Council.

Clauses 68 and 69 added to the Bill.

Clause 70.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE : On this clause I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would be possible to introduce words giving borrowing powers to such an Institution as the Polytechnic or the Association for providing open spaces, or anything of that sort ?

MR. RITCHIE : No, I do not think that would be germane to the Bill.

Clause 70, Clause K, and Clauses 75, 76, 78, O, P, 80, 85, 86, S, 87, 81, 82, 77, L, M, and N, agreed to.

Clause 89.

Amendments agreed to :—

Page 50, line 6, leave out sub-sections (a) to (d), and insert—

“A reference to any section of ‘Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,’ shall be construed to mean a reference to the corresponding sections of ‘The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.’”—(The Lord Advocate.)

Page 51, leave out sub-sections (b) and (c), and insert—

“Local inquiries by the Board of Supervision shall be held under sections 10 to 13 of ‘The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867,’ and local inquiries by the Secretary for Scotland under ‘The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889.’”—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. RITCHIE : I should be much obliged to the Committee if they will allow us to go on a little longer, in order to finish the Bill. There is no contentious matter whatever left.

Clauses 89 and 90 added to the Bill.

Clause 91.

Amendment agreed to, on the Motion of the Lord Advocate.

Page 52, line 13, leave out “as if,” and insert “and”; page 52, line 14, leave out “were,” and insert “shall be”; page 52, line 15, leave out “Local Government Board,” and insert “County Council of the District”; page 52, line 16, leave out Sub-section (2); page 52, line 37, leave out after “The,” and insert “expression ‘Court of Quarter Sessions,’ means the Sheriff”; page 53, line 1, leave out “of,” and insert “or.”

Shortly before three o'clock, the bell, indicating that the Speaker was at Prayers, rang, whereupon several Members called out “Go on.”

THE CHAIRMAN : We cannot sit whilst the House is sitting except by special order of the House. The words of the Standing Order are imperative.

The CHAIRMAN then withdrew from the Committee, but presently returned, and on its being announced that the necessary order had been obtained, the proceedings were continued.

Amendment proposed, Clause 92, page 55, to leave out from line 34 to end of sub-section, and add, “that the provisions of Part 2 of this Act, with respect of the powers of County Councils, shall not apply to Ireland.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

DR. COMMINS : There may be County Councils in Ireland one of these days. Why not leave these words in ? As long as there is no County Council in Ireland there can be no harm.

MR. RITCHIE: I do not think the Amendment can be wanted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 95 and 96 added to the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE: I beg to move the following clause:—"The Local Government Board may, by an order sanctioning a scheme under this part of this Act, require the insertion in the scheme of such provisions, if any, for the dwelling accommodation of persons of the working classes displaced by the scheme as seem to the Board required by circumstances."

New clause proposed, "Provision of accommodation for persons of working classes."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. CREMER: It is almost impossible for one to gather the full force and meaning of the clause as it has just been read.

MR. RITCHIE: I will explain. It was suggested that, with regard to the new scheme proposed in the Bill, some provision should be made by which the Local Government Board, as the confirming authority, should have power to insist upon the local authority, when they make a new scheme, making a provision for the housing of those people who are displaced by that scheme.

MR. CREMER: Does the proposal give the Local Government Board power to compel the Local Authority to provide accommodation before the new scheme is carried into execution?

MR. CHANNING: I really think the matter has been considered so imperfectly and hastily that it would be better to bring up a clause on Report with respect to it. It will save time to postpone the question until the Report stage, and then to deal with it comprehensively.

MR. RITCHIE: I think there is a good deal of force in what the hon. Gentleman has stated, and I will take care that that course shall be pursued.

MR. HOWELL: I would rather like to see the clause agreed to by this Committee. The Amendment proposes to make direct provision for persons who are displaced by a scheme, and I think it, above all things, necessary that the Committee should, at all events, sanction the principle of such an Amendment. Any further Amendment could be introduced on the Report stage.

MR. RITCHIE: I think that is a very fair compromise.

MR. CHANNING: It seems to me that the clause does not impose a duty on the Sanitary Authority, or the County Council, to re-house the displaced population. The 11th section of the Act gives a dispensing power to the Local Government Board, or the Secretary of State. That seems to me to be a rational and satisfactory way of dealing with the question. I do not see why we should not recognise the statutory duty of the Local Authority to deal with the matter.

MR. RITCHIE: It seems to me quite obvious that it would be the greatest mistake in the world to insist that in every case the Local Authority should provide dwellings for the working classes. I think such a provision, instead of assisting the work the hon. Gentleman desires to see carried out, would be retarding it. There may be many schemes in which no such provision is necessary, there may be plenty of accommodation in a neighbourhood in which a scheme is carried out, and, therefore, to make it in every case the absolute duty of the Local Authorities to provide fresh accommodation, would, I am afraid, have an unfortunate effect. No scheme can be carried out under this Bill without the sanction of the Local Government Board, and if the confirming authority has power to insist that proper provision is made, all the necessities of the case will be met.

MR. COLLINGS: I quite sympathise with the view of the hon. Member, but, at the same time, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie). Take the case of Birmingham. We displaced 400 or 500 persons in Birmingham, and we discovered that not more than about 20 desired to be accommodated on the spot. It would have been very hard for the Corporation of Birmingham, under these circumstances, to have been obliged to have provided accommodation for between 400 and 500 persons.

MR. CREMER: I am exceedingly anxious that before any scheme is carried into operation due provision shall be made that the working classes who are displaced should have fresh accommodation provided for them. The absence at the present time of such provision is one of the greatest possible hardships inflicted on the working classes. There was a case in Somers Town, some time ago, in which hundreds of families were displaced by a scheme, and it was a long time before the scheme could be carried into effect in consequence. I believe there is some Act of Parliament which gives the Local Government Board power to compel the provision of accommodation for the working classes who are about to be displaced. I had no idea the Committee would have galloped through this Bill at the rate they have done, and I intended to have moved an Amendment on an earlier clause.

MR. RITCHIE: No doubt there is nothing in the existing Acts of Parliament, nor is there anything in the proposals we make, which compels the Local Government Board to insist on the provision of fresh dwelling places being made before a scheme is carried out, but the Board has full power to do so, and, as a matter of fact, there is nothing more common than for such provision to be made. The usual thing is for the confirming authority to insist upon provision being made prior to the demolition of the buildings. I should deprecate any limitation of the powers of the Local Government Board in this respect.

MR. CREMER: I shall reserve to myself the right to further consider the matter, and, if I think it advisable, to move the introduction of a new clause at a later stage.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

Some Amendments having been made in the Schedule,

MR. CREMER said: It has been very difficult for me to follow the Committee through the various stages of this complicated Bill. I presume it will come before the Committee again in the re-arranged form in which it is to be presented to the House, and we shall then have further opportunity of considering it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Bill, when it has once been reported to the House, will not come again before the Committee.

MR. CREMER: I am afraid that our having galloped through the Bill, as we have done to-day, will result in some discussion in the House, such as might otherwise have been avoided. I do not find that the Bill contains any provision which will prevent authorities from erecting artisans' dwellings of a similar design to those which already exist in the Metropolis. Many of these dwellings are totally unfit for habitation. Some time ago, I tried to find out who was responsible for the design of the buildings in Drury Lane. I was told by the Metropolitan Board of Works that the Local Government Board was responsible for it, but the Local Government Board, when I inquired of them, referred me back again to the Board of Works. I should be glad to point out to any Member of the Committee, who cares to accompany me, the way in which air and light have been excluded from these dwellings. I want to prevent a repetition of such huge blunders, and I fail to gather that there is in this Bill any provision that would give any authority power to prevent the perpetration of such blunders in the future.

MR. RITCHIE: I really am not surprised that the hon. Member has found some difficulty in following the various provisions of this Bill in the form in which they have been presented to the Committee, but, at the same time, I think the Committee have thoroughly understood that, looking at the fact that we had first to pass an Amendment Bill and then to consolidate the law, the measure could not have been drafted in a more convenient form. I may point out that the consideration of the Amendment Bill occupied the Committee for two sittings, and that any Gentleman who desired to amend the law with regard to the Dwellings of the Working Classes, was at liberty to endeavour to carry out his views on that Bill. It was understood, however, that the present Bill was merely a piece of machinery incorporating in the existing law the provisions of the Amendment

Bill, and I think the Committee generally came to the conclusion that, under these circumstances, it was not necessary to go much into detail on this Bill. As to the other point raised by the hon. Member, this is not a Bill for dealing with building regulations in any sense of the term, and it would be impossible for us to deal with them in such a measure. I presume that the London County Council have certain powers with regard to buildings, and they have recently obtained more powers on the subject. If further powers are required, they must be obtained by means of some other Bill. Well, Sir, as we have now arrived at the concluding stage of these proceedings, I hope I may be permitted to record my most cordial thanks to the Members of the Committee for the great assistance they have given me, and for the great assistance they have given the Government in the task we have laid upon ourselves. The Debates and the discussions have been entirely free from Party bias, and it has been evident that we have all been actuated with the one desire of making this Bill as good and complete a measure as we could. I must acknowledge, with gratitude, that hon. Members who were, no doubt, desirous of bringing about Amendments of the law of a much more far-reaching character than the rest of us have been willing to adopt, have been content to withhold their Amendments until some future time, in order that a Bill which we all regard as being a most valuable contribution to legislation in regard to the housing of the working classes, may be passed into law during the present Session. I am sure we have all recognised the extreme fairness you (Mr. Osborne Morgan) have shown in presiding over the Committee, and the business-like manner in which you have performed the duties assigned to you.

EARL COMPTON: I feel very strongly that the law may require further Amendment in the direction pointed out by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Cremer), but I quite agree that it would be impossible when we are amending Torrens's Act, which is practically what we are doing, to give further powers to the London County Council. Having myself taken much interest in this subject, and having, in most of the Amendments I have brought forward, represented the views of the London County Council, I should like to offer my thanks, and the thanks of the Council, to the Government for having introduced this Bill, and for the way in which they have received most of our Amendments. I think we owe a debt of gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) for the very kind way in which he has met our views.

MR. COLLINGS: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider between now and the Report stage. A point upon which it is almost impossible that we should have the law carried out by our Local Authorities, at any rate, in the provinces. I refer to the provision respecting the making up of any deficiency out of the current rates. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman why the deficiency should not be supplied out of the money borrowed under the provisions of the Act?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot allow the Committee to separate without thanking the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) for the kind way in which he has spoken of myself. All I can say is, that it has been a very pleasant and easy task to preside over such a good Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, with Amendments, be reported to the House."

Agreed to.
